These meetings were known as the hotbed of Fascists and antiadministration and anti-Roosevelt clique. The statement of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON] was made to prejudice the Finns in this country against our valued and able ally, Russia. He would have the Finns here build up a strong resentment among our people against the President and the administration. There are others who have been continuously sniping at the President and criticizing our friendly relations with and our aid to Russia. But most of them do not know what they think they know. For instance, we have by lend-lease furnished Russia only $4,250,000,000 of supplies since June 22, 1941, when Germany crossed the Russian frontier. I take it that such amount would equip the Russian Army about 7 weeks; but in return for such help we have had the pleasure and satisfaction of seeing the Russians hold and then turn back the most barbaric, ruthless, vile, mean, debased, and sordid war machine the world has ever beheld; to say nothing of our certain knowledge that Russian efforts and successes have saved many thousands of American lives.

It seems to me that these critics, instead of maligning the administration now, when our boys are fighting so bravely, tenaciously and successfully, with prospect of a reasonably early victory, on all fronts, should forget their selfish aspirations and attitudes and aline themselves with the majority of Americans who are wholeheartedly cooperating in an endeavor to rid the world once and for all of the most cannabalistic, insensate, unparalleled villainy the world has ever experienced. I wonder whether they appreciate the degree to which they undermine and impair the morale and stamina of our brave fighting men.

To an uninformed bystander it would appear, after reading these continuous but untenable attacks, that we are at war with Russia and not with the Nazis and the Japanese. They refuse to admit that the help we have given Russia has enabled her to do a very heroic and successful job, more than any other power, beyond question, toward bringing Hitler and his barbaric associates to their knees and a deserved total defeat.

In what position would the Allied Nations be if Marshal Rokossonvsky had not successfully turned back the Germans at Moscow, after they had entered the suburbs of that city in 1941; in what position would the Allied Nations be if Marshal Voronov had not beaten back the lousy Germans at Stalingrad in 1942 in the greatest and most momentous battle in all history?

Think of the more than a million Soviets who gave their lives to stay and ultimately drive back the savage Teutons, who had not mercy enough to kill a child or old woman with a bullet rather than bludgeon her to death, at Stalingrad, Orel, Kharkov, Smolensk, and Kiev. What would happen if the United States and Great Britain alone should have to face a German Army running free among Europe's 500,000,000 population?

Had we done two or three times as much as we have done for Russia that would not be enough to repay her for saving hundreds and thousands and thousands of lives of our American boys. Russia has thus far suffered about 7,500,000 casualties in battle, which number is more than all the servicemen we have in our combat units. Obviously no other country in the world could endure such losses and continue to fight so valiantly and successfully.

Russia is fighting not only for herself but for the liberty of all suffering mankind, for the permanent destruction of the German autocratic, militaristic caste, the most dastardly and cruel the world has ever seen, responsible for this war. The conduct of the Germans in dealing with prisoners of war and subjugated peoples does not even begin to be as merciful as was the conduct of Attila.

I cannot understand how a Member of Congress, sworn to safeguard and protect the rights and interests of America while she is in the most all-consuming war in the history of the world, when the very fate of all civilization hangs in the balance, when more than 10,000,000 of the flower of our manhood are under arms, fighting to preserve our form of government, our institutions, our freedom and our liberty, can permit himself to be used to weaken our military and economic positions. Perhaps such men do not mean to do so, but indirectly they are actually or potentially aiding our enemies, because all these attacks and charges and implications have been and are being used against the best interests of our country by our conniving, ruthless, lickspittle enemies. Every word uttered on the floor of the House that is favorable to the enemy cause is at once seized by Dr. Goebbels and broadcast throughout all Europe, especially Germany, and Japan, in an effort to stimulate and encourage all our enemies to persist at maximum resistance.

Even these purblind folk should open their eyes and minds and watch with gratitude, hope, and trust the advance of the great Soviety Army, remembering that we have contributed somewhat to the achievements of that great army in rolling back the tide of tyranny in freedom's darkest hour.

Do not these gentlemen realize the importance of our friendly relations with Russia? Which, in due course, will, no doubt, assist us in the complete elimination, for all time, of the most despicable, cruel, cowardly, mangey rats that ever infested this world, namely, the Japanese. I wonder whether these gentlemen who are overtly and covertly attacking the President realize what position we would be in if Russia had joined Germany, Italy, and Japan in war against the Allied Nations.

To My Colleagues in the House

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DONALD L. O'TOOLE

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. O'TOOLE. Mr. Speaker, my talk here today is a rather unusual one for this body, but I feel out of courtesy to many of the Members, both Democratic and Republican, I owe a duty and an obligation. A great number of my colleagues on both sides of the aisle have inquired from me during the past few days as to why I was rejected by the Democratic organization in Brooklyn for renomination to my seat here in the House.

At the outset, I would first like to convey to my colleagues, both Democratic and Republican, my most sincere appreciation for their expressions of respect, affection, and their desire to help with their time and their money in an effort to acquaint my constituency with their knowledge of my record as a Member of Congress. There can be no greater reward for any man who has served in this body than to know that he has the respect and affection of his colleagues. To me this memory will always be one of my richest treasures. However, let me assure you, my friends in the House, that I will return to office on January 3 next, for I am conscious that the people at home are aware that the congressional seat in my district is being made a political football by a small group of scheming, avaricious, and selfish ward heelers.

Mr. Joseph Madden, the district leader—in name only—who has denied me the nomination, knows that he cannot attack my record. He knows that I have sat in this body during the most trying times in American congressional history. I was here in the hard, crucial, trying days of the great depression when every congressional office was swamped with requests for help from decent, respectable citizens, and also from small business firms and corporations that made up the American scene. It is not necessary, Mr. Speaker, to inform any veteran Member of this House what difficult days those were. One need not recount the feeling of gloom and despair that had settled all over the entire Nation. From that difficult period we moved into the neutrality, or pre-war stage, when perhaps the most controversial legislation the country has ever known was introduced, debated, and decided upon on this floor. Following this came the war period we are now going through, necessitating the continuation of long, hard sessions when a man's full time, full energies, and full intelligence had to be devoted to the interest of his district and his country.

During all of these years I was faithful to my trust and my people appreciated it. In the last Congressional election of 2 years ago I had the good fortune to be elected with a majority of 99,000, the greatest given to any Member of this House. In the course of the years which I have spent here, I have served on the following committees: Post Office and Post Roads, Interstate and Foreign Commerce, chairman of the Committee on the Library, Insular Affairs, Expenditures in Executive Departments, War Claims and Accounts. This service has given me a very broad knowledge of the doings of our Federal Government.

I have been most grateful for this training and have tried to pay back my debt to the people by giving them efficient and intelligent service as a Member of this House. Those who have turned me down cannot condemn me for the legislation which I have introduced. I was proud back in 1938 to be the sponsor of a resolution which prohibited the sale of helium gas to Germany. Also the author of a bill to extend the period of amortization for Home Owners' Loan Corporation mortgages to 20 years and at the same time reduce the interest rate to 3½ percent. Surely, they will not attack me on the ground that I was the author of the original $50 a month minimum pay bill for members of the armed forces.

I do not believe that they can object to my bill calling for a 2-cent mail rate in the city of New York, nor will they raise their voices protesting the $500,000-appropriation bill which the President signed this very day for the purchase of talking-book machines for those unfortunate blind who cannot use the Braille system. I defy my opposition to criticize any measure which I have ever introduced into this House or my voting record. Does Mr. Madden feel chagrined at my record on home owners' loan, social security, wage and hour, old-age pensions, or any of the other measures that benefited the great majority of the people of our country? Does Mr. Madden object to that phase of my public life where I repeatedly fought the erection of a bridge from Staten Island to Bay Ridge which would have destroyed the latter section, or was he opposed to my efforts to defeat the erection of a sewage-disposal plant in Bay Ridge? Did he dislike the fact that I had the Army and Navy desist from loading live ammunition off the Bay Ridge shore and had that work moved to Jersey?

The real reason for my rejection is that while Mr. Madden allegedly is the States committeeman of the district in which I reside, he is but a mere puppet whose strings are being pulled by a little Coney Island politician, Mr. Kenneth F. Sutherland, who has visions of grandeur in the creation of a political empire in the borough of Brooklyn. It is the open boast of this amusement-park lord that he controls the body, mind, and actions of Mr. Madden, and that he has selected a new leader, Mr. Julius Hollander, in the adjoining district. Likewise, he boasts of mastery over the second assembly district in Kings County.

Because I refused to subscribe to his political tenets, and because I believe that the people, and the people alone, should decide who their officials shall be, Mr. Sutherland, together with his agent, the 85-year-old Thomas Wogan, have applied the pressure to Mr. Madden and decided that I must go. Years of faithful service to my country and to my party are to be disregarded. The lust for power and arrogance of ward heelers necessitates the removal of a man of my experience in the National Legislature and the substitution in my place of a marionette wholly unfamiliar with legislative procedure, completely lacking in experience and training, and possessing only an ability to please and to be the yes man for these political heels.

My colleagues of the House, again my thanks. For your help I am grateful, but I feel that it will be better for me to wage my fight alone. I represent an intelligent constituency and I am willing to go before the bar of my people on my record and on my reputation, for I feel that their verdict will be a just one.

Summary of Legislation Passed by Seventy-eighth Congress, Second Session

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALBEN W. BARKLEY

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, June 23 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, pursuant to the permission granted me, I present for publication in the RECORD a summary of legislation passed by the Seventy-eighth Congress, second session.

MAJOR LEGISLATION PASSED BY THE SEVENTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION, JANUARY 11–JUNE 23, 1944

The major legislation enacted by the Seventy-eighth Congress, second session, is devoted to the inseparable aims of winning the war and assuring the peace to follow.

In achieving a stable and permanent post-war economy to which our men now far from their homes may return, the Congress and the administration have worked in unity and with singleness of purpose. The first great initial steps easing the demobilization of our fighting forces have been taken in the Vocational Rehabilitation Acts of 1943 and in the Mustering-out Pay Act of 1944, and the G. I. bill of rights of 1944. These are among the most important of a series of laws with other outstanding legislation which have been passed and which will be passed to aid the veterans in their return to normal peacetime pursuits and economic security.

The domestic front has not been forgotten; laws have been passed in this session providing aids to agriculture and industry, as well as to the individual citizen. The income tax has been simplified for the vast majority of taxpayers of this Nation.

Though the job of waging war is not yet finished, the final victory is clearly ahead. But the job of securing the peace is only just begun. We have thus dedicated ourselves to a lasting peace and to an economically sound nation and world so that men of good will may in freedom create an era of greater understanding and of broader social and economic progress.

The summary is as follows:

AGRICULTURE—COMMODITY CREDIT CORPORATION

(Approved February 28, 1944. Public Law 219, 78th Cong.)

On February 28 the President approved the act of Congress continuing the Commodity Credit Corporation as an agency of the United States until June 30, 1945. The Commodity Credit Corporation had been created by Executive Order 6340 on October 16, 1933, as a lending institution for financing, carrying, and orderly marketing of agricultural products.

FARM WORKERS

(Approved February 14, 1944. Public Law 229, 78th Cong.)

Requiring 600,000 additional farm workers to meet the food requirements of the United States and the United Nations during the year it was necessary to provide for importing additional foreign workers to supplement the work of our own farmers. Accordingly Congress passed and the President signed on February 14 the joint resolution appropriating an additional $30,000,000 to that already appropriated in Public Law 45, Seventy-eighth Congress.

ARMY

Appropriation

(Approved June 28, 1944. Public Law 374, 78th Cong.)

The President approved on June 28 the War Department appropriation passed by Congress providing $49,000,000,000 for the prosecution of the war. Of this amount, $15,434,814,000 was in new appropriations and $33,000,000,000 in reappropriations.

Army Nurse Corps

(Approved June 22, 1944. Public Law 350, 78th Cong.)

On June 22 the President approved the act of Congress providing for appointment of members of the Army Nurse Corps, and certain other female persons having the qualifications necessary for such appointment, as officers in the Army of the United States. This was an aid to the performance of medical duties by the nurses serving abroad or at home in giving them recognition and official standing within the Army.

Glider personnel

(Approved July 1, 1944. Public Law 409, 78th Cong.)

The Congress passed on June 22 and the President signed on July 1 the act providing that officers, nurses, and enlisted men required to take part in regular and frequent glider flights, shall receive an increase of 50 percent of their pay not exceeding $100 per month for officers and nurses and $50 per month for enlisted men.

CIVILIAN PILOTS—THE CIVILIAN PILOT TRAINING ACT OF 1944

(Approved June 30, 1944. Public Law 391, 78th Cong.)

The Civilian Pilot Training Act of 1939 was extended for 2 years by act of Congress approved by the President on June 30. This act provided an assured reserve of experienced and trained pilots for war and peacetime needs of the Nation.

HEALTH—PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE

(Approved July 1, 1944. Public Law 410, 78th Cong.)

On June 23, Congress passed and the President approved on July 1 the act consolidating and revising the laws relating to the Public Health Service. Under the provisions of this act a more effective health service for civilians and the armed forces is achieved by consolidating under the Public Health Service (1) the office of the Surgeon General; (2) the National Institute of Health; (3) the Bureau of Medical Services; and (4) the Bureau of State Services. Reorganization of the various bureaus and divisions is authorized under this act; general powers and duties are prescribed as to research and investigations, Federal-State cooperation, hospitals, medical examinations, and medical care. The broad advances in medical research made during the war and carried out through numerous agencies, public and private, can be brought together and made of universal availability after the war in this consolidation of public agencies. The National Cancer Institute becomes a division of the Public Health Service under the provisions of this act.

LEND-LEASE AND UNITED NATIONS RELIEF AND REHABILITATION

Appropriations

(Approved June 30, 1944. Public Law, 382, 78th Cong.)

The Lend-Lease-U. N. R. R. A. Appropriation Act was passed by Congress and signed by the President on June 30. Appropriations for lend-lease and for the work of the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration totaled $3,800,000,000. The increased tempo of the war and the successful operations opening the campaign for the liberation of Europe necessitated large appropriations by this Nation as its share in the work of beginning the reestablishment of normal economic and social conditions in the occupied countries.

Lend-lease extension

(Approved May 17, 1944. Public Law 304, 78th Congress)

The operation of Lend-Lease Act universally considered to be vital to the prosecution of the war was extended for 1 year by act of Congress approved by the President on May 17.

(Approved March 28, 1944. Public Law 267, 78th Cong.)

Congress passed and the President signed on March 28 the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration Act authorizing an appropriation of $1,350,000,000 as the share of the United States in the work of the United Nations in providing aid and relief for the people of the occupied countries after retreat of the enemy and in assisting the occupied countries to effect the return of their refugees and prisoners of war and reestablish industries and agriculture. All the United Nations agreed to share in the cost of this organization and its work.

NAVY

Appropriations

(Approved June 22, 1944. Public Law 347, 78th Cong.)

The President approved on June 22 the act of Congress appropriating $27,569,798,301 for the Navy for the fiscal year 1945. Almost $5,000,000,000 is included for aviation, and authorization is made for future contracts of $3,600,000,000 to be made prior to July 1, 1945 for new aviation construction. $6,500,000,000 is provided for replacement and construction of vessels.

(Approved May 31, 1944. Public Law 322, 78th Cong.)

In anticipation of the requirements of the then impending assault on Europe, Congress passed and the President signed on May 31 the act authorizing conversion and construction of 1,000,000 tons additional of landing craft and district craft.

(Approved February 26, 1944. Public Law 238, 78th Cong.)

On February 26 the President signed the act passed by Congress giving all members of the Navy Nurse Corps entitled to relative rank the actual corresponding rank. In this way the handicap between relative and actual rank was removed for the duration of the war and 6 months thereafter.

PHILIPPINE ISLANDS

Independence

(Approved June 29, 1944. Public Law 380, 78th Cong.)

The Senate joint resolution outlining and defining the policy of Congress on the future independence of the Philippine Islands was approved by the President on June 29. The President is authorized to declare the independence of the Philippines as soon as normal constitutional processes are restored and prior to the date, July 4, 1946, previously set by law.

Rehabilitation

(Approved June 29, 1944. Public Law 381, 78th Cong.)

In order to aid in the rehabilitation of the Philippine Islands and to hasten their independence, Congress passed and the President approved on June 29 the act providing for the Filipino Rehabilitation Committee. The Committee is authorized to investigate and recommend solutions on all matters pertaining to post-war economy, trade, finance, and economic stability in the islands.

POST OFFICE—POSTAL NOTES

(Approved June 28, 1944. Public Law 370, 78th Cong.)

On June 28 the President signed the act of Congress authorizing the Post Office Department to issue and pay money orders not exceeding $10 to be known as postal notes and costing 5 cents each. The Postmaster General is authorized to decrease or increase the the fee for the service to not less than 3 cents and not more than 6 cents as may be necessary. Since 70 percent of all postal money orders issued are for sums of $10 or less, the low fee set by Congress represents a saving to the millions of persons served by the 43,000 post offices of this Nation.

PRICE CONTROL

(Approved June 30, 1944. Public Law 383, 78th Cong.)

The President on June 30 approved the act of Congress amending and extending the Price Control Act of 1942 and the Stabilization Act of 1942. These acts had been passed and had successfully operated against the national dangers of inflation. In signing this act the President stated that Congress had performed a single service and had made clear that it was the wish of all that the line against inflation should be held.

REAL ESTATE

(Approved July 1, 1944. Public Law 401, 78th Cong.)

By act of Congress passed on June 22 and approved by the President on July 1 individual purchasers of real estate by contract under the programs administered by the Resettlement Administration and Farm Security Administration, were enabled to make prepayments of any portion of the balance if the contract had been in force for 5 years. Purchasers were thus able to effect savings in interests by reducing the balance and thereby the length of time which such contracts were entitled to run with interest payments.

SOLDIERS' AND VETERANS' BENEFITS

G. I. bill of rights

(Approved June 22, 1944. Public Law 346, 78th Cong.)

The Congress passed and the President on June 22 signed the act providing aid for readjustment to civilian life of veterans of World War No. 2. This was the so-called G. I. Bill of Rights. Provision was included for up to 52 weeks of unemployment compensation at the rate of $20 per week, with adjusted compensation for self-employed veterans restoring themselves to business rather than seeking employment from others; guarantee of 50 percent of loans up to $2,000 with interest of not more than 4 percent for veterans establishing homes or businesses; $500,000,000 was appropriated for increasing veterans facilities, including hospitals, and strengthens assistance for finding employment through the United States Employment Service; for education and training individual grants are provided of $500 per year plus monthly subsistence pay of $50 for single veterans and $75 for married veterans. This act is the basic law for further appropriations designed to finance the great task of returning the members of the armed services to civilian life.

Mustering-out pay

(Approved February 3, 1944; Public Law 225, 78th Cong.)

On February 3 the President signed the act of Congress providing for mustering-out payments of $300 for persons who had performed active service outside the continental limits of the United States; $200 for persons who have performed active service for 60 days or longer within the continental limits of the United States; and $100 for persons who have performed active service for less than 60 days. These payments were in addition to other benefits.

(Approved June 30, 1944; Public Law 393, 78th Cong.)

Congress passed and on June 30 the President approved the act providing for a pay increase of $5 per month for any enlisted man entitled to wear the expert infantryman badge and $10 per month for those entitled to wear the combat infantryman badge.

Pensions

(Approved May 27, 1944; Public Law 313, 78th Cong.)

Under the act passed by Congress and signed by the President on May 27, pensions were increased for veterans suffering from permanent total non-service-connected disabilities from $40 to $50 per month, and in some cases increase was authorized to $60 per month.

(Became law April 1, 1944; Public Law 277, 78th Cong.)

On April 1 the Soldiers' Vote Act of 1944 became law. This law provided for absentee voting by members of the armed forces overseas by Federal ballot only in cases where the State ballot had been requested but not received by October 1. Controversy on the subject of the Federal ballot as it might affect State's rights had forced a compromise. The President had wired all State governors requesting information as to the extent soldiers might vote under the existing State law and whether the governors were disposed to call sessions, where necessary, to change existing law so that the soldiers might be enabled to vote in States where a change in law would be required. Answers proved to be widely divergent, half of the States were reported to be adverse to the use of the Federal ballot.

(Approved July 3, 1944. Public Law 415, 78th Cong.)

On June 22 the Congress passed and the President signed on July 3 the act amending to the Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act of 1940 by providing that personal property, income, or gross income of persons in military service shall not be subject to State or local taxes by reason of temporary residence; receipt of income, gross income; temporary location of personal property, within any such State or Territory. This act afforded to men in service relief from double taxation by State and local agencies.

TAXATION

(Approved May 29, 1944. Public Law 315, 78th Cong.)

Congress passed and on May 29 the President approved the Individual Income Tax Act of 1944 which provided for simplification of the individual income tax beginning with 1944 and established a graduated rate of withholding at the source of income so that the entire tax liability on incomes up to $5,000 would be included in the portion withheld.

(Became law February 25, 1944, Public Law 235, 78th Cong.)

The Revenue Act of 1943, which became law February 25, contains provisions for a simplified form of tax return; tax exemption for mustering-out-payments for the armed services; altered renegotiation of war contracts procedure; and a provision requiring labor unions, farm cooperatives and other non-profits organizations to file statements of financial returns with the Secretary of the Treasury.

WAR CONTRACTS—WAR CONTRACT SETTLEMENT

(Approved July 1, 1944. Public Law 395, 78th Cong.)

The War Contract Settlement Act of 1944 was passed by Congress on June 22 and approved by the President on July 1. Provision is made for setting up the Office of Contract Settlement with a director and a contract settlement advisory board composed of the Secretary of Navy, Secretary of War and heads of various other agencies to prescribe procedures, policies, standards, and principles to govern all Government agencies under this act. The director is authorized to appoint an appeal board to hear appeals from contact decisions of the various agencies. Each Government contracting agency shall establish methods for the determination of fair compensation in settlement of contracts and is authorized to settle all or any part of a contract by agreement under the contractor or by determination of the amount due on the contract. Contract settlements in excess of $50,000 are subject to review by a board of three or more members established by the contracting agency. Contractors are provided aids in adequate interim financing and partial payment of termination claims may be made or guaranteed through Federal Reserve banks or other private financial institutions. Adequate advance notice to the contractor of contract termination is here included. Upon demand by the contractor the agency concerned is required within 90 days to submit an estimate of the amount due under the terminated contract and to make a settlement of at least 90 percent within 30 days after delivery of the estimate. In cases of dissatisfaction contractors may appeal to the Appeal Board or bring suit before the Court of Claims or a United States District Court under certain limitations. The General Accounting Office is confined to determining after final settlement of a contract whether settlement payments to the war contractor have been made in accordance with the settlement and whether the records or information transmitted to it warrant a reasonable belief that the settlement was induced by fraud. If the General Accounting Office finds a reasonable belief of fraud warranted, it may so certify to the Department of Justice for investigation. Penalties for fraud are included within the provisions of this act. This act was passed after considerable revision and extensive committee hearings including all interested parties from industry and Government.

WAR POWERS

(Approved June 28, 1944. Public Law 378, 78th Cong.)

On June 28 the President approved the act of Congress extending for 1 year the President's authority to requisition property required for the defense of the United States.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALVIN E. O'KONSKI

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. O'KONSKI. Mr. Speaker, I believe it is well to let the people know what the duties and functions of a Congressman are. A Congressman is the people's agent in Washington. If for any reason any person has any problem with the Federal Goverment, these people should write their Congressman.

At the same time if these people have difficulty with State matters or local matters, such as the public-welfare departments, they should not write their Congressman because a Congressman has no authority over State or county matters.

In the 18 months that I have been in Washington, I am proud of the fact that so many people have written me regarding their problems. In the first 18 months of my term as Congressman more than 16,000 people have written me about problems pertaining to the Federal Government. This is an unusually heavy number of requests.

I am happy to report to the people of my district that out of these 16,000 people who wrote me I succeeded in solving their problems in more than 15,000 cases.

In other words, more than 15 out of every 16 people who wrote to me had their problems solved satisfactorily through my office. This is an unusually high average when we consider the nature of the problems that the people of my district wrote about.

I am happy to report further that every request that has been made of me, I worked to meet and fulfill; I am happy to report that all mail and all work, even a post card from the people back home, has received my personal attention.

Again, I invite the people of my district to write me and call on me if and whenever they have any problem which relates to the Federal Government. I have helped more than 15,000 people of my district, and I may be able to help you if you need me. Simply write Congressman ALVIN E. O'KONSKI, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

This book contains important information for members of our armed forces, their kin, and their dependents. Be sure to keep this book for future help. You will find it very handy for many years to come.

Benefits for Servicemen, Ex-Servicemen, and Their Dependents

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. JOHN LESINSKI

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. LESINSKI. Mr. Speaker, several times has it pointedly come to my attention that benefits intended by Congress for servicemen, ex-servicemen, and their dependents are frequently not received by them, mostly because of the failure of the potential beneficiaries to apply for such benefits.

Reading the technical language of all of the many laws pertaining to those serving actively in our Nation's armed forces, or to those who have so served, and to their dependents, would be very confusing. As chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, the oldest committee in Congress having jurisdiction over legislation affecting veterans and their dependents, I have been intensely interested in such legislation for many years. Nevertheless, it is very difficult for me to coordinate all such legislation in my mind. Not all of such laws are applicable to all of such persons; in fact, most of them are applicable only to certain groups, under certain conditions.

How to bring order out of this chaos so that those in each such group might be put on notice as to the rights, privileges, preferences, and benefits to which they might be eligible, without requiring them to read too much about other benefits to which they could never be entitled, has been very baffling.

The key to the solution of this maze of material has, I believe, recently been fashioned by my good friend, Millard W. Rice, the national service director for the Disabled American Veterans, now the dean among the national legislative representatives of the several major veteran organizations and undoubtedly the best informed, among all the representatives of veterans' organizations, as to veterans' affairs and veterans' benefits.

Mr. Rice has compiled a brief outline as to all such benefits, a scanning of which will speedily inform any serviceman, veteran, or his dependent as to what governmental benefits, if any, he or she might be entitled to under the circumstances indicated.

Those who read such outline should be cautioned that more detailed information concerning each such point can be obtained from the Veterans' Administration, or other governmental agencies concerned with the application of the particular laws indicated.

Active servicemen, discharged veterans, and the dependents of veterans, have the privilege of requesting needed advice and assistance from the service officers of the several congressionally chartered service organizations: the Disabled American Veterans—referred to as the D. A. V.—which is composed exclusively of American citizens who have been either wounded, gassed, injured, or disabled while serving honorably in the armed forces of the United States, or of some country allied with it, during time of war; The American Legion, composed of honorably discharged veterans of World War No. 1 and World War No. 2; the Veterans of Foreign Wars—referred to as the V. F. W.—composed solely of America's campaign-badge war, campaign and expedition veterans; and the American Red Cross. Most applicants would be wise to take advantage of the technical knowledge and experience of the service officers of such organizations.

Mr. Rice assures me that the outline prepared by him has been carefully checked by members of his staff and by the office of the legislative counsel of the Veterans' Administration to make sure of its accuracy.

I here insert the outline prepared by Mr. Rice, as follows:

OUTLINE OF BENEFITS FOR SERVICEMEN, EX-SERVICEMEN, AND THEIR DEPENDENTS

I. BENEFITS FOR PERSONS SERVING IN ARMED FORCES

1. Base pay for enlisted personnel, beginning with privates or apprentice seamen, and up through seven grades to master sergeant or chief petty officer, is from $50 to $138 per month. Base pay for commissioned personnel begins with $150 per month for second lieutenants or ensigns. All base pay of enlisted men is increased by 20 percent and of all officers by 10 percent while on sea duty or serving outside the continental United States or in Alaska. Active flying duty, including flights in gliders, or active submarine duty increases the base pay by 50 percent, and active parachutist duty by $100 per month for officers and $50 per month for enlisted men. Increased compensation of $5 or $10 per month is provided for enlisted men of the combat ground forces of the Army entitled to wear the expert infantryman badge or the combat infantryman badge. Certain other pay increases are provided for special skilled or dangerous types of service. Longevity pay is provided by adding 5 percent to the base pay for each 3 years of active or Reserve service, up to 30 years.

2. Allowances, in varying amounts, for clothing, subsistence, and quarters made to officers and, under certain conditions, to enlisted men, and mustering-out payments upon their discharge from service are not subject to income tax.

3. During World War No. 2, after June 1, 1942, the dependents of any enlisted individual, male or female, with certain exceptions, of the first to seventh grades, upon a written application therefor by the service member or by or on behalf of a dependent in class A, class B, or class B-1 will be granted a monthly family allowance. The monthly allowance for a wife alone is $50; for a child alone, $42; for one parent alone, $50; and for a brother or sister alone, $11. Additional amounts are payable for additional dependents. The monthly pay of the service member will be charged with the amount of $22 per month, and an additional amount of $5 per month if the allowance is payable to more than one class of dependents. Class A includes a wife, child, or former wife divorced; class B includes a parent, brother, or sister dependent upon the enlisted man for a substantial portion of his or her support. Class B-1 includes a parent, brother, or sister dependent upon the enlisted man for the chief portion of his or her support. In the event of death during active service the next of kin is entitled to a gratuity equal to the monthly pay of the deceased for a period of 6 months.

4. National service life insurance, obtainable without examination during first 120 days of active service, or before August 11, 1943, whichever date is later, and thereafter if found by the Veterans' Administration to be a good insurance risk (with privilege of conversion after 1 year; mandatory conversion before end of fifth-policy year), in multiples of $500, from $1,000 to $10,000, for those in active service since October 8, 1940, maturable only by death of the insured, with proviso that premiums may be waived during continuous total disability, which commenced after he was insured, and before he became 60 years of age, and which has continued for 6 consecutive months.

5. Certain protection for those in active military or naval service of the United States, and to American citizens, under certain conditions, in the active service of some country allied with it during time of war, with reference to private life insurance and property rights, and personal indebtedness, when ability to meet obligations is impaired by such service, through judicial process, under Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act of 1940, as amended. (All matters affecting real or personal property rights should be referred promptly to competent local attorneys for assistance and advice.)

6. Naturalization as an American citizen by the easy petition method as to any alien while serving in the armed forces, as well as for certain war veterans.

7. Mustering-out payments for members of the armed forces, with certain exceptions, discharged or relieved from active service under honorable conditions on or after December 7, 1941, in the amount of $100 for those who served less than 60 days, $200 for those who served 60 days or more, no part of such service being outside the continental limits of the United States or in Alaska, and $300 for those having performed active service of 60 days or more who served outside the continental limits of the United States or in Alaska.

II. MONETARY BENEFITS TO VETERANS

1. Compensation or pension for disabilities proven to have been incurred in, or aggravated by reason of, active service in the armed forces of the United States, ranging from $6 to $300 per month, depending on the nature, degree, and permanency of disability, and the time of its incurrence, which includes the 15-percent increase effective June 1, 1944, in the monthly rates for World War No. 1 and World War No. 2 veterans, and persons who served on or after September 16, 1940, where the disability was incurred under extra-hazardous conditions, and statutory awards ranging from $18.75 to $300 per month for certain disabilities, but, if single and without dependents, not more than $20 per month while being furnished hospital treatment or domiciliary care by any governmental agency.

2. Retirement benefits at three-fourths of base pay for certain Regular officers with permanent handicapping disabilities, or after a certain period for certain types of service, or/and the attainment of certain ages; and for certain emergency, provisional, probationary, and temporary officers with permanent disabilities of requisite degree, clearly shown to have been acquired in active service, in fact, in line of duty.

3. Pensions on the basis of age, degree of inability to earn a living, and/or length of service for—

(1) Civil War veterans, in the amount of $75 per month or $100 if in need of a regular attendant, and for Indian War veterans, in amounts ranging from $20 to $60 per month, or $100, if in need of an attendant, but not in excess of $50 as to those in a United States, National, or State soldiers' home on July 13, 1943, and only $20 while being furnished hospital treatment or domiciliary care by the Veterans' Administration if the veteran has no dependents. As to those admitted to such home after July 13, 1943, the amount payable is subject to the $20 limitation.

(2) Veterans of the Spanish-American War, Philippine Insurrection, and Boxer Rebellion, in amounts ranging from $12 to $75 per month, plus varying amounts if in need of a regular attendant, with total not to exceed $100, but not more than $50 monthly as to those in a United States, National, or State soldiers' home on July 13, 1943, and only $20 while being furnished hospital treatment or domiciliary care by a Government agency, if the veteran has no dependents. As to those admitted to such homes after July 13, 1943, the amount payable is subject to the $20 limitation.

4. Pension of $50 per month for veterans of the Spanish-American War, Philippine Insurrection, Boxer Rebellion, World War No. 1 or World War No. 2 with 90 days or more of service and a discharge under conditions other than dishonorable or, if less than 90 days, if discharged for disability incurred in line of duty, who suffer with permanent total disability, regardless of service connection, if not due to misconduct. This rate is increased to $60 per month if rated permanent and total and in receipt of pension for a continuous period of 10 years, or when the veteran, suffering from permanent and total disability attains the age of 65 years. (Only $8 per month is paid to men, without dependents, while being furnished hospital treatment or domiciliary care by a governmental agency.)

5. Enlisted men of the Regular Army, or of the Philippine Scouts, who have served 20 years or more and who have become permanently incapacitated for active service due to physical disability incurred in line of duty, may be retired at 75 percent of the average monthly pay received for 6 months prior to retirement. This retirement pay or so much thereof as would equal the amount of pension or compensation to which such person may be entitled, may be waived for the purpose of receiving pension or compensation.

6. Enlisted men in the Regular Navy whose service began after July 1, 1925, may, after 20 years' service, be transferred to the Fleet Reserve at one-half base pay received at time of transfer, and, after the completion of 30 years of service, are transferred to the retired list with 75 percent of the pay of their rank at date of retirement, plus all permanent additions thereto. If their service commenced on or prior to July 1, 1925, they may be transferred to the Fleet Reserve upon completion of at least 16 years' service, with one-third of base pay, and after 20 years of service or more, one-half the base pay received at time of transfer, plus all permanent additions. This pay is increased by 10 percent for all men credited with extraordinary heroism in line of duty, or whose average marks in conduct for 20 years or more shall be not less than 95 percent of the maximum. After 30 years of service they are transferred to the retired list of the Regular Navy with 75 percent of the pay of their rank at date of retirement, plus all permanent additions.

7. Enlisted men of the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps, after 30 years of service, are entitled to retirement with monthly pay at 75 percent of their last base pay. Members of the Army Nurse Corps and the Navy Nurse Corps may be retired after 30 years' service, or at the age of 50 years after 20 years' service. Temporary commissioned rank has been provided for members of the Army Nurse Corps and female dietetic personnel of the Medical Department of the Army with adjustment in their retirement pay on the basis of such commissioned service.

8. Statutory award of $10 per month is payable to all medal of honor men, age 65 years or more.

9. All monetary benefits from the Veterans' Administration are exempt from taxation, or claims of private creditors, or the United States except as to the indebted beneficiary, or overpayments or illegal payments by the Veterans' Administration, and are not liable to attachment, levy, or seizure by or under any legal or equitable process either before or after receipt by the beneficiary.

10. Adjusted-service credit up to $50, payable in cash, or, if more, an adjusted-service certificate based upon adjusted-service credit, for active World War No. 1 service in excess of 60 days, computed at the rate of $1 per day for domestic service, and $1.25 per day for overseas service, with maximum limitations, exchangeable for United States bonds bearing interest at 3 percent, redeemable at any time. In the event any allowance in the nature of adjusted compensation is hereafter authorized for World War No. 2 veterans, any benefits received by or paid for any such veteran under the so-called G. I. bill of rights will be deducted from such adjusted compensation.

11. Government life-insurance policies, as to death or total or permanent total disability in multiples of $500 up to $10,000 for insurable veterans of (1) World War No. 1 or World War No. 2, of peacetime servicemen who applied therefor prior to October 8, 1940, with lien loans permissible up to 94 percent of reserve value, at interest of 5 percent per annum.

12. Incompetent and minor beneficiaries generally receive their monetary benefits, if any, through guardians, whose accountings are periodically inspected by regional attorneys of the Veterans' Administration. However, recent legislation permits payment to the wife of an incompetent veteran having no guardian and of death benefits to a minor widow for herself and child or children.

III. MEDICAL TREATMENT AND DOMICILIARY CARE

1. Hospital treatment, or out-patient medical or dental treatment, including necessary medicines and prosthetic appliances, with institutional training in the use of such applicances, may be furnished certain persons medically determined to be in need thereof, for service-connected disabilities. Out-patient treatment may also be authorized for any nonservice-connected condition which is associated with and aggravating a service-connected disability, as adjunct treatment

2. Hospital treatment or domiciliary care for nonservice-connected disabilities under certain conditions may be furnished, when needed, for any war veteran not dishonorably discharged, or for any peacetime veteran discharged from service for disability incurred in line of duty or who is in receipt of pension for service-connected disability.

3. Transportation to, and back from, Veterans' Administration facilities, when authorized in advance, for examination, medical treatment, hospitalization, or domiciliary care.

4. Clothing may be furnished at Government expense to beneficiaries receiving hospital treatment or domiciliary care in Veterans' Administration facilities, when necessary for protection of health or for sanitary reasons and when such beneficiaries are without means and receiving less than $10 per month for their own personal use. Toilet articles, barber service, tobacco, etc., are furnished beneficiaries receiving hospitalization or domiciliary care in Veterans' Administration facilities, whose total income is less than $6 per month.

IV. MISCELLANEOUS BENEFITS FOR VETERANS

1. Vocational rehabilitation, including placement in suitable gainful employment, furnished by the Veterans' Administration for service-connected disabled veterans of World War No. 2, including persons who served in active military or naval service on or after September 16, 1940, discharged under conditions other than dishonorable, who are feasible therefor and in need thereof to overcome a service-incurred handicap, with training allowance of $80 per month, plus $10 if married, plus $5 for each additional dependent.

2. Education or training, not to exceed 1 year, at any institution of the veteran's choice, for veterans of World War No. 2, including persons who served in active military or naval service on or after September 16, 1940, discharged under conditions other than dishonorable after 90 days' service or more or for disability incurred in service in line of duty, with not to exceed 3 additional years of education or training, depending upon length of service and other conditions, with subsistence allowance while pursuing education or training of $50 per month, or $75 per month if the veteran has dependents. Tuition and all other fees and expenses, not to exceed $500 per school year, are paid by the Veterans' Administration.

3. Guaranty by the Veterans' Administration of not to exceed 50 percent of a loan or loans the aggregate amount guaranteed not to exceed $2,000 for the purchase or construction of homes, farms, and business property. Such loans may bear interest not to exceed 4 percent and are payable in 20 years. This benefit is available to World War No. 2 veterans and persons who served on or after September 16, 1940, the service requirements being the same as those for education or training.

4. Readjustment allowances of $20 per week for a period not to exceed 52 weeks for unemployed World War No. 2 veterans, including those persons who served on or after September 16, 1940, under the same service requirements as for education or training. Self-employed veterans earning less than $100 per month are eligible for readjustment allowances representing the difference between their net earnings and $100 per month.

5. A seeing-eye or guide dog trained for the aid of blind veterans may be provided blind veterans entitled to disability compensation. Also there may be provided mechanical and electronic equipment to aid them in overcoming the handicap of blindness. Blind veterans, as well as other blind individuals, are allowed to deduct $500 from adjusted gross income in determining net income under the Federal income tax law.

6. Certain preferences as to Federal civil service, as to physical and age prerequisites, examinations, ratings, appointments, retentions, and reinstatement of Federal employment are extended to qualified service-connected disabled veterans, war and campaign service veterans and the unremarried widows of such war and campaign service veterans, supplemented by extensive United States Employment Service, and Veterans' Employment Service, in every State, for all unemployed veterans, and an effective job counseling and employment placement service so as to provide the maximum of job opportunity, in the field of gainful employment. Any World War No. 2 veteran who applies therefor within 40 days after discharge, is entitled to reinstatement to the Federal position held at time of entering service, or to one of equal grade and pay, or to his previous private employment, where at all practicable for employer, enforceable by court order, if necessary.

7. Credit for all active military or naval service for Federal civil service retirement, with minor exceptions.

8. Credit for all active war service for railroad-retirement purposes.

9. Burial allowance, up to the amount of $100, may be paid as to any war veteran, discharged under conditions other than dishonorable, or in receipt of pension or compensation, as to any veteran discharged from the armed forces for disability incurred in line of duty or in receipt of pension for service-connected disability.

A United States flag to drape the casket, subsequently to be turned over to the next of kin, may be furnished as to any veteran whose death occurred after discharge from active service during any war or after serving at least one enlistment or by reason of disability incurred in line of duty. Burial in a national cemetery may be arranged as to any honorably discharged veteran or as to anyone who dies while in active service, with right of burial therein of his wife or widow, and under certain circumstances, as to his minor children or adult unmarried daughters. The expenses incident to transporting the body of one who has died while in active service, or of a veteran who has died in a Veterans' Administration facility, to the place of burial, are, within limitations, borne by the Government. Headstone or marker—stone or marble—will be furnished for the unmarked grave of any honorably discharged veteran or as to anyone who died while in the active service.

10. Various benefits, rights, and privileges are also provided as to certain veterans, their dependents, and their organizations under State laws, as per the résumé thereof, recently published by the House Committee on Pensions, entitled "State Veterans' Laws."

V. BENEFITS FOR SERVICE WOMEN

The Women's Army Auxiliary Corps which is no longer in existence, having been superseded by the Women's Army Corps, was an auxiliary component of the Army, and as such was not generally covered by laws administered by the Veterans' Administration, but its members are entitled to hospitalization and domiciliary care by the Veterans' Administration. Members of Women's Army Corps, the Women's Reserve of the Navy and Marine Corps and Women's Reserve of the Coast Guard, which are components of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard, on the basis of active duty, are eligible for veterans' benefits.

As to rights to hospitalization, domiciliary care, and burial benefits, on a parity with war veterans, under laws administered by the Veterans' Administration, the term "active military or naval service," includes active duty as a member of the Women's Army Auxiliary Corps, Women's Reserve of the Navy and Marine Corps, and the Women's Reserve of the Coast Guard. Members of the Women's Army Corps, the Women's Reserve of the Navy and Marine Corps, and Women's Reserve of the Coast Guard are also eligible for these benefits as members of components of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard on the basis of active service in World War No. 2.

VI. MONETARY BENEFITS FOR DEPENDENTS

1. Death compensation or pension, under varying conditions, to widows and minor children (also including helpless children), and dependent parents, of those deceased veterans who die in service or as the result of service-connected disabilities.

2. Death compensation, in smaller amounts, under certain conditions, to widows and minor children (also including helpless children) of those deceased veterans of World War No. 1 and World War No. 2, who, at time of death, had some service-connected disability of measurable degree, even though less than 1 percent.

3. Death pensions, under certain conditions, to widows and minor children (also including helpless children) of deceased Civil War, Spanish-American War, Philippine Insurrection, Boxer Rebellion and Indian war veterans.

Important Message To Next of Kin of Men and Women in Our Armed Forces in Case of a Death Casualty

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. O'KONSKI. Mr. Speaker, at this time when many war casualties are in the offing it might do well to inform the people of my district just what dependents and next of kin are entitled to as a result of losing a son, a daughter, a husband, or a father on the many battlefields of this world. Should any death casualty occur it should be remembered that there are due the wife, children, parents and in some cases brothers or sisters the following:

First. A 6-months gratuity payment. If there is a legal wife this is first paid to her. If there is no wife, but there is a child or children, payment is next made to them. If there is neither wife nor child, the payment is made to the parents. If there is no wife, child or parents, payment is made to brothers or sisters, and if none of these next of kin are living, payment is made to grandparents. This payment is automatically made and no papers need be signed by the serviceman for his next of kin to receive this and no dependency needs to be shown.

The amount of this payment depends on the rank in service. If the casualty is a private it is $300. If the casualty is a corporal, it is $396. If the casualty is a sergeant it is $468. All cases are slightly higher when the casualty occurs overseas. The gratuity payment is six times the monthly base pay of the man or woman in service. This payment is made in addition to the insurance or any other benefits.

Second. Monthly insurance payments. This insurance is not paid in a lump sum. It is paid on a monthly basis depending on the age of the beneficiary. The older the beneficiary, the higher is each monthly payment. On a $10,000 policy a beneficiary under 30 years of age will receive $55.51 a month for 240 months. A beneficiary over 30 years of age will get a guaranteed 120 equal installments, and if they survive beyond 120 months it is paid for life. The amount of monthly payment if the beneficiary is over 30 depends on the age of the beneficiary. Under a $10,000 policy a 50-year-old beneficiary will get $53.90 monthly. Under the same policy a 70-year-old beneficiary will get $85.10 monthly, and so forth.

No actual policy is mailed out on national service life insurance. A certificate of policy is issued in place of it and this is mailed to whomever the service man or woman indicates to receive it. Oftentimes, he indicates himself to receive it and in other cases, his wife or parents. The certificate of policy does not indicate the name of the beneficiary and the person receiving it is not necessarily the beneficiary. These certificates of policy should be kept in a safe place as they are asked for at the time insurance is settled. If they are lost, no new one is issued.

An insurance policy taken out by men and women in our armed forces can name any of the following as beneficiaries: Wife, husband, child, stepchild, illegitimate child, parents, brothers, and sisters, including those of half-blood. No one outside of this group may be named as a beneficiary. When payment is made on the insurance it is made only to the person or persons named by the service man or woman as the beneficiary.

It is well for the parents and wives or others who might be named to check with the service man or woman to be sure that these insurance papers are all in order. If any next of kin has not received a certificate of policy and is sure the service man or woman has taken it out in his name, it is well to check to see why it has not been received.

Third. A pension. This pension is paid to a widow and children. All children under 18 are eligible. Children up to 21 are eligible if they are in school up to that time. If a child marries before 18 or 21, they are not eligible for this pension. Parents who have been dependent or can show present dependency upon the deceased man or woman in service are also entitled to a pension. Parents who have been dependent upon a deceased serviceman can get a pension at the same time as his wife and children are getting a pension. The amounts of the monthly pension are as follows:

One parent, $45 per month. Two parents, $25 each. Widow but no child, $50; widow with one child, $65, with $13 for each additional child, subject to apportionment regulations; no widow but one child, $25; no widow but 2 children, $38, equally divided, with $10 for each additional child—total divided. Total pension as to widow, child, or children not to exceed $100.

Note: The fact that a widow, a child, or parent gets insurance or other death compensation benefits from the Government does not prevent them from getting a pension also and they need not figure them in when figuring income on pension application forms.

Fourth. Arrears of pay. When a casualty occurs that service man or woman who has become a casualty may have back pay coming. For instance if the casualty occurs on the 27th of the month, he had 27 days pay coming. If the casualty occurs on the 15th of the month, he had 15 days back pay coming. Then, too, when soldiers or sailors are at the front or out to sea, they may miss several pay days and all of this back pay is due the nearest heir. The nearest heir of the deceased service person should inquire about and collect this arrears of pay.

SUMMARY

Should there be a death casualty in your family, remember that there are four payments due the dependents: First, 6 months' gratuity payment; second, insurance; third, a pension; and fourth, arrears of pay. If there are any questions on these and especially for aid in filling out the necessary application forms for each benefit due, see your local veterans' service officer, or your local Red Cross chairman, or your local American Legion head. If there is any further difficulty, write to Congressman ALVIN E. O'KONSKI, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

My Labor Record

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LOUIS LUDLOW

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I think I can say, not immodestly but as a matter of fact, that labor has never had a more sincere and true friend in the Congress of the United States than I have been during my service in this body. My own experience as a poor boy, brought up in the "school of hard knocks," has given me the deepest appreciation of the dignity of labor. It has taught me the great importance of protecting civil liberties, individual rights, and free enterprise. No administration of public affairs can be successful that does not deal fairly and justly with both industry and labor.

Because of my labor record the organizations that speak for labor have always endorsed me without fail. This year they are renewing their endorsements. The Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, largest of the 21 railroad brotherhoods, led with its endorsement on April 20, when Martin H. Miller, national legislative representative of that brotherhood, wrote to me as follows:

The undersigned is advised by Mr. A. F. Whitney, president, that the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, in consideration of your labor voting record and attitude on legislation of interest to the people, has endorsed you for nomination as Representative in Congress from the Eleventh District of Indiana.

INDIANA FEDERATION OF LABOR ENDORSEMENT

The Indiana State Federation of Labor has endorsed me for reelection this year in the following letter:

INDIANA STATE FEDERATION OF LABOR,
Indianapolis, Ind.

"LOUIS LUDLOW, 843 North Meridian Street, Indianapolis. Present Congressman. No better friend of labor ever represented Indiana in the Congress of the United States."

INDIANA STATE FEDERATION OF LABOR.

Following are extracts from some speeches I have made in the House on matters affecting labor:

AGAINST SMITH-CONNALLY BILL

(In the House of Representatives, Thursday, July 8, 1943)

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I submit for printing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a letter which I have written to an esteemed constituent of mine stating the main reasons why I voted against the Smith-Connally bill and to uphold the President's veto of that measure. The letter is as follows:

JULY 10, 1943.

Mr. DWIGHT SHERBURNE,
The A. Burdsal Co.,
Indianapolis, Ind.

DEAR MR. SHERBURNE: I am glad you wrote to me in regard to my vote against the so-called Smith-Connally bill and my vote to sustain the President's veto of that measure.

You certainly are entitled to know what was in my mind when I cast those votes.

Without going into lengthy details, I will state some of my reasons.

In the first place, in all of these important matters connected with the prosecution of the war, I have felt it a duty to give much weight to the wishes of those on whom rests the responsibility of running the war. We are in a desperate conflict, that may last for years, and that certainly will test all of our resources. In such a situation, we must have leadership and unity behind that leadership. All of those responsible for running the war, the Commander in Chief, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, the Under Secretary of War, the Under Secretary of the Navy, the Chief of the War Production Board, that has to produce the materials of war, all asked that this bill be not passed, fearing it would create inharmony and slow up the war effort. We may not like our leaders, but as long as they are our leaders in the midst of a desperate war, I feel that we should go along with them unless there are the most imperative reasons to the contrary.

Then, too, I do not believe in hurting innocent people. My philosophy is to help, and not to hurt, those who are innocent and worthy. It so happens that I was in a position to have an inside view of this entire situation. I am a member of the small subcommittee of twelve on deficiency appropriations, which drafts the large appropriation measures necessary to carry on the war. Recently we had before us Donald Nelson, the Chairman of the War Production Board, and he gave us, mostly off the record, the war production picture. It was an amazing picture, far exceeding all expectation. The production has been truly marvelous. No boy on any of the fighting fronts has suffered for the implements he needs. On the contrary, implements in great abundance are piled up in warehouses and at terminal points, awaiting transportation facilities.

Mr. Nelson was unstinting in his praise of the part labor has performed in producing the implements of war needed to win the victory. In the light of his glowing testimony it seemed to me there was something cruelly unjust in slapping all organized labor—for that is what the Smith-Connally bill did—when organized labor as a whole has done such a wonderful job. It did not seem to me to be right that all well-meaning, faithful, honest, patriotic labor should be punished for the sins of one man, John L. Lewis.

I share the general indignation over the conduct of Lewis, but I think how much better it would have been and how much more conducive to the harmony and cooperation that is vitally necessary to win the war, if labor as a whole could have been praised for the part Chairman Nelson says it has done in behalf of the Nation, instead of having this blot and damper put on it by legislative action. The bill that was passed was a punitive, antilabor measure, too sweeping in scope, and it was passed because the pendulum of public sentiment, put in motion by John L. Lewis' misconduct, swung too far. I fear that in the long run the leaders who are responsible for running the war were right in their apprehension that the new law will have a depressing, disuniting, demoralizing effect on the war effort. Production is now falling off; for what reasons I do not know, but I doubt whether the men have the heart in it that they had when they were making such a magnificent record of production.

There were other impelling reasons why I opposed the bill. I did not like its southern sponsorship. Members of Congress from the low-wage section of the South are making every effort to break down the industrial system of the North and to repeal the wage-and-hour law. They want to return to cheap wages, thus giving the South industrial supremacy. I have too much regard for the fine industries of Indianapolis and Indiana and the North, and for the welfare of both our northern employers and our northern wage earners to want to play into their hands.

I might cite just one other objection to the measure which alone, in my opinion, would have justified a vote against it. That is the extent to which it goes toward the centralization of government. I am one of those who think that the Government is already mixing too much in business. I voted against the National Industrial Recovery Administration Act and many other measures which I thought tended to augment bureaucratic authority over business and industry. I think we ought to be recapturing the powers Congress has surrendered instead of augmenting those powers. When this war is over I want this country to be the same country of free enterprise it always has been and which, please God, may it always be.

Yet, no totalitarian ruler of Europe or Asia has more power over industry than this bill confers on the President of the United States. He can take over plants at will and hold them; his executive instrumentality, the War Labor Board, will write labor contracts all over the United States, and, worse still, the legislation denies any appeal to the courts. I do not want Franklin D. Roosevelt or any other President of the United States to have any such power. I will not, as long as I am a Member of the House, vote totalitarianism into the laws of the United States. It is altogether too dangerous.

The looseness with which the bill was put together in its checkered career of amendments and floor controversies, and what not, is shown by the fact that while it purports to prevent strikes it sets up a way whereby strikes may be conducted and thus legalizes strikes.

I would like for you to believe that as the representative of our people and one of the representatives of the Nation as a whole I take my job seriously. I study all angles of these important matters and try to think them out with what God has given me to think with, and I vote the verdict of my judgment and conscience. No doubt I make plenty of mistakes, but they are honest mistakes, and while you may not agree with me in specific instances, I believe you would want your Representative to go into these matters independently with an open mind and try to reach a fair and just conclusion.

Thanking you very much for your letter of inquiry.

Sincerely yours,

LOUIS LUDLOW.

REPEAL OF SMITH-CONNALLY ACT DEMANDED

(In the House of Representatives, Friday, May 5, 1944)

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, as a friend of both labor and management I rise today to urge Congress to repeal the Smith-Connally Act and to do it immediately before the pernicious effects of that act become more widespread.

The act stands indicted and convicted of two major crimes against public welfare, as follows:

1. It has cast unwarranted reflection on the masses of American labor who have accomplished the greatest war-production record of all time.

2. It is doing incalculable damage to the relations between Government and industry.

I have deep feelings on this score because as a citizen and as a representative of citizens I feel very keenly my obligation to do everything I possibly can to protect civil liberties and free enterprise and no matter what may come I am going to be true to that obligation.

I think it is now pretty clear that the zeal of labor baiters overreached itself when it forced the passage of the Smith-Connally Act.

LABOR'S GREAT PART IN WINNING THE WAR

(In the House of Representatives, Thursday, March 16, 1944)

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I have received a very significant letter from Donald M. Nelson, Chairman of the War Production Board, which gives a graphic description of the part labor has performed in producing the implements that are necessary to win the war.

This letter from the man on whom rests the tremendous responsibility of seeing that the war production program is carried out satisfactorily ought, I think, to bring about two distinct and positive results.

1. It should immediately put an end for all time to the unthinkable, un-American, totalitarian proposal to draft labor in the United States.

2. It should be helpful in bring about the repeal of the Smith-Connally Act and the wholly uncalled for and unwarranted injustice which labor as a whole has had to suffer by the passage of that act. I believe Mr. Nelson's letter demonstrates two facts conclusively—

First. That the proponents of the Austin-Wadsworth universal national conscription bill, otherwise known as the National Service Act and the labor draft, or forced labor, bill do not have a leg to stand on.

Second. That the passage of the Smith-Connally bill was a cruel, stinging insult to honest patriotic labor which has made a record of production beyond all comparison.

I have promptly referred Chairman Nelson's letter to the committees that are considering the Austin-Wadsworth bill and the bills that have been introduced to repeal the Smith-Connally Act and I shall follow up and see that the letter receives the attention its importance merits.

A few days ago I wrote to Chairman Nelson asking him to give me the true picture of labor's performance in producing the implements of war. If it was a bad picture, I wanted to know it and if, on the other hand, it was a pleasing picture, I wanted the facts so that, in justice to labor, I might present the truth to the House and to the country. In his reply Mr. Nelson says it is his firm belief that American labor has done a truly splendid job in war production and that labor has met the heavy responsibilities with real patriotism and determination. Then he proceeds to present statistics of production that are staggering in their immensity.

But I think the amazing story of labor's part in the war effort is best told in Mr. Nelson's own words. His letter to me is as follows:

WAR PRODUCTION BOARD,
Washington, D. C., March 8, 1944.

Hon. LOUIS LUDLOW,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. LUDLOW: Thank you for telling me about your plan to make an address on labor's part in the production of the implements of war. I hope that the following material will be of some use to you:

You ask my opinion as to the part labor has performed in war production. Taking the production program as a whole, and considering all of the difficulties which have been encountered, it is my firm belief that American labor has done a truly splendid job in war production. Labor and management alike have of course been under great pressure during the last 2 years and have had to work at very high tension. Mistakes have been made, naturally, and the strain which is normal at a time like this has from time to time brought about unfortunate misunderstandings and disagreements; yet I do not see how anyone can look at the great volume of production that has been achieved since Pearl Harbor without realizing that labor has met the heavy responsibilities with real patriotism and determination. The important thing is that the job is being done.

The production of arms and munitions since Pearl Harbor has very substantially exceeded even the most optimistic expectations any of us had before this country got into the war. In 1941, for example, when what then appeared to be a very large defense program was under way this country produced munitions valued at less than $8,000,000,000. In 1942 that figure was raised to $31,238,000,000, while in 1943 it stood at more than $57,622,000,000. I do not believe that anyone in the fall of 1941 anticipated that such prodigious increases — properly balanced among the hundreds of different categories—could be achieved so rapidly.

The following figures showing increases made in different categories of production may be of interest to you:

From July 1940 through December 1941 we produced 23,200 military airplanes. In 1942 we produced 47,900. In 1943 we produced 85,900.

From July 1940 through December 1941 we turned out 4,300 tanks. In 1942 we made 23,900. In 1943 we made 29,500.

From July 1940 through December 1941 this country manufactured 126,100 machine guns. In 1942 we made 666,800. In 1943 we made 830,400.

From July 1940 through December 1941 we made 370,500 rifles and carbines. In 1942 we made 1,552,000. In 1943 we made 5,624,000.

In small-arms ammunition 1,200,000,000 rounds were produced from July 1940 through December 1941. In 1942 there were produced 9,800,000,000 rounds. In 1943 production was 19,700,000,000 rounds.

We had produced one piece of self-propelled artillery by the end of 1941. In 1942, 8,300 were produced and in 1943 production was 22,200.

By the end of 1941, 270,000 displacement tons of naval ships had been constructed. In 1942 this figure was raised to 865,000 displacement tons, and the displacement tonnage constructed in 1943 stood at 2,618,000.

I trust that this material will be of some use to you in your speech.

Sincerely yours,

DONALD M. NELSON,
Chairman.

FOR FOOD SUBSIDIES

(In the House of Representatives, Tuesday, November 23, 1943)

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, in voting on this bill today to put an absolute ban on subsidies I am restricted to a choice between two evils. It is a condition and not a theory that confronts us. We must vote either for subsidies or for inflation. There is no other choice. If subsidies go out, inflation comes in. There is not a particle of doubt about that. Members who vote to pass this bill to outlaw subsidies may honestly say that they are not in favor of inflation but that is exactly what they will be voting for.

I hate subsidies. No Member who votes today to put a ban on subsidies hates them any more than I do, but there is one thing I hate more than subsidies and that is inflation that would crush the heart out of every person in this country who is on a fixed income and that is precisely the sort of unspeakable disaster we will be inviting if this bill becomes a law.

I believe that under the peculiar circumstances the country is now facing the enactment of this bill would be a major blow to the poor and middle classes and a calamity to the entire Nation for the reason that it would immediately start an upward spiral of prices, the end of which no man can foresee. I would not think of voting for a continuance of limited subsidies if I were not positively certain that by discarding subsidies we shall get something infinitely worse.

The administration has a definite plan to keep prices at the present level, or lower. I am not going to vote to destroy that plan. I am not going to cast a vote that would break down that dam and open the way to galloping, run-away inflation and an orgy of rising prices. Representing a great consuming district I feel that I would be recreant to the trust vested in me if I did not do everything I possibly can to keep the essential items of the cost of living within the means of the masses of the people.

FOR NATIONAL YOUTH ADMINISTRATION TRAINING PROGRAM

(In the House of Representatives, Monday, June 28, 1943)

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, in a short time Congress will determine the fate of the National Youth Administration. It will determine whether or not that Administration during the fiscal year 1944 shall train approximately 600,000 youths in industrial pursuits and thus make them effective contributors to our nation's war economy and useful and efficient members of society. I hope that Congress will say to the National Youth Administration: "You may continue your training program. You are doing a good work."

To the extent that I have a voice and influence I am exercising the same in behalf of a continuation of the N. Y. A. training program.

I say this notwithstanding there is no one in Congress, I believe, who has a greater desire than I have to see that economy in government is effected and that in every possible instance duplication and overlapping are eliminated. It has been argued that since there are half a dozen agencies in the field of vocational training the National Youth Administration might well be abolished and the trainees taken over under other agencies, but I find on very thorough investigation that there are two sound arguments against that proposal. One is that the N. Y. A. training program is a going program that is proceeding at full speed in turning out efficient trainees and constantly infiltrating them into plants all over the country where they are vitally needed and to disrupt that program now would slow up the war effort and do much harm. The other argument in favor of continuing the N. Y. A. training program is that there is no other program just like it. It enters into a different field and taps a potential source of timber for skilled manpower and womanpower that is not reached by any other training agency. I find that while it embraces persons of all races within the scope of its activities it is in many instances the only agency through which Negroes can obtain the technical and vocational training which they desire and to which they are entitled.

If the National Youth Administration training program is to be saved it must be saved now. The situation requires immediate action. The bill is now pending in the Senate and will be voted on soon. I have had several conferences with the junior Senator from New York, in charge of the bill, and he tells me the vote will be very close. I take this occasion to suggest to Members of the House that you do not depend on letters, or even on the telephone, but that you go in person to the other end of the Capitol and see the Senators from your States and urge them to support the bill to continue the National Youth Administration's training program.

FOR COMMUNITY FACILITIES

(In the House of Representatives, Wednesday, March 8, 1944)

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, child delinquency has reached a peak never before realized nor dreamed of in this country. It has reached the all-time high. In its early stages the rapid growth of child delinquency created amazement and now it has become frightening.

All of us are voting without hesitation and without stint the billions to win the war so as to make civilization safe and secure in the ages to come. While we are doing that I think it is altogether right and proper that we should vote a few millions to cure instead of to kill. We are the guardians of posterity and we have a responsibility to see that the children of America do not suffer spiritual blight and decadence as a result of conditions which it is within our power to remedy.

We will be very derelict in duty if in the face of mounting juvenile crime which already has passed all known bounds we destroy the child-care projects of the community-facilities program by withdrawing the means necessary to enable them to carry them on. We could do no greater disservice to our children who will be our leaders of tomorrow and who need to be strong and reliant to cope with the momentous problems of posterity.

The appropriation of $127,500,000 carried in this bill for community facilities is not as much, in my opinion, as might wisely and judiciously be spent in providing the facilities on which the welfare of the Nation so much depends, but it will cover existing commitments and will provide $18,194,000 of new money to meet contingencies that will arise. The Budget estimate was $150,000,000, and we had definite assurance that if we granted that amount it would close the books and the agency would not return for more money. I voted in committee for the appropriation of the full Budget estimate, which would consume the balance of the authorization of $500,000,000. No one wants to see appropriations cut more than I do, but I do not want to cut them at the expense of our children.

FOR REPEAL OF POLL TAX

Mr. Speaker, by my voice and my votes I have done everything I possibly could to bring about the repeal of the iniquitous poll tax. It is unthinkable to me that our men who are fighting and dying on the battle fronts to preserve our free institutions should be denied the freedom of voting for candidates of their choice to manage those institutions.

FOR BETTER PAY FOR POSTAL EMPLOYEES

I have consistently voted for better pay for postal employees who were for so long a time the "forgotten men" in our Federal pay scale. I am now heartily supporting H. R. 4501, which proposes to give to postal employees the overtime pay that is so general in defense employment and other branches of the Government.

FOR FAIR EMPLOYMENT PRACTICE COMMITTEE

(In the House of Representatives, Friday, May 26, 1944)

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, on the whole, the evidence that has come to me through our committee hearings and from all other directions convinces me that the Fair Employment Practice Committee is doing an outstanding job in promoting national unity, in improving and sustaining the morale of the tenth or more of our people who comprise the minority groups, and in opening up reserves of manpower so much needed to win the war that would otherwise have remained untapped. Sincerely believing, as I do, that the Committee on Fair Employment Practice is a vital war agency, I hope that the amendment striking it down will not be adopted and that it will be implemented with the funds carried in this bill, which are the minimum to enable it to carry on its work.

LABOR'S APPROVAL OF MY WORK IN CONGRESS

Labor, the organ of the 21 railroad brotherhoods, printed the following article on the front page of its issue of March 25, 1944:

Some time ago Congressman LOUIS LUDLOW, Democrat, Indiana, leading member of the House Appropriations Committee, called on Donald M. Nelson, Director of the War Production Board, for a "true picture of labor's performance in producing the implements of war."

Before entering Congress LUDLOW was a Washington newspaper correspondent—and a good one. Carrying his training as a newspaperman over to his law-making duties, when he wants to know about a subject he goes to the fountain-head for his facts.

He addressed his inquiry to Nelson because Nelson is in a position to know more about what labor has done than probably any other official.

"If the labor picture is bad, I want to know it," LUDLOW wrote Nelson. "If, on the other hand, it is a pleasing picture, I want the facts so that, in justice to labor, I may present the truth to the House and to the country."

SPLENDID JOB DONE

Here is what Nelson replied:

"It is my firm belief that American labor has done a truly splendid job in war production. I do not see how anyone can look at the great volume of production that has been achieved since Pearl Harbor without realizing that labor has met its heavy responsibilities with real patriotism and determination. The important thing is that the job is being done.

"The production of arms and munitions since Pearl Harbor has substantially exceeded even the most optimistic expectations any of us had before this country got into war."

Nelson backed this statement with figures showing output of all categories of war materials "that is staggering in its immensity."

In presenting Nelson's letter to the House, LUDLOW declared it "should bring about two distinct and positive results":

AN END TO LABOR DRAFT

"1. It should immediately put an end for all time to the unthinkable, un-American, totalitarian proposal to draft labor in the United States.

"2. It should be helpful in bringing about the repeal of the Smith-Connally Act and the wholly uncalled-for and unwarranted injustice which labor as a whole has had to suffer by the passage of that act."

LUDLOW declared that Nelson has left advocates of the Austin-Wadsworth labor conscription proposal "without a leg to stand on." He added that the passage of the Smith-Connally Act "was a cruel, stinging insult to honest, patriotic labor, which has made a record of production beyond all comparison."

The "amazing story" recited by Nelson, LUDLOW contended, should result in the immediate repeal of the Smith-Connally Act and the refusal of Congress to give any consideration to the Austin-Wadsworth measure.

A Message for Wives and Infants of Men in Our Armed Forces

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALVIN E. O'KONSKI

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. O'KONSKI. Mr. Speaker, free maternity care for wives of men in military and naval service and free medical and nursing care for their babies is now provided through the Wisconsin State Board of Health as a result of money given to this State by Congress. This Congress appropriated $5,600,000 for that purpose in the spring of 1943 and they appropriated an additional $18,600,000 for the same purpose October 1, 1943.

Under this plan, a wife of a man who is in the lower four ranks of the service may receive prenatal care from a qualified doctor at her home or at the doctor's office. These lower four ranks include in the Army, private, private first class, corporal, and sergeant; in the Navy it includes men in the seventh to the fourth pay grade.

At childbirth, whether the wife of the man in service stays at home or goes to a hospital, she and her baby can receive free medical and nursing care. Complete maternity care is provided, including a physical examination 6 weeks after the baby is born. Besides all this, the baby is entitled to free medical care during the first year of life.

IMPORTANT TO FOLLOW RULES

Wives of servicemen should acquaint themselves thoroughly with the rules set down for this free medical attention. The rules set down in Wisconsin are clearly stated and must be met in order to receive this care and service. The wife should see a doctor at the first sign of pregnancy. She should then ask the doctor for an application form to apply for this free service. If the doctor does not have these blanks, write to Bureau of Maternal and Child Health, Wisconsin State Board of Health, Madison, Wis., and ask them to rush a blank to you. Fill out the application blank carefully. Be sure to include your husband's serial number. The wife fills in part 1 of the blank. Ask your doctor to fill in part 2 at once and rush to Madison, Wis., for approval.

APPLY EARLY

It is important that wives apply for this in early pregnancy. The State board of health will not approve payment of the doctor, hospital, or any service before the application is made out. It is important that the application be made at the first sign of pregnancy. In case of an emergency be sure that the doctor makes application for you within 48 hours after the service is rendered. If the application is not made within 48 hours, no bills for medical or hospital service will be paid. It is most important, therefore, to get the application filled out and sent in at the earliest possible time. See your doctor at the first sign of pregnancy and apply for this free service.

Wives can see their regular family doctor for this. It is not necessary to go to a special or certain doctor to get this aid. It is most important that wives of servicemen remember that no payment for any such service will be made prior to the filing of an application. In other words, no application—no aid. It is tragic to be refused this aid simply because no application was made beforehand.

CHARGES PAID THROUGH STATE BOARD OF HEALTH

The charges for this medical, hospital, and surgical attention are paid through the Bureau of Maternal and Child Health, Wisconsin State Board of Health, Madison, Wis. The charges are paid directly to the hospital and the doctor and the nurse. No money is given to the wife. No serviceman's wife need worry about proper medical care, infant care, or hospital care in the event of a birth if she acquaints herself with this free service and makes proper application before the event rather than after. Pregnant wives can get prenatal care as well.

WHAT SERVICE WIVES CAN EXPECT

Complete medical service, for maternity patients during the prenatal period, childbirth, and 6 weeks thereafter—including care of complications, operations, postpartum examination—and to the newborn infant.

Health supervision for infants, usually provided in childbirth conferences.

Nursing care, in the home, through the local health department including bedside nursing care as necessary—for the mother, before, during, and after childbirth and for the baby during the first year of life.

Hospital care, in wards or at war rates, for maternity patients and infants. The funds cannot be used in part payment for more expensive hospital accommodations. A minimum stay of 10 days in the hospital after childbirth is arranged if possible. Hospital care may be authorized in any hospitals where the maternity and pediatric services have been approved by the State health agency.

Remember that this service is available only to the wives of the men who are in the four lower ranks of service. It does not apply to the wives of commissioned officers or to the wives of the higher ranking noncommissioned officers.

CONGRESS SET UP THIS SERVICE

The money for this service is available by acts of Congress passed this year, 1943. Your present Congress has appropriated a total of $24,200,000 for this service. I would like to see servicemen's wives learn about this help and make use of it. Should any questions arise ask your doctor or nurse about it and if they do not have the information write your Congressman about it—address your letter: Congressman ALVIN E. O'KONSKI, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Subversive Attempts To Control Elections

REMARKS

HON. JOHN E. RANKIN

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER] seemed to be very much irritated because the Dies House Committee on Un-American Activities had caught Sidney Hillman, the Russian-born head of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee, reaching across State lines, and laying himself liable to prosecution in the State courts by attempting to control State primaries through corrupt methods.

He has stepped into a trap now. When he reaches across into the State of Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Maine, California, or Oregon, to corrupt the electorate in the congressional and senatorial primaries, he subjects himself to prosecution under State laws, and he is likely to find himself inspecting the inside of one of our jails or penitentiaries.

He is trying to build himself up into a dictator—a Hitler or a Mussolini—by shaking down the unprotected laborers in the C. I. O. who cannot help themselves—calling strikes if they do not pay—and using that money to try to get political control of this country. What does he care how many of our boys die for the want of weapons or for the lack of medicines as a result of those strikes, so long as he gets the funds to carry on his subversive campaign?

It is openly charged that he is sending money into Mississippi now, into the district which I represent, to try to control our white primaries, and that a certain Negro organization in New York is doing the same thing. They want to force Negro equality onto the white people of the South.

Already the honest, patriotic, white citizens of the district, whose sons are now fighting the battles of this Nation abroad, to preserve the very institutions Sidney Hillman and his gang would destroy, are watching out for anyone handling these corrupt funds.

Every sheriff, every constable, every marshal, and every law-abiding citizen, as well as the F. B. I., is on the lookout. Anyone caught handling these filthy funds will be dealt with accordingly.

The patriotic people of the district I represent are not for sale; and they are not willing to sell the blood of their sons who are in this war, as they would be doing if they took this filthy money in exchange for their votes or to pay for their aid or support.

What the Disabled Veteran Should Know

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALVIN E. O'KONSKI

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. O'KONSKI. Mr. Speaker, if you are discharged or separated from the Army with a disability due to service, you may be entitled to disability benefits, including a pension.

THE VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION

As you probably know, benefits and pensions for veterans are the responsibility of the Veterans' Administration. It is this Government agency that will handle your claims, will decide the amount of the pension, and will handle all details of this and other benefits to which you and your dependents may be entitled. You should always write to the Veterans' Administration direct and not to the War Department about these matters. Veterans of Wisconsin should do business with Veterans' Administration, Wood, Wis.

FILING YOUR CLAIM

If you are being discharged because of a disability, you will be advised of your right to file a claim for pension and, if you wish, assisted in making application for this benefit before you leave the Army.

The proper form for making application for disability pension is V. A. 526. You can make a claim on this form at any time after discharge or release from active duty. Copies can be obtained at any Army installation, from any Red Cross office, or from any office of the Veterans' Administration. At any of these places you can obtain whatever help you need in filling out the form.

Even though you sign a statement, at the time of your discharge, saying that you do not desire to file application for pension, this will not prevent you from filing a claim at any later date.

Officers released because of disability and not entitled to retirement pay, have the right to file a claim for disability pension and have their rights to this benefit determined by the Veterans' Administration.

HANDLING YOUR CLAIM

It is not necessary to hire a lawyer to secure benefits, and you are advised not to do so. Nevertheless, it is your right to employ legal assistance if you want to. Fees for legal services on pension claims are limited by law.

You may consult your local chapter of Red Cross, the nearest office of the Veterans' Administration, or other organizations approved by the Veterans' Administration for advice and aid in connection with your claim for benefits. This will be furnished to you free.

YOUR "C" NUMBER

The first claim filed by a veteran is assigned a claim number. This is commonly referred to as a "C" number. It never changes. All later claims will come under this "C" number regardless of when the disability arises. The Veterans' Administration thus maintains a continuous record in one file. Further claims should never be submitted as if they were original proceedings, but all should bear the first "C" number assigned. To save time and trouble in handling your papers, keep a record of your "C" number just as you should do with your Army serial number.

VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION MAKES FINAL DECISION—NOT THE ARMY

Your Army medical board makes a report on your disability, but the final decision as to pension or other benefits rests with the Veterans' Administration. Even though an Army medical board had decided against you, you have the privilege of filing a claim directly with the Veterans' Administration if you disagree and believe that you are entitled to disability benefits.

No soldier needs to be reminded that an undeserving claim wastes the time of officials and delays the rights of other men. But do not hesitate to make application when you believe that your claim is fair and proper.

PENSIONS BASED ON DEGREE OF DISABILITY

Pensions are based upon the percentage of disability and run from 10 percent to 100 percent in multiples of 10. For instance, a veteran with 10 percent disability will receive a monthly sum equal to 10 percent of that granted for total disability. In addition, there are special rates and allowances for specific injuries and more seriously disabling conditions. No additional disability pension is payable for dependents.

PENSIONS BASED ON PERMANENT AND TOTAL DISABILITY

Should a veteran of this war become disabled to a degree where he cannot become gainfully employed, he is entitled to a pension although this is not in any way related to his service. This pension amounts to $50 per month.

HOSPITAL TREATMENT, MEDICAL SERVICE, VETERANS' HOMES, AND SO FORTH

If you should ever need further hospital care for a disability incurred in line of duty in the service, it will be provided upon request to the Veterans' Administration. You will be given proper hospitalization and free transportation to the appropriate hospital. Your own ability to pay has no bearing on this service.

If you need medical service or dental care not requiring hospitalization, this too will be provided. This service includes medicine, appliances, bridgework, and so forth, but, of course, the condition must have been caused or aggravated in line of duty by your military service.

Any veteran who is so disabled as to be unable to earn a living, and is without adequate means of support may apply for admission to one of the numerous Veterans' Homes located throughout the country.

FREE TRAINING FOR A NEW JOB

If your service-connected disability prevents you from working at your old job, you can probably be taught a new occupation in which your disability will not hinder you. This teaching is called vocational training and it is enabling thousands of veterans to overcome physical handicaps, to adjust themselves to civil life, and to regain their earning power. You may even be trained to return to your old job in spite of your disability.

While getting this special training you may receive compensation in addition to your pension and there are added allotments for dependents. Expenses for tuition, books, supplies, and equipment are paid by the Government.

In the various offices of the Veterans' Administration there are advisers who will aid and guide you, who will prepare a program to fit your needs, and make the necessary arrangements for your training. Never hesitate to ask their advice.

PENSIONS FOR DEPENDENTS

Where death occurs, after discharge, from a disability due to service, the widow, children, and dependent parents may make a claim for pension. The Veterans' Administration naturally requires proper proof of relationship with such claims. This again emphasizes the wisdom of keeping your records, including birth and marriage certificates, all together and in a safe place where they can always be found.

PENSIONS ARE SAFEGUARDED

Pension payments to you or to your beneficiaries are not assignable and are exempt from taxation—including income tax—attachment, levy, or seizure, either before or after receipt. These provisions, of course, do not apply to property purchased with these payments.

EMERGENCY RELIEF

Should you need emergency assistance between the time of your discharge and the time when your case can be adjudicated by the Veterans' Administration, it may be obtained through your local chapter of the Red Cross. Assistance may be by grant or by loan, depending upon apparent ability to repay and is made for such needs as shelter, food, clothing, and fuel, and for help with securing benefits to which you or your family may be entitled. Application for such assistance should be made through the local chapter of Red Cross. If there is need for assistance previous to your discharge, you should consult the Red Cross field director at your station.

If veterans have any questions about these aids, see your Red Cross, veterans' service officer, or local American Legion head. If you have any further questions or need any more help, write to Congressman ALVIN E. O'KONSKI, House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

VETERAN HAS RIGHT TO APPEAL DISABILITY RATING

In quite a number of cases the first disability rating handed down by the Veterans' Administration is too low. In this case the veteran has the right to appeal the decision, but this appeal must be made within 1 year. This is important. If the appeal is not filed within 1 year, the veteran loses his right to appeal.

If for any reason any veteran has just cause for complaint regarding the disability rating, it is advisable that he appeal at once. In appealing this decision it is wise to get a doctor's statement that he believes that the disability rating given is too low. It is wise also to get a letter from the head of your American Legion and from your Red Cross chairman or county veterans' service officer that the rating is too low.

Send these letters together with your appeal blank filled out completely to Congressman ALVIN E. O'KONSKI, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C. I will be very glad to contact the Veterans' Administration and appeal the case for you.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, one of the truly great jobs of this war has been done by Lt. Gen. Brehon Somervell and the Army Service Forces. The Army and Navy Journal has paid fine tribute to General Somervell which I desire to include as an extension of my remarks in order that it may be brought to the attention of all Members of Congress and made part of the permanent RECORD. The article follows:

GENERAL SOMERVELL AND THE ARMY SERVICE FORCES

Back of the combat invasion troops boring their way through Nazi defenses in Europe is the biggest supply job of all history—the task of designing, procurement, manufacture, storage, transportation over land and sea, and distribution of the myriads of weapons and items of supplies to fighting men thousands of miles away when they need it and where they need it.

Heading the Army Service Forces in the planning and performance of this gigantic feat is Lt. Gen. Brehon Somervell, an Army engineer whose creed can be summed up in one word—"results."

Since his graduation from the United States Military Academy in 1914 General Somervell has been known throughout the service as an officer whose mind and energies are focused in one direction—to get results on the task to which he is assigned. Today, in the direction of this biggest of jobs, he still believes in that single purpose and single aim and cautions all under his command to adhere to it regardless of side issues of expediency or in spite of public or private criticism of their motives, capacity, or even integrity.

This concentration on results has ofttimes brought him criticism, but it also has brought recognition from those who know the whole story. During recent hearings on the gigantic War Department appropriations, Representative STARNES of Alabama, speaking to General Somervell in committee meeting, said: "It was an important date in American history when General Marshall called you to Washington for service. His choice for the highly important and stupendous task was a happy one for America and for freemen everywhere. When this war is over and we understand the problems with which we have been confronted in the light of history, I think your contribution and that of the Army Service Forces will constitute the greatest saga of World War No. 2."

In his administration of personnel under him, General Somervell gives the widest latitude of authority and expects from them an exercise of initiative and no hesitation about making decisions. He feels that everyone in his command must strive to solve the problems of supply and not to be hide-bound or prejudiced in this approach.

"No one in the A. S. F.," he recently told his personnel, "is going to get hung for taking action; but inaction cannot and will not be tolerated."

The same watchword is his guiding star in his efforts to keep civilian production at top speed. He has spoken out both against management and employers who spend too much time playing golf or planning for post-war civilian production, as well as against labor's production halting strikes. "If we lay down our tools for a single minute," the general says, "it may be too late for victory when we pick them up again."

General Somervell has no patience with anything which does not contribute to the war effort. Addressing the National Association of Manufacturers recently, he discussed post-war planning:

"Until our big job is finished, that other job must remain in second place. Let's not scatter our energies. Let's not devote to millinery the time and energy we should be giving to steel helmets. Let's think of camouflage, not cosmetics. Let's not do too much dreaming about sports roadsters until we have all the jeeps we need."

"I don't know how we are going to solve this problem. I do know that it must be solved. I do know that manpower still is being employed in beauty shops and perfume factories and poolrooms and bowling alleys. There's been a lot of moaning recently over the fact that some 15,000 night-club entertainers have been thrown out of employment by the operation of a new tax law. Well, there are plenty of jobs for them in your plants or on the railroads and steamships that are carrying the guns and ammunition to our fighting men.

"Let's put these crooners to work at something useful. Our men are dying in Burma and in the jungles of the southwest Pacific. They're dying in Italy and in the air over Germany. There's too much sorrow among the families of our fighting men to waste any tears on a master of ceremonies out of a soft job. If we have to close the night clubs, I say let's lock them up, and the poolrooms and bowling alleys with them, and let's do without perfume and jewelry, if that will help get the war over sooner."

The general carries out the same line of reasoning in his own military organization. He believes thoroughly in the efficiency of the new War Department organization which set up the Army Service Forces along with the Army Ground Forces and the Army Air Forces, but whether or not this is the type of organization which should continue permanently after the war he is not ready to say. Whether the arms and services shall retain their individual identities in the permanent post-war set-up, or whether they shall be amalgamated in a permanent air-ground-supply organization, he has not yet determined. Those are matters for further study; right now his time and energies are being devoted to the problem at hand—win the war.

This singleness of purpose has won results as is now being evidenced on the beaches from Normandy to the Southwest Pacific and China.

The results, too, show sharply in some of the larger accomplishments of the Army Service Forces during 1943:

Procured $23,200,000,000 of supplies and equipment;

Shipped 23,500,000 tons of supplies and equipment to theaters of operations overseas;

Carried overseas 1,870,000 troops and other passengers;

Sent overseas 764,000,000 pieces of mail and 2,200,000 sacks of parcels;

Moved 15,000,000 men within continental United States;

Completed the training of more than 2,000 service units;

Took care of 3,850,000 patients in our hospitals;

Inducted 2,430,000 men into the Army;

Handled 1,800,000 overseas radio messages;

Recruited 61,000 WAC's;

Supplied the troops with $81,000,000 of merchandise through our Army Exchange Service;

Handled 5,000 general courts martial;

Procured 25,000 officers over and above the product of O. C. S.;

Did $2,400,000,000 of construction;

Guarded more than 175,000 prisoners of war and worked tens of thousands of them;

Did $500,000,000 of maintenance and repair work;

Conducted 1,350,000 religious services for the troops;

Had 17,500 pieces of real estate under lease on which we were paying an annual rental of $53,000,000;

Obligated $45,700,000,000 and disbursed $49,900,000,000;

Paid $1,476,000,000 in 3,000,000 family allowance accounts;

Took over and ran the railroads in a period of national peril;

Distributed 1,000,000 textbooks to the armed services and enrolled more than 12,000 students a month in correspondence courses.

Congressional Expenditures

OF

HON. JOHN TABER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, the following is a statement of the total amount which will come directly out of the Treasury in one way or another as a result of the bills that have been passed so far in the second session of the Seventy-eighth Congress. These figures include, in addition to direct appropriations, permanent appropriations, contract authorizations, and reappropriation of funds which, without this action, would remain in the Treasury.

The following table shows a breakdown of the amounts made available by bills for each department in the last three sessions of Congress:

Table I

Title	77th Cong., 2d sess.	78th Cong., 1st sess.	78th Cong., 2d sess.
Agriculture	$837,868,110.00	$967,442,616.00	$730,352,070.00
District of Columbia	63,017,368.00	70,301,292.00	75,439,278.00

Lend-Lease, United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation and Foreign Economic Administration		6,273,629,000.00	3,920,320,000.00
Farm labor, 1944		26,100,000.00	31,350,200.00
Emergency maternity and infant care, 1944			6,700,000.00
Relief Works Project Administration	282,584,000.00
Fourth supplemental national deficiency	12,556,672,474.00
Fifth supplemental national deficiency	32,762,737,900.00
Sixth supplemental national deficiency	19,146,197,010.18
Seventh supplemental national deficiency	1,692,574,740.00
First supplemental national deficiency	1,903,939,210.00
Maritime insurance	210,000,000.00
China loan	500,000,000.00
District of Columbia housing	32,500,000.00
Education	9,500,000.00
Navy bill, H. R. 7419, passed July 22, 1942	974,634,000.00
Urgent deficiency		7,246,700.00
Urgent deficiency		143,430,591.56
Total	150,603,038,867.48	138,328,225,323.41	114,949,312,643.78

The expenditures during the fiscal year 1944 will total approximately $93,300,000,000, an increase over last year of approximately $15,000,000,000. The excess of expenditures over receipts this year will be approximately $52,000,000,000, or $4,000,000,000 less than last year. The public debt during the fiscal year will have increased $140,790,000,000 to approximately $195,000,000,000 to $200,000,000,000, depending upon the sales of Government bonds during the balance of the month.

Current expenditures are running at a rate of about $8,500,000,000 a month. The increased taxes during the year are reducing the deficit at the end of the year to a point below the deficit last year. The total appropriations for the year run $114,949,312,643.74. In addition to that there are undoubtedly obligated but unexpended balances for the Army of upward of $50,000,000,000 and for the Navy of upward of $15,000,000,000, so that the total amount available to spend for the Government without any additional supplemental appropriations will be at least $170,000,000,000. This, of course, cannot all be expended.

Perhaps the expenditures for military purposes in the fiscal year 1945 will run $92,000,000,000 or $93,000,000,000. Perhaps the expenditures for other purposes will run $6,500,000,000, so that the total expenditures for the next fiscal year will run in the neighborhood of $98,000,000,000 or $99,000,000,000.

The revenues will run nearly $50,000,000,000, leaving at least $48,000,000,000 to add to the debt, which will be very close to the $250,000,000,000 at the end of the fiscal year 1945 unless the end of the war shall earlier stop a considerable portion of our expenditures.

The following is a break-down of the appropriations of this session into regular, permanent, reappropriations, contract authorizations, and special funds for each department of the Government:

Some question may be raised as to the inclusion of the reappropriations in figuring the total of our appropriations, but if we did not have them, the money would not be spent. Therefore, I can see no escape from the inclusion of these reappropriations to determine the amount that Congress has made available.

The increasing number of Republicans in the House has forced a closer scrutiny of all appropriations and undoubtedly has been responsible for the submission by the Budget of more conservative estimates of the needs of all the agencies of the Government, and has contributed very largely to the courage which has permitted the Appropriations Committee to make some cuts in the appropriations. A further increase in the Republican representation in the House will contribute more in proportion to the salvation of our taxpayers and I am looking forward to the day when we can be of much greater service in cutting down the cost of Government.

Aircraft Development

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN TABER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, just a few days ago the Ames Laboratory at Moffett Field, Calif., was dedicated.

This marks the culmination of the effort that was made by the Republican Members of the Congress and particularly the gentleman from California [Mr. ANDERSON] to provide additional experimental facilities for the development of aircraft.

Back in June 1939 we had no designs of fighting airplanes suitable for construction in the Army, and few in the Navy. Of all the funds provided in the bill that was passed in June 1939 for the construction of airplanes, there were no designs ready to build any.

Republican Members of the House headed by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. POWERS] attempted at that time to add $9,000,000 to the appropriations bill for the experimental development of new and better designs of aircraft so that we might be in a position to build airplanes. This was voted down by the Roosevelt administration supporters, only to have it appear again after England and Germany declared war and it became manifest to the Roosevelt administration that it was necessary to have some designs upon which to build airplanes and so about November 1, 1939, the money became available which the Republicans had tried to make available earlier in the year, but which the Roosevelt forces were able to defeat.

These funds were for aircraft development not only at Moffett Field but at Langley Field, Va. By the failure of the Roosevelt forces to vote the funds for experimentation the development of the Flying Fortress and our fighting planes was delayed by nearly 6 months. It was my privilege to serve upon the Navy Appropriations Subcommittee for 10 years and the Army Appropriations Subcommittee for 4 years and I have served upon the Deficiency Subcommittee for 12 years. During all of that time it has been necessary for the Congress to take the lead for providing for the development of airplanes and other experimental efforts, both in ships and tanks and guns and everything else. The Roosevelt administration has not been forward looking in this connection, but it has always waited for the Congress to take the lead in keeping our Army, our Navy, and our Air Force up to date.

I feel that these facts should be brought out and that we should have them in front of us so that the people may realize whose responsibility it was for our failure to have designs of planes which were up to date and ready to use when the world became engaged in this terrible war.

Benefits to Veterans of World War No. 2 in G. I. Bill of Rights

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALVIN E. O'KONSKI

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. O'KONSKI. Mr. Speaker, veterans of this war now can do these things with Government help:

They can buy or repair a home, buy and stock up a farm, start a new business, get a high-school or college education, draw special unemployment benefits if unable to find work, be assured of free and adequate hospitalization.

Benefits extend to men and women of the armed services who have other than dishonorable discharges and who have served 90 days since September 15, 1940, or less than 90 days if they have service-connected disabilities.

If is important to know exactly what the Government now offers, what the terms, the conditions, the opportunities are in each field.

FIRST, TAKE THE OPPORTUNITY FOR HOME BUYING OR FOR BUYING A FARM

A qualified veteran will be able to get the Veterans' Administration to arrange for a Government-guaranteed loan for buying or building a home or for making repairs, alterations, and improvements on a home. Such loans also may be obtained by a veteran to pay off back taxes or delinquent debts on homes. The Government will guarantee 50 percent of the loan up to $2,000 and will pay the first year's interest on the part of the loan that it guarantees. Thus, a veteran can borrow up to $4,000, with the Government standing behind half of it.

These loans can be made by a bank, loan association, or any other lending agency, including an individual or friend of the veteran. If you are a veteran who obtains such a loan, you would have to satisfy the lender as to collateral on your share. But, in the case of buying a home, the home could be used as collateral. Interest on these loans cannot exceed 4 percent, and they must be repaid in full within 20 years.

In addition, the Government will guarantee fully a secondary loan up to 20 percent of the cost of the property. But the total amount guaranteed by the Government in both loans cannot exceed $2,000. This provision makes it possible for veterans to get cash for original down payments on homes. Interest on such secondary loans can run up to 5 percent. Veterans have until 2 years after the war or 2 years after their discharge—whichever is later—to take advantage of the loan opportunities.

Loans on the same basis are available for veterans who want to buy farms. Money from the loans may be used to purchase land, buildings, livestock, machinery, or other equipment or for making repairs and improvements. But if you are a veteran and want to buy a farm, you must show that you know something about farming and are likely to make a success of the undertaking.

SUPPOSE A VETERAN WANTS TO SET UP HIS OWN BUSINESS

Here the procedure and conditions for getting loans are about the same as those for buying homes or farms. The money may be used to buy an established business or land, buildings, supplies, equipment, machinery, and so forth. Secondary loans also are available for down payments. But if you are getting a loan for this purpose, the Veterans' Administration will want to know something about your background and experience in this business. In other words, you will have to show that there is a reasonable likelihood that you will make a success of it. Even so, it is expected that many veterans will want to start their own business and will be helped.

IF IT IS A MATTER OF EDUCATION OR TRAINING

When a veteran qualifies for a college, school, or training course, the Government will pay up to $500 a year to cover tuition, laboratory fees, cost of books, and so forth. The student also will get $50 a month living allowance, plus $25 a month if he has a wife or other dependents. He may choose his school, but he must keep up with the work or he will be dropped.

If a veteran was under 25 when he entered the service he may return to school even though his education was not interrupted. That is, he may have left school and been working when he entered service. But anyone who was 25 or over when he went into service must show, in order to qualify, that his education was impeded, delayed, interrupted, or interfered with. However, any veteran who desires a refresher or retraining course may take such a course for 1 year.

A veteran who qualifies for college or other schooling will be able to remain at Government expense for 1 year. Then, if he qualifies for further education, he can remain for the length of time, up to a total of 4 years, that he served between September 15, 1940, and the end of the war. He has until 2 years after his discharge or after the war ends to return to school. This Government-paid education program stops 7 years after the war ends.

NEXT, AS TO UNEMPLOYMENT BENEFITS

Ex-service men and women will be able to claim unemployment benefits of $20 a week for up to 52 weeks if they cannot find jobs. They will be entitled to 4 weeks of unemployment benefits for each month of service, plus additional time allowance for the first 90 days of service. But they are supposed to register with a public employment agency, such as the United States Employment Service, and accept suitable work if offered. Furthermore, they will be disqualified from unemployment benefits if they give up suitable jobs without reason, are fired for misconduct, or, in certain cases, go out on strike. Unemployment benefits will be available to a veteran until 2 years after his discharge or 2 years after the war, whichever is later.

Cash benefits also are provided for self-employed veterans who make less than $100 a month. They can have the Government make up the difference between their net earnings and $100 a month. Like the unemployment payment, this benefit is allowed up to 52 weeks according to length of service.

If veterans have any questions about these aids, see your Red Cross, veteran service officer, or local American Legion head. If you have any further questions or need any more help, write to Congressman ALVIN E. O'KONSKI, House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

Senate Resolution 114

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. CHARLES M. LaFOLLETTE

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. LaFOLLETTE. Mr. Speaker, under the general leave to extend remarks granted upon the unanimous-consent request made by the majority leader on June 23, I desire to extend my remarks to include a speech in support of Senate Resolution 114, which I delivered in Laramie, Wyo., on August 18, 1943:

I know that it is my purpose in participating with other Members of the Congress of the United States during the summer in a program to present to the people of America the significance of Senate Resolution 114 to limit my discussion to that resolution; the particular significance of its language; the nature of its purposes and the propriety and portent of the resolution in light of the pertinent provisions of the Constitution of the United States.

Therefore, it goes without saying that I definitely believe that the future safety and well-being of our country demands our participation with other world powers in an international order with power and authority equivalent to that stated in Senate Resolution 114. I believe that we must extend the juridical order as developed largely out of eighteenth-century philosophy and thinking as the system best calculated to insure individual freedom to man under law, to the world as a whole, in which the component parts of that world shall participate. I believe that the development in thinking which requires the extension of this order over the world is but an inevitable development of the desires of mankind to conquer his own selfishnesses, his own prejudices, and his own hates in order that mankind may occupy the earth in peace and develop its resources intelligently for the benefit of all people who are willing to do a day's work with their hands or their heads, for their share of the good things of the earth. I do not believe that it is the purpose of society to treat the incompetent, the drones, and the lazy equally with the competent, the industrious, the frugal and the prudent, either in this Nation or in any other nations. But I do think it is the duty of society in this Nation and in the world to develop a society of greater equality of opportunity than the world has ever seen to date, in which the competent, the industrious, the frugal, and the people of good will may have an equal opportunity to participate in those material things of the world which the peoples of the various parts of the world deem necessary to their happiness. From this it follows that I do not advocate, nor do I think the American people contemplate, a world W. P. A., nor do I think that that thought is relevant to the issues which are before the American people. As a matter of fact, if the people of the United States, through their elected representatives, are permitted a full opportunity to participate in shaping the peace which is to come and the world order which is to come, it is my conviction that they will support such a peace and such an order which will afford to the peoples of the world the opportunities to develop into competent, industrious, frugal people by their own efforts and consistent with the dignity of man, and that they want nothing else. It is my belief that Senate

Resolution 114 affords this opportunity for the people's representatives to develop such a peace and such a world order, from which I conclude that those who seriously advocate a world W. P. A. are missing the temper of the people, and likewise that those who do not seriously urge such a world order are professing to see the fear of the same in any international world order solely for the purpose of drawing a red herring across the path of an enlightened international development.

It goes without saying that I do not believe it is necessary to further discuss in America the necessity for participation by America in the organization advocated by Senate Resolution 114; and I shall not take my time or yours to advocate the international point of view, or condemn any other, believing as I do, that a substantial majority of the people of the United States recognize the necessity for a new world order and America's participation therein. I do believe, and I have found by my own personal observation that what the people want now is the development of a specific policy as an initial step to the further necessary one of the development of the machinery by which that American policy shall be carried out. But, if there are yet those who believe that after this war America should again attempt a policy of immunizing itself from the rest of the world, then, I point out that now, 25 years after that war, the world is engulfed in another war today; we have not been able and could not avoid being drawn into it. I do not, and I shall not, question the patriotism or the sincerity of those who, during that 25-year interim, in absolute good faith, because they believed that America's best interest lay that way, advocated and supported a policy of immunization. I simply point out that pragmatically we are now in another war, that policy did not prevent our being in another war, from which I would conclude as a person of common sense that a continuation of such a policy, particularly in the light of the newly developed methods of transportation by air which have further shortened the world's distances, that a continuation of that policy will not give us peace; it will not avoid the terrible waste and extravagance and horrors and tragedies of war, from which we must conclude, as thinking people, that we must adopt a specific policy because it is only by developing intelligently an opposite policy that we have any hope of obtaining peace and avoiding war.

Senate Resolution 114, which was presented to the Senate by Senators BALL, BURTON, HATCH, and HILL in March of this year, is designed primarily to declare a foreign policy for the United States based upon the advice of the Senate of the United States which, in my opinion, is entirely consistent with not only the language, but the spirit of the constitutional provisions which declare the duties of the President and of the Senate in the development of an American foreign policy. It is my positive opinion that under the Constitution, the Senate of the United States must not only participate in the formation of an American foreign policy, but that the language of the instrument definitely indicates that it should initiate the policy, or certainly it must participate in the initiation of the policy. In taking this view, I realize that I am taking a position which is opposite to that advanced recently by an officer of our State Department. Nevertheless, the language used in the American Constitution was the development of long and serious debate by scholarly men who, above all things, knew the significance of language. Understanding of this fact gives the background for the reasoning which I am about to advance.

The first clause of the second grammatical paragraph of section 2 of article II of the Constitution, referring to the Executive power and authorities, reads as follows:

"He shall have the power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur."

The extremely significant word in this section is the word "advice." Advice is defined as "a recommendation regarding a decision or course of conduct." In other words, when ordinary people use the word "advice" in its ordinary significance, we use it not in the sense of ratifying an accomplished fact, but we use it for the purpose of defining a situation where one person goes to another for the purpose of discussing a course of action or a decesion to be made in the future in order that the person consulted before the fact is accomplished may state his position or his recommendation for the purpose of guiding the person who came to him with reference to the course to be pursued. Or, again, if I am about to make a decision and I go for advice, I contemplate that I will receive the benefit of the thinking of the person whom I consult. It is true that I may disregard the thinking and the conclusions of the person consulted, but having consulted that person, if I choose to disregard his thinking and embark upon a different course, I do so with full knowledge that my decision is contrary to that of the person consulted. Therefore, from the use of the word "advice" in this part of our Constitution, it is clear to me that in the question of the execution of treaties or the entering into of agreements with other nations, our Constitution makers contemplated that the Chief Executive should first consult the Senate of the United States or that the Senate of the United States should first take a position with reference to foreign questions so that its advice and its position would be stated before the Executive and the people of the country prior to the time that agreements with foreign nations were entered into.

From this it follows that, in my opinion, the four Senators who joined in this resolution have evidenced the greatest statesmanship which has been produced by any Members of the United States Senate in my time. I am convinced that it is the purpose of this resolution to avoid the tragic disunity between the Executive and the Senate which followed the last war. I am convinced that it is the purpose of this resolution to obtain a prestatement by the Senate of the United States of America's foreign policy, if and when, the resolution is adopted, for the benefit not only of the President of the United States, not only for the people of the United States, but for the governing bodies of the nations of the world. The resolution sets out the minimum requirements of an intelligent American foreign policy.

And again I state to you, from a deep conviction, that the American people are ready for a discussion of this question. I am convinced that the man in the armed services is desirous of a discussion of this question in order that his sacrifices may be given some purpose and some hope for something better in the future. I think it is the essence of democracy that a full discussion of this policy must be had now; and in that respect I am afraid I differ with those who, lacking confidence in the people, would deviously start upon a policy of indirection, frustrate the desires of a people to form a decision and thereby create disunity which inevitably arises from uncertainty and the lack of forthrightness.

A construction of the word "consent" and an understanding of the implications of the word "treaties" as used in this section of the Constitution lend credence to my construction thereof. However, since I have dealt with that in another speech upon this resolution, I shall not extend this talk any further to repeat that part of my other discussion of this question.

Returning now to Senate Resolution 114, we find that in effect it treats with two classes of international agreements: The first three sections, which I have likewise discussed in another speech upon this subject, treat with the questions which are imminently arising now, during the progress of the war, but questions which also are of necessity of a temporary nature and should not necessarily enter into long-range planning for the future development of a world order.

Sections 4 and 5 of the resolution would have the Senate advise the Executive and the Nation that as a matter of policy, the United Nations and our Government as a member thereof, should form an organization with "specific and limited authorities" to do two things: first, to establish procedures and machinery for peaceful settlement of disputes and disagreements between nations; second, to provide for the establishment and maintenance of a United Nations military force and to suppress by immediate use of such force any future attempt at military aggression by any nation. Of necessity, an organization of the United Nations for such purposes contemplates an organization for permanent purposes. In effect, it is but an extension of the juridical order which has been developed largely by democratic nations for the administration of their national affairs, as the order best calculated to insure peace and order in the world. It is certainly proper also to observe as Waldo Frank has pointed out in his Chart for Rough Waters, as Christopher Dawson has pointed out in his recent contribution to the development of Catholic philosophy, and as Judge Wilkins of the United States District Court for the Northern District of Ohio has pointed out in a relatively recent article in the Notre Dame Lawyer that this concept which we call democracy has its fundamental basis in the philosophy of the Judo-Christian religion.

Now what are the fundamental bases of this order which we have enjoyed as a nation for so many years that we sometimes fail to understand its elements or its functions? Fundamentally it involves a delegation of sovereignty by the people to certain governmental bodies of the right to initiate policies; to others, the right to execute policies; to courts, the right to decide policies; and to a law enforcement agency, the right to enforce the decisions primarily of the courts or also of the Executive under certain specific cases or with the consent and approval of the courts.

When section 4 of the resolution speaks of procedures and machinery for peaceful settlements of disputes, it must have in mind the establishment of courts to settle those disputes. In section five of the resolution, which speaks of a military force of this world juridical order, it speaks of an organization to which the decision of the court can be referred, or to which the findings of a world council that nations are refusing to bring their disputes to the court can be referred for enforcement by an enforcement agency. The theory behind these two provisions is one which requires the people of America to delegate of their sovereignty, certain powers to this court and to this police force for the purpose of extending into world affairs the order under which we have developed as a nation in national affairs.

Before we become unduly frightened by the extension of this sovereignty to a world order, it seems to me that we should again re-examine certain fundamental concepts of sovereignty which lie in all Christian and democratic thinking and which, in turn, are expressed in certain amendments to our Constitution. It is the essence of Christian and Democratic thinking that each individual soul on this earth is more important than any State or society. It is our belief that all sovereignty is vested originally in the individual; it is out of the individual that governments arise and governments arise purely by the delegation of groups of individuals of certain of their inherent sovereign rights to duly constituted bodies, in order that an orderly society may be created out of the cumulated sovereignties so granted. The thought here presented is not complicated. We live under the effects of this thinking every day of our life in this country, but we have been so accustomed to living under the effects of our philosophy that we have lost sight of the truths which are inherent in it.

Let us begin with the understanding that all sovereignty is in me. This is an immutable truth; it existed prior to the adoption of the ninth and tenth amendments to the Constitution of the United States. These amendments simply declare it in simple and tremendously clear language. The language cannot be improved upon, and therefore should be quoted verbatim. The ninth amendment reads as follows:

"The enumeration in the Constitution of certain rights shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people."

The significant language is this: "retained by the people." Now you do not retain what you do not own originally, and all that this amendment, which is part of the Bill of Rights, does is to declare very simply that which I have been attempting to declare in too many words. Sovereignty is in the people and the ninth amendment to the Constitution says that they retain all of it which they do not grant by the written provisions of the Constitution.

Again, amendment ten expresses the same thought in the following language:

"The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectfully, or to the people."

Again, the delegates to our Constitutional Convention who understood this basic philosophy and who insisted that the things which we call the Bill of Rights should be set out in writing, recognized, nevertheless, all through that instrument that sovereignty was vested in the people; that they retained what they did not give; and that they reserved that which they did not give. Let us examine a few examples of the application of this rule.

I shall use the examples of my own State of Indiana, but I believe that they will be found applicable to people of every State in the Union who have adopted a form of government by which they submit to township, county, State, and National Government of sovereignty. Here is what we have done with our sovereignty to date, as a people. First, for the simple necessities of my life, I grant to township officers certain administrative power; to the trustees, certain legislative power; to the advisory board, I grant the power to set up my local school system; I grant to justices of the peace, judicial power; and to their constables, the police power necessary to enforce their orders. I next find that within the area in which I move as an individual normally, there are more complicated problems than those which can be dealt with by my immediate township, so I grant higher power to county officers. They handle the question of county roads; they give me an enlarged school system; they give me courts having jurisdiction over my freedom of action, over my life and over my property of greater value than the jurisdiction which I wish to grant to the justices of the peace. I grant to the sheriffs of those courts the powers to enforce their orders. And again I find that within certain borders, I live in a State; that in order for me to live in an orderly condition in that area, it is necessary for me to give further of my sovereignty to a Governor of that State, to administer and execute the laws of a legislature of that State; and I extend to that legislature, under certain limitations, the right to legislate and create laws under which I shall live, usually to that legislature I give legislative power over the affairs of my township and my county; and I create a supreme court of that State to make decisions between myself and all residents of that State, notwithstanding the fact that they do not live within the township or the county in which I live. Finally, as a result of the courage and the foresight of the citizens of the Thirteen Colonies, there was created an entirely new concept of government—a United States of America. And, I live under that concept of government whereby again I have granted, in the interest of order and of peace and of my greater opportunity for developing and sharing this country, powers to a legislative body known as a Congress; to an Executive, designated as a President, and to a court known as a Supreme Court, and to each of these national divisions of my Government, particularly to the legislative and the judicial, I grant further elements of my sovereignty along with all other citizens of this country in order that I may be governed in that larger sphere of my endeavor.

Now, there are those who will tell you that by the creation of the Constitution of the United States I have limited forever my power to grant any further part of my sovereignty to any other governmental group. The men who say that do not understand the concept of the dignity of the individual nor of the Judeo-Christian philosophy out of which the concept of sovereignty of the individual arises, nor do they understand the implications of amendments 9 and 10 to the Constitution of the United States, which recognized that all sovereignty is in me as an individual and that I have retained all sovereignty which I have not granted and from that which I have retained, I can give further of my individual sovereignty to a now higher degree of government if it is my decision so to do. And there is no limitation upon my power to grant that sovereignty unless it be the limitation which exists in section 2 of article II of the Constitution, which defines the treaty-making power vested in the Executive with the advice and consent of the Senate when two-thirds of the Senators present shall concur. At the most, this section of the Constitution is not a limitation upon my right to delegate further of my sovereignty in conjunction with the rest of the people of this country to a higher degree of government, because amendments 9 and 10 reserve that sovereignty in me and thereby they reserve it to the mass of the American people. I think, however, that it is probably true that under this article of the Constitution to which I subscribe as a citizen, I have delegated to the Executive and to the Senate the power to work out the mechanics, through the instrument of treaties, by which I shall grant any further sovereignty.

With those who advance such a theory I am not prepared to enter into a dispute, but I am positively of the opinion that the people of this country can enter into an organization of United Nations "for the purpose of establishing procedure and machinery for peaceful settlement of disputes and disagreements between nations" and for the purpose of "providing for assembly and maintenance of a United Nations police force and to suppress by immediate use of such force any future attempt at military aggression by any nation" without the necessity of any further amendments to our Constitution. I say this because it must be obvious that if amendments 9 and 10 specifically reserve all sovereignty to me which I have not otherwise granted, then the limitation of the control which the Constitution of the United States places over my reserved sovereignty is found only in section 2 of article II which, at best, limits the method and means by which I may further extend my sovereignty. Therefore I say to you that if, in their enlightened desire to participate with the peoples of other countries, the American people determine to establish a new and higher concept of government, having certain limited powers as set out in sections 4 and 5 of Senate Resolution 114, they have it within their power to do so. The individuals of America have it within their power to do so and it is their duty and their obligation to urge the adoption of this resolution immediately in the Senate of the United States so that they may declare, not only to the people of the other nations of the world, but to the President of the United States and the Members of the Senate, that it is their desire to further extend their sovereignty to a higher degree of government as the only means of advancing man's hope to find his destiny on this earth, which is the peaceful pursuit of happiness under the freedom which only exists under laws in a juridical order created by the philosophy of democracy and founded on the revelation of man's destiny which God gave to him through the philosophy of the Judeo-Christian religions.

And finally, one thing more should be said about the question of the power of the people under our Constitution and under their reservation of their sovereignty which I have discussed—to raise their share or proportion of the military police force contemplated by section 5 of the resolution. Clause 12 of section 8 of article 1 of the Constitution, defining the powers of the Congress of the United States, enumerates, among other powers, the following: "To raise and support armies, but no appropriation of money to that use shall be for a longer term than 2 years."

The authority given is to raise and support armies. Since amendments 9 and 10 reserve all sovereignty not granted by the Constitution, to the people, then it follows, I think, that the armies which the Congress is to raise and to support are those which the people direct it to support and for the purpose which the people direct under their reservation of sovereignty. Again, since relation with foreign countries under our Constitution, which the people have already created, can only be entered into by treaties, and since a government of the United Nations would be a relationship with other countries, I am of the opinion that section 2 of article 2, which limits the manner in which these treaties can be entered into, must be complied with in setting up the agreements with other nations under which we grant, as a people, our reserved sovereignty to the higher degree of government. But once this decision has been made, then I think it follows that it would be the duty of the Congress of the United States, under its obligation to raise and support armies, to raise and support our proportion of the membership and the cost of maintenance of this United Nations military force, because the provision with reference to the raising and supporting of armies clearly contemplates such armies as we, the people of the United States, exercising our retained and reserved right of sovereignty, shall see fit to authorize, assemble, and maintain.

I realize that the proposal here made has a tremendous impact upon a people who have observed a Europe which, for years has been in constant turmoil; I realize that the bald and bold annunciation of the steps necessary to establish a world juridical order, of necessity, has a shocking effect upon the people who for years, through no fault of their own, have developed their country in security because of geographical advantages and quasi international understandings, of which they had no knowledge; but I am convinced that mankind will destroy himself or reduce himself to the condition of an animal if he does not devise some method of living together under law with all of the peoples who inhabit the surface of the earth. If there is any purpose in our living as individuals, it is for the purpose of advancing the progress of mankind toward a goal which will permit it to develop the greatest degree of dignity. If we are brought into the world for that purpose, if we have convictions as to the method of affecting that purpose, then we have no right to live unless we have the moral courage to follow as unerringly as it is possible for us to do, the course which we have laid down before us. Our Lord did not engage in an idle gesture when He taught us to pray "Thy kingdom come, on earth as it is in Heaven." The development on earth of a "kingdom as it is in Heaven" cannot be brought about by the miraculous intervention of an all-seeing God who will thrust His wisdom upon man. The fundamental teaching of all Christian religions, whether understood or not, is based upon the theory that man exercises free will; he may follow the course which leads to decency, to honesty, to justice, to charity, and to brotherly love; or, he may reject it as visionary, as foolish, or as against his own temporary selfish interests; but we must remember that on earth man was made not only in the image of God, but man was made to imitate God; that God has no eyes to see with except man's eyes; that He has no voice to speak with except man's voice; that He has no hands to do with except man's hands; and if we understand this and believe it, we, as a people, must take the step which, to us, is opposite to all of our traditions, we must take the step along the road toward which all Christian thinking points. If we fail to do so, let us specifically declare that we do not believe in the brotherhood of man and let us cease to pray, "Thy kingdom come, on earth as it is in Heaven," lest we be eternally damned by our own hypocrisy.

One of Oklahoma's War Heroes Not Getting Square Deal

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JED JOHNSON
OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I am sure that all Members of the House were deeply impressed with the beautiful and fitting remarks just made on the floor of the House by the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN] in connection with the untimely death of one of Alabama's young war heroes, Lt. Leroy Sugg.

Of special interest to those of us who have known Capt. Pervis E. Youree, of Walters, Okla., another war hero, is the fact that Captain Youree was pilot on the same plane with Congressman SPARKMAN's late young friend, who has given his life for liberty's cause, and that the last letter he wrote was in behalf of Captain Youree. Friends of Captain Youree join in offering our sympathy to the bereaved loved ones and friends of this gallant young man who did almost the impossible in helping Captain Youree bring the disabled ship back from enemy territory without the loss of life.

May I say in this connection that all who know Captain Youree are also proud of him and his fine record. Under the leave granted me, I am including herewith his citations, as follows:

HEADQUARTERS, EIGHTH AIR FORCE,
May 6, 1943.

GENERAL ORDER NO. 56

[Extract]

IV. Under the provisions of Army Regulations 60—45, August 8, 1932, as amended, and pursuant to authority contained in section I, circular 36, headquarters, E. T. O. U. S. A., April 5, 1943, the Distinguished Flying Cross is awarded to the following-named officers and enlisted men for extraordinary achievement, as set forth in citations in each instance. These individuals have previously earned the Air Medal and Three Oak Leaf Clusters for wear therewith:

Pervis E. Youree, O-442322, captain, Three Hundred and Sixth Bombardment Group (H), Army Air Forces, United States Army. For extraordinary achievement while serving as pilot of a B-17 airplane on a bombing mission over Germany, April 17, 1943. During the bombing run, enemy fighter planes attacked in unusually large numbers, completely disabling two engines and partly disabling a third engine. Displaying outstanding courage and devotion to duty, Captain Youree by skillfully maneuvering his badly damaged airplane successfully bombed the target. On the return journey, when the airplane began to lose altitude, Captain Youree ordered all movable equipment to be thrown out and the crew to take their crash-landing positions. His only thought being the safety of his crew and airplane, Captain Youree kept his plane in flight until a safe landing was made at a base in England. The courage and skill displayed by Captain Youree on this occasion reflect the highest credit upon himself and the armed forces of the United States.

I am grieved and chagrined to advise Members of the House that something far worse than death has happened to the co-pilot of the ship referred to by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN]. That is, it is worse than death if the decision of the Army stands to give Captain Youree a dishonorable discharge and based, I regret to say, on a flimsy charge. The charge is nothing involving moral turpitude, but because Captain Youree flew in close formation with a commercial airliner, while a pilot trainer recently near Ardmore, Okla., for a period of time ranging from 1½ minutes to 3 or 4 minutes. The Army evidently has decided to make an example of the captain, a thing that will disgrace him and his family for life, despite his great combat record.

I have taken this matter up with War Department officials, also with the President of the United States, and under the leave granted me, I am including herewith a letter I wrote to the President on the subject. It follows:

Hon. FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT,
President of the United States,
The White House.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: When I saw you at the White House on Wednesday last, we discussed, you will recall, the case of Capt. Pervis E. Youree, a 24-year-old hero in the Army Air Forces.

You will recall that I told you that I have known Captain Youree and his fine parents all of their lives, that the captain was born and reared in my old home town of Walters, Okla. Immediately after the war started, this young man enlisted, was commissioned on March 16, 1942, served on 25 bombing missions over Germany, received the Distinguished Flying Cross and a cluster, and the Air Medal and three clusters for extraordinary achievement and gallantry. The citation by Major General Eaker said that when under attack by an unusually large number of German planes, Captain Youree's only thought was the safety of his crew and airplane. He managed to fly the B-17 bomber back to England, where he made a safe landing in such a manner as to reflect the highest credit upon himself and the armed forces of the United States.

At Ardmore, Okla., where he is serving as a flight instructor, Captain Youree flew for a short distance in the proximity of a commercial air liner, was subsequently court-martialed and sentenced to a dishonorable discharge. His explanation was—and it was disregarded entirely—that he had executed the left turn to fly parallel to the air liner to avoid a crash, and after a short distance peeled off to the left, thus insuring the safety of the air liner and his own plane. No one was killed, nor injured, no property damaged, and this is the only instance in the entire military record of Captain Youree in which he has received any disciplinary action or criticism.

I realize, of course, as much as anyone the necessity for maintaining safety regulations and discipline in the armed forces. I have a very deep feeling, however, that this is not a fitting reward nor an appropriate conclusion to the career of a man who has such an outstanding record of patriotism and willingness to sacrifice himself, both for his country and the welfare of those he piloted. His whole record is one that cries out for more just treatment than has been accorded through the cold ritualistic processes of military law.

I am firmly of the opinion that this gallant young man should not be sent up as a "burnt offering" to teach a lesson to others who may themselves be far more culpable than is he. It occurs to me also, Mr. President, that a less hardened and a more humane attitude than has been displayed in this instance would do far more to maintain the morale and high fighting spirit of the men of the armed forces.

I recall that another great President under the strain of war found it more humane to revoke the death sentence of a simple sentry who had fallen asleep on his post. Thus he taught the lesson that death itself could never have taught.

Knowing this boy as I do, and having absolute confidence in his sincerity and judgment, I feel that he would shudder far less at a death sentence than one erasing forever the good name and outstanding achievements he has accomplished at so much sacrifice.

Therefore, I earnestly hope that in your great capacity as Commander in Chief of all the armed forces, that you will reward this man's gallantry and self-sacrifice by extending to him the leniency that has been extended by the War Department to others who have never smelled the smoke and fire of battle, nor risked their own lives in combat over enemy territory. Every action of this man's career, and even the record of the case itself, cries out for a much less cruel and unusual punishment.

Very sincerely yours,

JED JOHNSON.

I feel that Members of Congress will be interested also in reading a copy of a letter to the President written by Wylma Youree Crain, sister of Captain Youree, whose husband is now in England or on the beachhead of France, and who has another brother in action in northern Italy. Her letter follows:

JUNE 5, 1944.

The PRESIDENT,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I write you in regard to my brother, Capt. Pervis E. Youree, of the Army Air Corps, recently court-martialed at Ardmore, Okla., and facing a dishonorable discharge, subject to your decision, as a result of a near collision with a Braniff Airliner in early April.

The details of this matter have been given to you personally by Representative JED JOHNSON, of Oklahoma, and no doubt further information has reached you from Oklahoma State executives and friends of Captain Youree.

Since November 1941 I have been an employee of the National War Agencies here and I know no details of this matter. It is my opinion from what facts I have, however, and the opinion of everyone with whom I have spoken, that the action taken is unjust and entirely too severe. The fact that Captain Youree has been placed before the public eye as an "example" for the entire United States Army is unwarranted. Time magazine termed his court martial an "exception"; this is prejudicial, for many similar cases resulting in the loss of several lives have been practically unnoticed.

This unfortunate incident must not mean the ruination of an experienced flyer who has risked his life many times in active combat with the United States Eighth Air Force in England. He has shown by many meritorious achievements willingness to give his life for our country. This one unintentional and unpremediated incident does not warrant his bearing the stigma of a dishonorable discharge for the rest of his life.

As his sister, I know Captain Youree would not purposely endanger the life of anyone. I have never known him to lie about anything and I firmly believe that his statements at the court martial are true. It is my understanding that he was in formation with the Braniff plane only long enough to veer clear without crashing both planes.

The statements I have made, I believe, reflect not only my personal interest as his sister; I think it is the opinion of the general public from articles appearing in Time magazine, Pathfinder magazine, and newspapers both in our home State of Oklahoma and throughout the country, that the sentence imposed is unjust, especially in view of Captain Youree's splendid combat record during 13 months of active duty overseas.

I know my brother is anxious to remain in the service. His brother in Italy, my husband in England, and the entire family are anxious that he be allowed to do so.

For myself, the family, and friends of Captain Youree I urge you to study his record of achievements carefully and to give a fair and humane decision.

Respectfully,

WYLMA YOUREE CRAIN.

Another letter from President C. M. Conwill, of the Cameron State Agricultural College, where Captain Youree was a student for 2 years, and graduated with honors, speaks for itself:

CAMERON STATE AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE,
Lawton, Okla., June 10, 1944.

Congressman JED JOHNSON,
Congressional Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR JED: Pervis Youree, of Walters, Okla., was a student in Cameron College 2 years, and graduated with above an average grade. He had a good attitude and seemed to be a good citizen. There is nothing against him on his record here.

His sister asked me to write you and tell you about his record in Cameron.

Very truly yours,

C. M. CONWILL,
President.

The following telegrams, including one from his home town of Walters, Okla., speak for themselves:

WALTERS, OKLA., June 9, 1944.

Hon. JED JOHNSON,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.:

Walters Rotary Club petitions you to exert every effort in behalf of Capt. Pervis Youree, Walters, national air hero, who faces court martial. Convey our petition to the President that he intercede for this young man who has served his country so well in the air over Europe. We consider the punishment recommended by court martial entirely too severe and urge that he be reinstated to his former position, that he may return to combat for the country he loves and the cause to which he is so deeply committed.

W. K. BOYER,
President, Walters Rotary Club.

LAWTON, OKLA., May 27, 1944.

Congressman JED JOHNSON,
Washington, D. C.:

Any consideration given Capt. Pervis E. Youree, of Walters, Okla., will be appreciated. The general opinion is he has been unjustly sentenced.

Mr. and Mrs. R. W. GROSE.

DUNCAN, OKLA., June 3, 1944.

Congressman JED JOHNSON,
Washington, D. C.:

Please use your influence for Capt. Pervis E. Youree, Walters, Okla., one who has served his country so heroically. This sentence is unjust.

Mrs. RODNEY S. FRY.

Missing in Action and Their Dependents

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. ALVIN E. O'KONSKI

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. O'KONSKI. Mr. Speaker, I am receiving many letters asking questions about the rights of men and women reported as missing. The writers of these letters also want to know what rights the dependents of men and women reported as missing have. For that reason this week I am explaining these rights so that my people will be fully informed. If you have any further questions, feel free to write Congressman ALVIN E. O'KONSKI, House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

Question. If a serviceman or servicewoman is officially reported to be missing or missing in action, is his or her family notified?

Answer. Yes; the War or Navy Department promptly telegraphs the person whom the serviceman or servicewoman has designated as emergency addressee.

Question. What do the terms "missing" and "missing in action" mean?

Answer. They mean that the person has disappeared. It is not inferred that he is dead. In many cases it is found later that the person is still alive, interned in a neutral country, a prisoner of war, or was isolated in such a way that a prompt reporting of whereabouts was impossible.

Question. When a person in service is in the status of missing or missing in action, does the right to pay stop?

Answer. No. His pay will continue as long as such status is officially continued.

Question. What provision exists for the support of dependents in such cases?

Answer. Family allowances and allotments of pay continue, and if not in effect they may be established.

Question. If the serviceman or servicewoman had not made any allotment of pay previously, how are his or her dependents supported when he or she is declared to be missing, if they are not eligible to receive family allowance?

Answer. Where there is no existing provision adequate for the reasonable support of the dependent or to pay the premiums on the life insurance of the missing person the Secretary of the department concerned may direct suitable allotments of pay for these purposes.

Question. If the dependents of the missing person were eligible for a monthly family allowance but no application had been filed before the person in service entered the missing status, can the dependent obtain a family allowance?

Answer. Yes; by making application therefor.

Question. May a relative who is actually dependent upon a missing serviceman or servicewoman obtain an allotment of pay?

Answer. Yes; if actually dependent and a relative within the recognized degree.

Question. How does the Government make these payments?

Answer. The money is sent to the dependent or insurance company by means of a Government check each month. It is deducted from the missing person's credit which has accumulated.

Question. How much may be allotted to a dependent?

Answer. The Secretary of War or Secretary of the Navy determines the amount according to the circumstances in each individual case.

Question. How long do these allotments of pay continue?

Answer. If the dependent remains eligible to receive the allotments of pay, they may continue as long as the serviceman or servicewoman is officially continued in a missing status or is officially transferred to some status entitling him to a continuation of pay. If such person has been missing for 12 months, the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy reviews the record and determines whether such person should be continued in the missing status or should be found to be dead.

Question. If a missing serviceman or servicewoman is later found to be a prisoner of war or interned in a neutral country, does the allotment of pay continue?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Following a finding of death, what benefits begin for the dependent?

Answer. Death gratuities and insurance benefits then become payable to those entitled to them.

Question. What if a missing serviceman or servicewoman returns to the jurisdiction of the American military or naval authorities?

Answer. They again become a part of the Military or Naval Establishment and can adjust their allotments of pay to dependents on the same basis as servicemen or servicewomen who have not been missing.

Senate Resolution 114

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES M. LaFOLLETTE

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. LAFOLLETTE. Mr. Speaker, under the general leave to extend remarks granted upon the unanimous consent request made by the majority leader on June 23, I wish to include a speech I made in Fort Collins, Colo., on August 20, 1943, in support of the Ball-Burton-Hatch-Hill resolution, Senate Resolution 114:

I know that it is my purpose in participating with other Members of the Congress of the United States during the summer in a program to present to the people of America the significance of Senate Resolution 114 to limit my discussion to that resolution; the particular significance of its language; the nature of its purposes, and the propriety and portent of the resolution in light of the pertinent provisions of the Constitution of the United States.

Therefore, it goes without saying that I definitely believe that the future safety and well-being of our country demands our participation with other world powers in an international order with power and authority equivalent to that stated in Senate Resolution 114. I believe that we must extend the juridical order as developed largely out of eighteenth century philosophy and thinking as the system best calculated to insure individual freedom to man under law, to the world as a whole, in which the component parts of that world shall participate. I believe that the development in thinking which requires the extension of this order over the world is but an inevitable development of the desires of mankind to conquer his own selfishnesses, his own prejudices, and his own hates in order that mankind may occupy the earth in peace and develop its resources intelligently for the benefit of all people who are willing to do a day's work with their hands or their heads, for their share of the good things of the earth. I do not believe that it is the purpose of society to treat the incompetent, the drones and the lazy equally with the competent, the industrious, the frugal and the prudent, either in this Nation or in any other nations. But, I do think it is the duty of society in this Nation and in the world to develop a society of greater equality of opportunity than the world has even seen to date, in which the competent, the industrious, the frugal, and the people of good will may have an equal opportunity to participate in those material things of the world which the peoples of the various parts of the world deem necessary to their happiness. From this it follows that I do not advocate, nor do I think the American people contemplate, a world W. P. A., nor do I think that that thought is relevant to the issues which are before the American people. As a matter of fact, if the people of the United States, through their elected representatives, are permitted a full opportunity to participate in shaping the peace which is to come and the world order which is to come, it is my conviction that they will support such a peace and such an order which will afford to the peoples of the world the opportunities to develop into competent, industrious, frugal people by their own efforts and consistent with the dignity of man, and that they want nothing else. It is my belief that Senate Resolution 114 affords this opportunity for the people's representatives to develop such a peace and such a world order, from which I conclude that those who seriously advocate a world W. P. A. are missing the temper of the people and likewise that those who do not seriously urge such a world order are professing to see the fear of the same in any international world order solely for the purpose of drawing a red herring across the path of an enlightened international development.

It goes without saying that I do not believe it is necessary to further discuss in America the necessity for participation by America in the organization advocated by Senate Resolution 114; and I shall not take my time or yours to advocate the international point of view, or condemn any other, believing as I do that a substantial majority of the people of the United States recognize the necessity for a new world order and America's participation therein. I do believe, and I have found by my own personal observation that what the people want now is the development of a specific policy as an initial step to the further necessary one of the development of the machinery by which that American policy shall be carried out. But if there are yet those who believe that after this war America should again attempt a policy of immunizing itself from the rest of the world, then, I point out that now, 25 years after that war, the world is engulfed in another war today. We have not been able and could not avoid being drawn into it. I do not, and I shall not, question the patriotism or the sincerity of those who, during that 25-year interim, in absolute good faith, because they believed that America's best interest lay that way, advocated and supported a policy of immunization. I simply point out that pragmatically we are now in another war, that policy did not prevent our being in another war, from which I would conclude as a person of common sense that a continuation of such a policy, particularly in the light of the newly developed methods of transportation by air which have further shortened the world's distances, that a continuation of that policy will not give us peace. It will not avoid the terrible waste and extravagance and horrors and tragedies of war, from which we must conclude, as thinking people, that we must adopt a specific policy because it is only by developing intelligently an opposite policy that we have any hope of obtaining peace and avoiding war.

Senate Resolution 114, which was presented to the Senate by Senators BALL, BURTON, HATCH, and HILL in March of this year, is designed primarily to declare a foreign policy for the United States based upon the advice of the Senate of the United States which, in my opinion, is entirely consistent with not only the language but the spirit of the constitutional provisions which declare the duties of the President of the Senate in the development of an American foreign policy. It is my positive opinion that, under the Constitution, the Senate of the United States must not only participate in the formation of an American foreign policy, but that the language of the instrument definitely indicates that it should initiate the policy, or certainly it must participate in the initiation of the policy. In taking this view I realize that I am taking a position which is opposite to that advanced recently by an officer of our State Department. Nevertheless the language used in the American Constitution was the development of long and serious debate by scholarly men who, above all things, knew the significance of language. Understanding of this fact gives the background for the reasoning which I am about to advance.

The first clause of the second grammatical paragraph of section 2 of article II of the Constitution, referring to the executive power and authorities, reads as follows:

"He shall have the power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur."

The extremely significant word in this section is the word "advice." Advice is defined as "a recommendation regarding a decision or course of conduct." In other words, when ordinary people use the word "advice" in its ordinary significance, we us it not in the sense of ratifying an accomplished fact, but we use it for the purpose of defining a situation where one person goes to another for the purpose of discussing a course of action or a decision to be made in the future in order that the person consulted before the fact is accomplished may state his position or his recommendation for the purpose of guiding the person who came to him with reference to the course to be pursued. Or, again, if I am about to make a decision and I go for advice, I contemplate that I will receive the benefit of the thinking of the person whom I consult. It is true that I may disregard the thinking and the conclusions of the person consulted, but having consulted that person, if I choose to disregard his thinking and embark upon a different course, I do so with full knowledge that my decision is contrary to that of the person consulted. Therefore, from the use of the word "advice" in this part of our Constitution, it is clear to me that in the question of the execution of treaties or the entering into of agreements with other nations, our Constitution makers contemplated that the Chief Executive should first consult the Senate of the United States or that the Senate of the United States should first take a position with reference to foreign questions so that its advice and its position would be stated before the Executive and the people of the country prior to the time that agreements with foreign nations were entered into.

From this it follows that, in my opinion, the four Senators who joined in this resolution have evidenced the greatest statesmanship which has been produced by any Members of the United States Senate in my time. I am convinced that it is the purpose of this resolution to avoid the tragic disunity between the Executive and the Senate which followed the last war. I am convinced that it is the purpose of this resolution to obtain a prestatement by the Senate of the United States of America's foreign policy, if and when the resolution is adopted, for the benefit not only of the President of the United States, not only for the people of the United States, but for the governing bodies of the nations of the world. The resolution sets out the minimum requirements of an intelligent American foreign policy.

And again I state to you, from a deep conviction, that the American people are ready for a discussion of this question. I am convinced that the man in the armed services is desirous of a discussion of this question in order that his sacrifices may be given some purpose and some hope for something better in the future. I think it is the essence of democracy that a full discussion of this policy must be had now, and in that respect I am afraid I differ with those who, lacking confidence in the people, would deviously start upon a policy by indirection, frustrate the desires of a people to form a decision and thereby create disunity which inevitably arises from uncertainty and the lack of forthrightness.

I am also convinced that certain other language in the section of the Constitution under discussion sustains my position in this regard. The word "consent" is defined as "voluntary accordance with, or concurrence in what is done or proposed by another." It is true that the word "consent" does not so strongly indicate previous action by the other person, but it does have that meaning not only from its dictionary definition, but from our ordinary use of the word in that we are just as accustomed to thinking of going to a person for his consent in advance of taking action as we are to submit an action for concurrence or approval, and when the word "consent" is used conjunctively with the word "advice," which latter word has in it the contemplation of a previous submission of action, we are inevitably driven to the conclusion that the word "consent" is used in its alternative sense of a previous submission of a proposed action.

Furthermore, Hunter Miller, of the State Department, in his collection and work entitled "Treaties and Other International Acts of the United States of America," volume 1, part 1, page 9, says this:

"In the sense in which the word is used as treaty in the Constitution, the word 'treaty' comprehends all international agreements submitted for the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States. Further, the descriptive word is 'treaty' suggesting that convention, contract, and protocol are all within the constitutional language."

From this it follows again that despite the fact that some people may attempt to make a case against this resolution requiring action now by the Senate in the declaration of a policy by declaring that in practice certain international engagements have been, and therefore may be, entered into by the executive alone, despite the constitutional language, I need only point out that it is an established principle, not only of law, but of human thinking, that a course of conduct not authorized by authorities cannot, by the repetition of an unauthorized act, override a written, definitely stated grant of power. In other words, it makes no difference to me what course of conduct may have been followed in the past in violation of the Constitution, this irregular conduct cannot serve as a precedent which can, in any way detract from, or deny the right and the obligation of the Senate of the United States, now, at this very time, while the war is on, to adopt a resolution declaring its advice upon the question of foreign policy.

I have devoted some time to developing the constitutional authority, approval, and background of this resolution for the reason that a study of the resolution indicates clearly that an organization of the United Nations is needed now, immediately, to conduct in an orderly fashion the matters set out in the subparagraphs 1, 2, and 3 of the resolution which have to do with, first, the coordination and utilization of the military and economic resources of the United Nations; second, to provide for temporary administration of Axis-controlled areas as they shall be occupied; and, third, to administer relief and assistance in economic rehabilitation in the territories of members of the United Nations and in Axis territory occupied by the United Nations.

Sections four and five of the resolution devote themselves to the formation of an organization for permanent purposes as distinguished from the formation of an organization for three immediate or temporary purposes. And, it is not my purpose or intention to discuss sections four and five here, although I shall do so elsewhere on this tour.

Too much time has been lost by our country not only in failing to adopt this resolution, but in the setting up of an organization as required by the resolution to administer the three urgent and temporary problems with which the resolution deals. We have been on a military offensive, but as United Nations, we have not been on a political offensive. You will note that I say as "United Nations," and I want it distinctly understood that I do not consider that purely American and British cooperation on any of these questions can take the place of a full understanding by the United Nations on those questions, including all of the United Nations, but particularly Russia and China. To me it does not matter that it would be impractical for the Chinese or the Russians to participate in the temporary administration of Tunisia or Sicily and in the temporary administration of Italy; the significant thing is that there is no organization of the United Nations laying down a policy for administering these countries; laying down a policy for rehabilitation of these countries; or laying down a policy by agreement for participation by the United Nations in fully utilizing their military and economic resources of all of the nations for the prosecution of the war and the civilian administration and economic rehabilitation of these countries.

Nor am I satisfied that the so-called agreements reached at the Food Conference take the place of a permanent organization of the United Nations as called for by this resolution. What we need in the world today if democratic processes are to survive, is an abandonment of the policy of emergency commitments, emergency decisions by executive representatives of the United Nations which cannot by any stretch of the imagination take the place of an organization with a written, clearly stated system by which authority is granted to someone or some group to call upon other groups of the United Nations for specific commitments specifically limited by the written agreement itself so that the American people and all of the people of the world may openly understand and know the extent of their obligations and their contributions.

I am definitely of the opinion that the thinking people of America still believe in the principle of orderly, organized government under law and under rule; that they are willing to extend that concept and that principle to the world and to join in an organization based upon definitely stated agreements and obligations accepted by the duly constituted authorities of the members of the organization. But I am also convinced that, except among certain groups found in the large cities of the United States who either do not understand or do not believe in that concept which is essentially American, that the American people are disturbed, that the American people are upset, not by the thought of entering into a completely, fully organized international government with stated principles, but they are upset by the idea that commitments are being made which have not been stated to them, that lack of unity prevails between the United Nations which open discussion could dissolve, and that the elimination of this uncertainty would do more than anything else to unite the people of this country in the prosecution of this war toward a definitely greater goal.

Finally, let me discuss the arguments which are being made today that this is not the time to discuss, either upon the floor of the Senate of the United States or with the other governments of the world, the formation of an organization of the United Nations to carry out the first three purposes of Senate Resolution 114. Consider for a minute the implications involved in such a statement. Consider them in the light of your experiences as people, and, as you consider your personal experiences, remember that nations are nothing more than groupings of humans and that nations pretty generally act in mass as individuals act.

The statement that this is not the time to form an organization of the United Nations implies that the member nations will be split up and disorganized and the war effort injured by such a discussion now. I say to you that the absolute opposite of that statement is true, and I base it upon my observation, which I am sure will concur with your observations, of the conduct of human beings. Daily the men of the United States, of the British Commonwealth, of Soviet Russia, of China, and, to a lesser degree, of France, Holland, Poland, Norway, the Balkans, and Greece, are fighting certain common enemies. The peoples of the first four of these nations, in varying degrees, are converting their material assets for the purpose of conducting that war and thereby insuring their own living standards. They have a goal, which is victory and unconditional surrender of their common enemies. The goal has not been reached; each has a personal interest at this time in attaining that goal. I say to you that if those nations cannot agree at this time, before that goal is attained, they will never agree after it is attained.

Consider for a minute some of the things that I have observed as a lawyer and some of the things which you have also observed as laymen. Recently in my state, four men who had a common interest in certain lands and buildings, but their individual interests were not of equal value, resisted a condemnation suit by the United States government of the property in which they had the common interest. All through the conduct of that litigation, despite the advice and insistence of their lawyers, they refused to sit down and specifically agree upon their separate, individual shares in the common interest. They always said to their lawyers: "We will agree on that; we won't have any trouble about that." The litigation terminated successfully and for 1 year the money was impounded in the Federal Court because these four men could not agree among themselves as to the division of it, and finally when an agreement was made, each one quit speaking to the other. And wherein did they fail? They failed because they refused to agree among themselves while they had a united and common interest in attaining a definite goal and it was inevitable that they would fall out when it was necessary to decide the manner of dividing their gains.

It is not relevant whether the attaining of victory involves the division of any gains among the United Nations, but it is certainly true that the extent of the commitments and the extent of the contributions and the extent of the controls over the conquered nations and the rehabilitated nations and the resources at their command, if left to a decision after the successful culmination of this war, will inevitably lead to bitterness which, if they do not prevent the establishment of a world order in which there can be any hope for the world, will certainly establish a world order among peoples who have a new bitterness toward new so-called enemies over new grievances arising out of a discussion of what is to be done after this war and a division of power over and access to the resources of the world now held by certain of the United Nations. This result is as inevitable as the rising of the sun because it is inevitably true that while hard bargains make good friends, sloppy thinking and indecisive decision among peoples with a common interest who defer making these decisions until after the goal is obtained inevitably leads to dissension and bitterness. If you cannot discuss the formation of an organization of the United Nations while your men are dying beside the other brave men of the world, while united by the common bond of sympathy, by the common bond of horror at the tragedies of war, then you will not be able to discuss these matters when that sympathy and that horror has been removed.

Finally, if you doubt me, consider what is happening in America today. Every time braver men, by the use of their arms and the sacrifice of their lives attain a temporary victory over our enemies, we, the people of the home front, anticipating sudden ending of our own little inconveniences, a sudden and victorious ending gained by the lives of others, begin to let down our machines; men who are producing the arms betray those who are fighting; people who are being subjected to the relatively infinitesimal inconveniences of a war economy begin to whine and to clamor against the regulations which cause them inconvenience. If there is that division between the people on the home front and the people on the battle front in this country, which arises solely from their failure to have sufficient imagination to comprehend the horrors of war and the sacrifices of the men who are fighting; if there is not a sufficient cementing of American people through blood of the men who are dying, their own flesh and blood, their own kind, on the battlefields of this war; then how can you expect any unity of purpose or unity of sacrifice by the nations of the world when the crucible of war, which to some extent burns out the dross and the meanness and the littleness in us, is chilled by peace, a peace which unfortunately seems to destroy all memory of the good resolves which were blatantly proclaimed during the time of war and releases instead the selfishness and greed and the desire for personal and national gain which, existing in the time of peace, constitutes the soil from which wars spring.

I am convinced that those who cry out against the formation of a positive organization of the United Nations now, on the ground that it would interfere with the war effort, are not only following the course of expediency, but they are also advocating a course of conduct which flies squarely in the face of human nature and all known observed human reactions.

Senate Resolution 114 should be reported to the floor of the Senate now; it should be discussed now, because the people of America are demanding positive information now, and because if our alliances with our allies in the time when our sons, as well as their sons, are dying, are so slender and tenuous that they cannot bind us together under such circumstances, there is little, if any, hope for an intelligent, effective agreement after the war is over.

A Bill of Rights for the American Indian—An Emancipation Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANCIS CASE
OF SOUTH DAKOTA

June 23, 1944

Mr. CASE. Mr. Speaker, no racial group in America has given such a high proportion of its sons to fight in this war as the first Americans, the native Indian. And this is a strange thing, Mr. Speaker, because no racial group in the United States has been so limited in its exercise of the traditional rights of citizens and the very rights which we fight to preserve.

It has seemed to me altogether fitting and proper, therefore, that we should now complete the emancipation of the American Indian, to whom citizenship was given in the act of 1924, signed by President Coolidge. Accordingly I am introducing a bill (H. R. 5115) which will provide that hereafter whenever any Indian of lawful age upon his application is found by the Secretary of the Interior to have met any one of the conditions of emancipation set forth in subparagraph (1) of the act he shall be given—

(a) The right to administer his personal property—including money—under the laws of the State of his residence.

(b) The right to receive a patent in fee to any lands allotted to or inherited by him and to administer this or any other real property acquired by him by gift or purchase.

(c) The right to appeal from any Indian court to the State and Federal courts of appropriate jurisdiction.

H. R. 5115 also provides that the exercise of any of these rights shall not deprive the Indian of any rights to which he would otherwise be entitled as a member of any Indian tribe.

Subparagraph (1) states that the conditions precedent to the recognition of an Indian for emancipation by the Secretary of the Interior as provided in the foregoing paragraph shall be the meeting of any one of the following conditions:

(a) An honorable discharge from service in the armed forces of the United States in any war.

(b) Graduation from a standard high school or its equivalent.

(c) Receipt of a certificate of competency to be issued upon the joint recommendation of the tribal council and the superintendent of the Indian reservation for the tribe of which the Indian is a member.

Section 2 provides that the act may be cited as the Indian Emancipation Act.

Mr. Speaker, the passage of such an act will be a matter of simple justice. Today, the restricted Indian must go to an agency office, hat in hand, on certain appointed days and at certain appointed hours, to ask that he be permitted to spend his own money or to administer a portion of his own affairs. The young warrior who has been a part of Uncle Sam's great Army or Navy in this war cannot be asked to go back to that condition. And it is high time that we recognize the progess that has been made in schools and in experience so as to place on their own feet the Indians who have demonstrated their readiness.

Some people would accomplish these ends, Mr. Speaker, by complete abolition of the Indian Office at this time. Personally, I do not think that would meet the situation. A period of transition is needed. Time to work out some matters of school and hospital administration. Time to take care of the older Indians who have had no opportunity to learn to read or speak in the white man's way. But the proposals in my bill of emancipation would permit an Indian upon his own free will to apply on his merits and obtain the rights stated.

I do not maintain this bill is perfect nor that it will meet every Indian problem. Far from that. It does not pretend to solve problems connected with common property. It deals only with the property that belongs to an individual Indian. Other bills can deal with other problems. My purpose in introducing the bill at this time, Mr. Speaker, is to offer an opportunity for the Indians of the several tribes to study it and to express their thoughts as the Special Committee on Investigation of Indian Affairs visits the several reservations this summer.

My colleague, the Honorable KARL MUNDT, of the First Congressional District of South Dakota, author of the investigation resolution and vice chairman of the committee, has consulted with me and arranged the following itinerary for the committee in South Dakota: Tuesday, July 25, Sisseton Agency; Wednesday, July 26, Standing Rock and Cheyenne River; Thursday, July 27, formal hearings at Pierre; Friday, inspection of Crow Creek and Rosebud Reservations; Saturday, July 29, inspection of the Pine Ridge Reservation. I hope that at all these points, and others, the Indians of the many tribes will express themselves to the investigating committee about the proposed Emancipation Act and other matters.

A Message to Dependents of Men and Women in Our Armed Forces

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALVIN E. O'KONSKI
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. O'KONSKI. Mr. Speaker, any dependent of a man or a woman in our armed forces who is paid $138 a month or less as base pay is eligible to receive a dependent's allowance from the Government. I hope all dependents will read this article and keep it for future use. It must be remembered that this act applies only to men and women in service whose base pay is $138 a month or less. Those men and women in service who get more than $138 per month come under another system. The new act passed by Congress, effective November 1, 1943, provides a monthly family allowance as follows:

Class A dependents: A wife, $50; a wife and one child, $80; each additional child, $20. A divorced wife may get up to $42 per month if she is named specifically in the court order to receive alimony and she receives the amount named. If this amount is in excess of $42, she cannot receive over $42. The child of a divorcee, where there is no wife receiving family allowance, can get up to $42 per month regardless of the amount given in the court order. If there is a wife receiving family allowance this amount is $30 and if there are other children it is slightly less. Therefore, if the divorce or court order does not name the child to receive support or name the child for less support, this is disregarded and the above amounts are given. Illegitimate children are also considered as class A dependents of the servicemen if they are proven to be his children either by his sworn statement to that effect or by a court order adjudging him to be the father.

Class B dependents: A parent, $37; two parents, $37; a parent or two parents and any number of brothers and sisters, $37. Note: Class B dependents, it must be clearly understood, are dependents who are only partially but at least substantially dependent upon service men and women for support. In other words, if the dependents are dependent upon the service man or woman for 50 percent or less of their support, they are classed as B dependents. Those who make application for this family allowance, therefore, should be careful to prove that they are more than 51 percent if they actually need chief support from the man or woman in service, and especially if they have no outside income. Persons who have other means of income unless it is small will as a rule be classed as B dependents. Those who need a great deal of assistance will be classed as B-1 dependents.

Class B-1 dependents: One parent, $50; one parent and one brother or sister, $68; and each additional brother or sister, $11. Two parents, $68; two parents and one brother or sister, $79, plus $11 for each additional brother or sister; a brother or sister but no parents, $42, with additional $11 for each additional brother or sister. Note that here again it must be remembered that it is important to prove more than 50-percent dependency where the parents and brothers and sisters actually are greatly dependent. If it is not proven, they are classed as B dependents and receive considerably less money as outlined above.

HOW TO GET FAMILY ALLOWANCE

Wherever possible, as soon as a man or woman enters service they should make application for the allowance to their dependents. They should do this immediately when they are inducted. The allowance payments do not go back but start with the date of application. Therefore, if the man or woman in service waits a month after induction before they file an application, 1 month's family allowance is lost. The longer they wait to file an application, the more money is lost. It is important to file for this the day they enter.

The man or woman in service should submit the application on a form they can get from the commanding officer. In filling out this form it is good to be careful to spell all names correctly and give exact information as to marriage, dates of birth, and so forth. Many of the troubles dependents have in getting their family allowances are due to the fact that the service man or woman is careless in filling out the blank. An extra minute filling out the blank may save several months' time in getting the allowance approved. The application after careful study and filling out should then be handed to the commanding officer.

If the service man or woman for some reason or other fails to make application or is in a position where he or she cannot make application, any class A dependent can make application instead. If there is any question as to where or how to apply, see your local Red Cross chairman or your local county veterans' service officer or local American Legion head, and if you need additional information write to your Congressman, ALVIN E. O'KONSKI, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

In the case where a class A dependent must apply, the Army provides a blank to be filled out, but the Navy requires only a letter in the handwriting of the dependent stating the facts and giving the serviceman's full name and serial number. Class A family allowance is approved regardless of the serviceman's desire for it. The wife must submit a marriage certificate, and if children their birth certificates, when making application.

If the man or woman in service with class B or B-1 dependents refuses to make an application for them, no other person can apply, and there is no way it can be given to them. They cannot be forced to apply, and it is started or discontinued at the will of the serviceman. If the man or woman is in the Army and his class B or B-1 dependents know that he will approve their application, they may make the application for him providing he is overseas. When the application is received, he is contacted for his approval. If the man or woman is in any other branch of the service, they must make application regardless of whether or not they are out of the country.

DIFFERENCE BETWEEN FAMILY ALLOWANCE AND ALLOTMENT

It is well for both the serviceman and the dependents to know the difference in these terms. Family allowance is a sum of money partly paid by the service man or woman and partly paid by the Government. No matter how small or how large the family allowance is, $22 is deducted from the service man's or woman's salary where there is one class of dependents, or $27 where there are two classes of dependents, and the balance is paid by the Government. Dependency must be shown for class B or B-1 dependents to receive family allowance.

An allotment is a voluntary deduction from a man's pay to members of his family or dependent relatives and it is not increased by any amount from the Government. These are referred to as class E allotments and no dependency needs be shown to receive it. The service man or woman is the only one who can request that this deduction be made from his pay.

PARENTS AND BROTHERS AND SISTERS CAN RECEIVE ALLOWANCES AT THE SAME TIME AS WIFE AND CHILDREN

It is also important to know that parents and brothers and sisters can get family allowance even if the serviceman's wife and children get one. In other words, if men or women in service have parents and brothers or sisters dependent upon them as well as a wife and children—all of these dependents can receive family allowance. Because a serviceman has a wife and child receiving this allowance, it does not prevent his parents and brothers and sisters from also receiving it. In order to name them, he has to make an additional $5 contribution toward the family allowance. For example, if he has a wife and child or children receiving family allowance, he is having $22 deducted from his wages in part payment of it. If he wishes also to name his parents or brothers or sisters, he has $5 more taken out or a total of $27. The balance in both cases is paid by the Government.

PARENTS CAN GET FAMILY ALLOWANCE FROM MORE THAN ONE SON OR DAUGHTER IN SERVICE

If parents are dependent upon more than one son or daughter or both in service they can get more dependency allowance. They may get either a B rating from both sons or they may get a B-1 rating from one and a B from the other. They may receive family allowance from no more than two sons or daughters in service. This is given where the need is shown to be sufficiently great enough to warrant it.

YOUR CONGRESSMAN CAN HELP YOU IF YOU HAVE ANY TROUBLE

As I have stated above, see your local veterans' service officer, your local Red Cross chairman, or your local American Legion head for assistance. If you need any further help, contact your Congressman. It is a Congressman's duty to help with such matters. He is your Representative in Washington. If you have any trouble at all in this respect, your Congressman is the person to take it up with.

Your Congressman has already helped in more than 15,000 cases. Only 100 of these are now pending. Your Congressman will settle your case for you and get you every cent you have coming. Write to Congressman ALVIN E. O'KONSKI, House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

FOR THOSE WHO RECEIVED A CUT IN FAMILY ALLOWANCE

Many people received a cut recently in their family allowance. No explanation is given when the reduced checks arrive so here is the explanation.

To begin with, all those who were cut were reduced to $37 per month. In other words, they were given a class B dependency. No matter how many dependents there are in a family, a class B dependency under the new law gives only $37.

What is a class B dependency? A class B dependency is one where the parents or brothers and sisters are dependent upon the soldier or sailor 50 percent or less.

All dependents some time ago were sent a blank to fill out. On that blank they were asked to list their monthly living expenses for the last 12 months and their average monthly income for the last 12 months. If the difference between monthly expenses and income listed on this blank was $37 or less, they were cut to a class B dependency rating. The dependents' own figures as put on this blank were used as the basis for rating them as B instead of B–1 dependents.

Another thing that reduced many people to $37 per month was the way they filled out the part of the blank which asked how much the soldier or sailor contributed before he joined the armed forces. Many parents put down that they did not know, or put in that the boy contributed nothing to their support or very little before he joined. The more the boy contributed to their support, the better are the chances of the parents to a B–1 rating.

If those who have been cut cannot make ends meet on $37 per month, they should take the matter up with their county veterans' service officer or local American Legion head or local Red Cross chairman; and if any further information or assistance is needed, write me: Congressman ALVIN E. O'KONSKI, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

How To Trace Soldier's Missing Personal Effects

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALVIN E. O'KONSKI

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. O'KONSKI. Mr. Speaker, the following is a portion of a letter I received from a soldier's mother:

When my son left for overseas 6 months ago he gave into the charge of the officer at the port of embarkation a package containing personal belongings he wanted me to have. To date this has not been received, although I've taken it up with the post office and the express company, but to no avail. What can I do about this?

If you know from which port of embarkation your son left, write to the transportation officer at that port. Otherwise, I suggest you inquire of the transportation officer or the commanding officer of the post, camp, or station to which he was last assigned in this country.

Give full details of what the package contained, describing each article. If these inquiries bring no results, write to the Personal Effects Bureau, Kansas City Quartermaster Depot, Kansas City, Mo., as the package may have been sent there for shipping.

If you get no response or satisfaction after doing the above, write Congressman ALVIN E. O'KONSKI, House Office Building, Washington, D. C., and I will get the matter settled for you.

Congress Will Consider Post-War Highway and Airport Construction Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JENNINGS RANDOLPH

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, the winning of the war is the paramount objective of the American people. Nothing should be done that will delay victory. It is necessary, however, that Congress consider carefully appropriate and far-reaching plans for post-war projects which are national in scope. Delayed action might conceivably be disastrous to the returning veterans of our armed forces, and to the development and improvement of worth-while construction.

The House Roads Committee, of which I am a member, on June 2 favorably reported H. R. 4915 by Chairman ROBINSON, which authorizes $1,500,000,000 in Federal-aid highway funds to become available at the rate of $500,000,000 for each of the 3 successive post-war fiscal years.

The legislation provides the following:

First, $500,000,000 shall be distributed among the States and become available for contractual obligation within the 30-day period after the passage of the legislation.

Second, $500,000,000 for the second fiscal year shall be distributed among the States and become available for contractual obligations January 1, following the first apportionment.

In the event the bill becomes law within the next few months, as I believe it should, Federal funds will be available by January 1, 1945, in the amount of $1,000,000,000 for the construction of post-war highways. A plan of this sort would enable State highway departments to advance with patterns for specific projects and to present to the State legislatures, meeting next year, plans for matching Federal funds. The measure contains no provision for the date of apportionment or availability of the $500,000,000 for the third fiscal post-war year.

The funds apportionment formula among the States has been changed from the traditional Federal-aid method of one-third population, one-third area, and one-third post-road mileage to a new basis of one-half population, one-fourth area, and one-fourth post-road mileage. This method would allow a greater percentage of Federal moneys to the more populous States for use in relieving traffic congestion in the urban areas.

The measure provides that after making deductions for administration, investigation, and research the funds shall be used as follows:

First, $225,000,000 for the Federal-aid highway system either inside or outside municipalities.

Second, $125,000,000 for principal, secondary, and feeder roads, including farm-to-market roads.

Third, $150,000,000 for principal highways in urban areas on the Federal-aid highway system.

Sixty percent Federal funds is the proposed matching basis for the first year, 40 percent State funds with the regular 50–50 matching basis applying thereafter. Provisions are specially provided for States with large areas of publicly owned land.

The bill also provides that the Commissioner of Public Roads has the authority to advance funds to the States where necessary construction work should be expedited. The measure also calls for the creation of a "national system of interstate highways not exceeding 40,000 miles in total extent so located as to connect by routes, as direct as practicable, the principal metropolitan areas, cities, and industrial centers, to serve the national defense, and to connect at suitable border points with routes of continental importance in the Dominion of Canada and the Republic of Mexico."

The State highway departments, of each State and the adjoining States, are to make the selection of routes in the interstate highway system in accordance with the regular provisions of the Federal highway aid statutes, and the routes automatically become part of the Federal-aid highway system if not already designated as such.

One and one-half percent of the funds apportioned to any State for any year may be used for surveys, plans, and engineering without matching with State funds.

The legislation provides $25,000,000 for each of the 3 post-war years for forest highways; $12,500,000 annually for forest development, trails and roads; $4,250,000 in each of the 3 years for national park roads, and $5,000,000 in each of the 3 years for access roads to national parks and monuments.

The bill would also authorize the Commissioner of Public Roads to cooperate with the State highway departments in airplane flight strip construction alongside highways.

Our roads committee, in providing for the separation of funds among urban, rural, and secondary roads, proposes the following definitions:

The term "urban area" means an area including and adjacent to a municipality of 10,000 or more, the population of such including municipality to be determined by the latest available Federal census. The boundaries or urban areas, as defined herein, will be fixed by the State highway department of each State subject to the approval of the Public Roads Administration.

The term "rural areas" means all areas of the State not included in urban areas.

The term "secondary and feeder roads" means roads in rural areas, including farm-to-market roads, rural-mail routes, and school-bus routes, and not on the Federal-aid system.

AIRPORT BILL IS PRESENTED

On June 14, I introduced in the House a Federal-aid airport bill (H. R. 5024) which calls for the expenditure of $1,000,000,000 in Federal funds in 10 years for the development of airports. The administration of the measure would be placed under a newly created director of airports service under the Civil Aeronautics Administration.

The bill, following the general plan of Federal aid for highway construction, requires the establishment of "State airport agencies," and funds would be apportioned under a legislative formula among the States. The formula provides that funds should be apportioned among the States in the proportion which their population, area, and number of registered civil aircraft—other than those owned by scheduled air carriers—per civil airport bear to the total population, number of civil aircraft of all the States per civil airport and area.

The measure directs preparation of a national airport plan and authorizes the appropriation of $100,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1945, and $100,000,000 for each of the nine successive fiscal years, in order to bring about the establishment of a Nation-wide system of public airports adequate to meet the present and future needs of civil aeronautics. The requirement of States to match Federal contributions on a 50–50 basis, thus making a total program of $2,000,000,000, would be necessary. Special provision is made that not more than 2 percent of any annual appropriation can be expended for the development of any one airport.

States, in order to be eligible for participation in Federal airport aid, must:

First. Enact appropriate enabling legislation.

Second. Set up a State airport agency with adequate powers and suitably equipped to fit the requirements of the Federal-aid airport program.

Third. Enact legislation for the prevention and removal of airport hazards.

Fourth. Refrain from taxing aircraft fuel or aeronautical facilities and operations unless the proceeds are devoted entirely to the development of civil aeronautics.

Fifth. Take adequate steps to assure proper management and maintenance of all public airports.

Sixth. Take adequate steps to assure the availability of State funds for participation in the Federal-aid airport program.

A national plan for the development of public airports adequate to meet the needs of national defense and civil aviation will be prepared and kept current by the Administrator of the Civil Aeronautics Administration. He is required, in formulating the plan, to take into consideration the recommendations and views of the several States and their political subdivisions. The plan, when developed, will specify the general location and type of airports, and construction priorities will be organized.

Review of Legislation Passed Benefiting World War Veterans

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLINTON P. ANDERSON

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. ANDERSON of New Mexico. Mr. Speaker, the New Mexico Department of the American Legion is opening its twenty-fifth annual convention on this day, June 23. It had been my plan to attend the convention and address the members of the Legion there.

Because of the legislative situation in Washington, where I was serving as a conferee on two of the appropriation bills, I was unable to leave in time to attend the convention, but I prepared and sent to the convention the address which I had written. Because this address carries information which I think should be of interest not only to the veterans of previous wars, but to the men and women now in the armed services of the United States, I desire to insert it into the RECORD. It is as follows:

Mr. Chairman and my friends of the New Mexico Department of the American Legion, first of all I want to congratulate you on the fact that your organization has reached the ripe age of 25 years. When two people have been united in the holy bonds of matrimony for 25 years we celebrate their silver anniversary, and we send them gifts of silver to express our joy at the permanency of their union. In a similar vein I think I might express to the members of the New Mexico Department of the American Legion my gratification at the completion of 25 years of successful association which has tied together into a united and effective group the victors of a great war.

At the same time I can as well express my hope for two additional results: First, that after the veterans of the present struggle return victors from their world-wide conflict, they will find their way into the ranks of the Legion to keep alive and aggressive for the next generation the work which your members have so ably carried forward; and second, that as a result of the combined experience of these two great groups of men who will have fought and won two decisive struggles for freedom and democracy throughout the world, there may come a program which will mean eventual world peace and will insure the sons and daughters of the new generation an opportunity to grow to manhood and womanhood without facing the specter of a third world-wide cataclysm. Surely the accumulated wisdom of these two struggles should help us protect ourselves against a third.

In Washington the program of the serviceman and the care of the veteran has been before us time after time in these last few years, and particularly in recent months. I wish that time would permit me to deal in minute detail with all the measures that have been proposed, and particularly with those which have won final passage. I do think that I would be justified on this occasion in talking at greater length than an ordinary appearance might justify, because I feel that when the soldiers of the present war return to their homes they will naturally come in contact with the members of the American Legion and will seek from you correct information as to their rights and privileges and responsibilities. For that reason I feel that you will pardon what may seem like an extended review of legislation.

You are doubtless aware of the recent measures enacted by the Congress, which President Roosevelt signed on May 27 last. The most important of these were Public Laws 312 and 313. I cannot tell you the number of men and women that these laws will benefit, because it is not possible to make a prediction in connection with the present war which would cover the possibilities involved. However, I can tell you this:

These two laws brought veterans of the present war two very valuable rights, which had been enjoyed by World War No. 1 veterans and dependents for a number of years, but which had not been extended to the younger veterans of the present war until these laws were approved on May 27. They brought non-service-connected disability pensions and non-service-connected death pensions to limited groups of deserving veterans and dependents of the present war.

These non-service-connected disability pensions have been provided for a number of years for veterans of World War No. 1 who are permanently and totally disabled. The rate for total disability is now $60 a month. For those who may remain on the rolls for 10 years, or who attain the age of 65 years, the rate is now $60 a month. These rates now apply to World War No. 2.

Widows and children of veterans of the present war who have a service-connected disability but who die of other causes are now eligible for the first time to pension at the following rates: a widow, $35 a month; a widow with one child, $45 a month, with $5 a month each for each additional child.

As I said, these are new benefits conferred by the acts of May 27 upon veterans, widows, and children on account of service in the present war.

In addition, service-connected disability payments for line-of-duty pension for veterans of the present war were increased by 15 percent. This makes payments for total disability $115 a month, instead of the $100 a month which prevailed before, and proportionate increases have been provided for partial disabilities.

Now as to the veterans and dependents of the First World War. These laws which I have referred to have all provided increases for the veterans, widows, and children of that war.

By this I mean to say that veterans of World War No. 1 with service-connected disability received the 15-percent increase in compensation payments; the permanently and totally disabled veterans of World War No. 1, suffering from nonservice-connected disabilities, had their pension rates increased from $40 a month to the amounts payable in World War No. 2 cases, which are for those on the rolls 10 years—or attaining the age of 65 years—$60 a month; with the others increased to $50 a month.

Also, the widows and orphans rates for nonservice-connected death—these are the Public 484 benefits restricted to those with service-connected disability who die of other causes—these World War No. 1 widows had their pensions increased to $35 a month from $30 a month; a widow with one child from $38 a month to $45 a month, with additional children being increased from $4 to $5 a month.

In addition for one orphan (no widow) the rate was increased from $15 a month to $18 a month; two orphans from $22 to $27 a month; and three orphans from $30 a month to $36 a month, with additional orphans receiving increases from $3 a month to $4 a month each. These new rates for orphans also apply initially in each instance to like World War No. 2 cases.

Another law which the Congress passed and which President Roosevelt signed on May 11, was Public 309. This law provides that blind veterans who are entitled to disability compensation may be provided with seeing-eye or guide dogs for escorts, as well as with mechanical electronic equipment.

In addition, on March 1 President Roosevelt signed a law which increased rates for both veterans and widows of Spanish-American War veterans, and approved a law providing additional benefits for veterans and dependents of the Indian wars.

As you well know, all these new laws, like the old laws, are administered by the Veterans' Administration, which is headed by our good friend Brig. Gen. Frank T. Hines.

This great organization, which was conceived by the veterans of World War No. 1 to meet the difficult conditions which existed following the Armistice, was created by Congress as a result of the demand on the part of veterans that one organization be responsible for veterans' care and veterans' benefits.

We were indeed fortunate that your foresight made this great organization possible, because without the head start which was thus provided we would be having great difficulties in caring for the veterans and dependents of the present war.

To give you some idea of the problems which the Veterans' Administration has been meeting successfully in this connection, I have only to say that at the end of May 1943 only 11,000 claims for disability pension growing out of the present war had been allowed by the Veterans' Administration, while at the end of April of the present year, 161,000 claims for disability pension had been allowed, an increase of 150,000 during the past year in pension awards for disability growing out of the present war.

Death awards have been on a smaller scale. They rose from 7,000 in May 1943 to 24,000 in April 1944. National service life insurance awards for death increased from 26,000 in May 1943 to 73,000 in April 1944.

As you are doubtless aware, the so-called G. I. bill of rights, as revised in conference, has passed both the House and the Senate, and was to be signed by the President on Thursday preceding this convention.

I will not endeavor to tell all the particulars of this very constructive measure, which is designed primarily to assist the average veteran upon his discharge from the service. I would call to your attention the fact that the G. I. bill will be in addition to the law we enacted several months ago, providing mustering-out pay of from $100 to $300. This, as you know, goes to all men who have served honorably in the present war.

As to the G. I. bill itself, it proposes a variety of benefits, including continuing education, loans to finance the purchase, repair, or construction of homes, farms, or business properties, with additional provisions for unemployment payments to veterans who may find themselves without jobs.

Under it the Veterans' Administration is declared to be an essential war agency and entitled, second only to the War Department and the Navy Department, to priorities in personnel, equipment, and materials. The sum of $500,000,000 is authorized to be appropriated for hospital construction.

No person shall be discharged or released from active duty in the armed forces until his certificate of discharge or release from active duty, and final pay or substantial portion thereof are ready for delivery to him or to his next of kin or legal representative; and no person (with certain exceptions) shall be discharged or released from active service on account of disability until he has executed a claim for compensation, pension, or hospitalization, to be filed with the Veterans' Administration, or has signed a statement that he has had explained to him the right to file such claim. No person in the armed forces shall be required to sign a statement of any nature, referring to the origin, incurrence, or aggravation of any disease or injury he may have; and any such statement against his own interest signed at any time shall be null and void and of no force and effect.

Generally speaking, any veteran whose education was interrupted or interfered with or discontinued because of his entry into the military service is entitled to the educational benefits provided in the bill. It is assumed that any veteran who has not reached the age of 25 did have such an interruption. Service of 90 days or more is required to be eligible for educational training. The course must be initiated not later than 2 years after the date of discharge or termination of the present war, whichever is the later. While pursuing such a course the veteran shall be paid a subsistence allowance of $50 a month if without a dependent or dependents, or $75 a month if he has a dependent or dependents. The Administrator shall pay to the educational or training institution the customary cost of tuition, etc., and other necessary expenses exclusive of board, lodging, other living expenses, and travel, not exceeding $500 for an ordinary school year.

Loans are provided to veterans for the purpose of acquisition and construction of homes, farms, and business properties. Veterans of all wars are to be provided with the maximum of job opportunity in the field of gainful employment. Although this section has to do primarily with veterans of the present war, all war veterans are granted the same employment assistance.

Veterans who have served 90 days shall be entitled, in accordance with regulations issued by the Administrator, to receive a readjustment allowance for each week of unemployment, not to exceed a total of 52 weeks, which occurs not later than 2 years after discharge or release, or termination of the war, whichever is the later date.

Cash benefits provided any veteran under the G. I. bill are to be deducted from any bonus or adjusted compensation, which may be payable after the war.

As you know, hospitalization without service connection for disability and vocational rehabilitation for service-connected disabled veterans who are handicapped were provided by the Congress last year for veterans of the present war

We now have 94 fine veterans' hospitals and homes containing nearly 100,000 beds of all types. These may be sufficient for immediate veterans' requirements, for as you know the armed forces provide initial hospitalization for men in the service, the Army alone having more than a half million beds for this purpose.

After demobilization General Hines expects to receive about 100,000 beds from the Army and Navy for use in veterans' hospitalization. Ultimately the veterans will need another 100,000 beds, but this last hundred thousand will not be required for many years.

In connection with the present veterans' hospital expansion program, the Congress has appropriated more than $40,000,000 for veterans' beds during the past 6 months.

And do not forget this: Our women veterans, that is, the nurses, WAC's, WAVES, SPARS, and Marine Corps girls, have the same rights as the men and are entitled to the same benefits under like conditions.

It took veterans of the First World War many years after the armistice to obtain a number of these benefits I have set forth—benefits which have already been provided for the veterans of the present war.

In conferring these rights resulting from service in the present war before the war is over I think that Congress has only done the fair thing. If these measures have proved beneficial for First World War veterans and dependents, it would seem logical that they would benefit Second World War veterans and dependents as well.

Every citizen of New Mexico takes solemn pride in the record our New Mexico boys have made in the present war.

What could have been more heroic than the gallant stand our boys of the Two Hundredth Coast Artillery made at Bataan and Corregidor? And I say this to you now: The Japs will pay dearly for the inhuman cruelties they have inflicted upon our brave sons, some of whom have survived the unspeakable degradations of the Jap prison camps and will return when the war is ended to become your comrades in the Legion.

Yes; the Japs will pay. They will pay dearly for their treachery and their bestiality.

All of us awaited with mingled emotions, with bated breath, the launching of the gigantic operations against Hitler and his fanatics, which will seal the doom of that madman and his dreams for world conquest. We are now under way and we will not be stopped short of complete victory.

We dread the cost in life and limb, yet we know it must be paid if our America is to be secure in a world where bandits have been striving to loot the possessions of freemen and to subjugate the nations rightfully owning them.

We must be prepared for heavy sacrifices. Fortress Europe is strongly defended, and our enemies are battle-toughened veterans, led by experienced generals.

The operations which we and our allies have launched will be the most gigantic and the most powerful which the history of warfare has ever known.

The battles will be fought to a conclusion—and we will win the final victory. This time we will also win the peace. The bandit nations will be disarmed for all time.

When that day comes again the veterans who comprise the American Legion can meet in their annual conventions and plan for the preservation of peace throughout the world. To that day and that planning, we all must look forward hopefully and with prayer in our hearts, but the day will come. I am confident that my friends in the New Mexico Department of the American Legion will be ready for it.

Service Men and Women—By All Means Keep Up Your Insurance After Discharge

---

OF

HON. ALVIN E. O'KONSKI

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. O'KONSKI. Mr. Speaker, I wish to give a message to service men and women: The chances are that you took out national service life insurance when you joined the Army and that you have been paying for it by having the premiums deducted from your monthly pay. If you possibly can, you should keep this insurance in force when you return to civil life. It is a valuable asset and provides protection for you and your family. If you let it lapse you will not be able to buy similar protection for the same cost.

To keep it in force you must do two things. First, pay the premiums direct.

Second, convert it, within a certain period, as explained below.

PAY PREMIUMS DIRECT TO VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION

Since premiums can no longer be deducted from your Army pay, you must now pay them direct. Make your check or money order payable to the Treasurer of the United States and mail it to the Collections Subdivision, Veterans' Administration, Washington, D. C. Pay the premiums even though a premium notice does not reach you. It is most important to give your full name, birth date, present address, policy number, and your Army serial number.

If you do not want to pay premiums monthly, you can arrange to pay quarterly, semiannually, or annually. However, any change in the method of payment of premiums must be approved by the Veterans' Administration. In other words, you must continue to pay them at the monthly rates until you have arranged with the Veterans' Administration to pay them on a quarterly, semiannual, or annual basis; otherwise, your policy might lapse. If you wish you can have the amount of insurance reduced, as long as the amount continued is in multiples of $500 and not less than $1,000.

CONVERT FORM "TERM" TO "LIFE"

As originally issued to you, your insurance was known as 5-year level premium-term insurance. This policy was good for only 5 years after it was issued. So before the 5 years are up you should convert, or in other words change over, to ordinary life, 20-payment life, or 30-payment life.

You can do this while the policy is in force and at any time after it has been in force 1 year, by applying to the Veterans' Administration. No medical examination is required. Although the premiums you pay on your new policy will be larger than you now pay, it will be worth your while to convert, for your original policy has no regular cash value. When you get your new policy, however, it will have regular cash value, after the first policy year, against which you can borrow if necessary.

If you become totally disabled before reaching 60 years of age, continue to pay your insurance premiums. After 6 months of such continuous disability, notify the Veterans' Administration. If disability is so established, further premiums will be waived and those you paid during the first 6 months of total disability will be refunded to you.

GETTING YOUR INSURANCE REINSTATED

Ordinarily, the premium for the month of discharge is deducted from your final pay settlement. Make a note of the date when the next premium is due—it is shown on your Form 53—and remember that you are given, for an emergency, a 31-day period beyond that date in which to make payment. If not paid within the 31-day period, your insurance will lapse, but you can have it reinstated within the next 6 months by paying the back premiums and filing a simple statement showing that you are in as good health as at the time of discharge.

Beyond 6 months, you must pass a physical examination before the insurance can be reinstated and this may be obtained free of charge at any Veterans' Administration office.

IN A NUTSHELL

Do not let your insurance lapse. Pay premiums direct. If it does lapse, get all or some of it reinstated if you possibly can. Be sure to keep the Veterans' Administration, Washington, D. C., advised of any change of permanent address. If you have any problems go to the nearest office of the Veterans' Administration.

PRIVATE LIFE INSURANCE

If, when you went into the service, you arranged to have premiums on your private life insurance guaranteed by the Government, remember that payments must be brought up to date within 2 years after your discharge. Your insurance company or the Veterans' Administration will answer any questions.

If you have any questions, write Congressman ALVIN E. O'KONSKI, House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

First County in Nation on Fifth War Loan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. CASE. Mr. Speaker, Gregory County, in the Second Congressional District of South Dakota, has the honor and distinction of being the first county in the United States to meet and pass its quota in the Fifth War Loan. The drive opened Saturday, June 3. By 8 o'clock that night, Gregory County was over the top.

That would be a remarkable record for any county—but listen to a word about Gregory County. Ten years ago, it was a disaster county. Drought, grasshoppers, and dust storms plagued it. Strictly a rural county of about 10,000 population with not a town of more than 1,250 people by the last census, it lost heavily in that dry cycle which ran from 1931 to 1940. It lost people, livestock, and money. But the people who could stay did stay. They are the staying kind, hard-working, thrifty, and honest.

Times turned better a few years ago. They have had good crops. Again the population has been depleted by workers going into defense industries and by boys going into the Army and Navy, but those at home have worked all the harder. Only on the 4th of July have they stopped working to turn out in crowds to see Army units that have visited them.

So when L. L. Lillibridge, county War loan chairman, got word of the quota for Gregory County he turned to the young boys and girls in the 4–H Clubs, led by Myron Barber, county agent. They lined up a few prize heifers and pigs to sell at bond auctions the day they opened the drive. Rains and bad roads held down attendance at the sales, but that did not stop these folks. When night came they had reached the goal and beat it.

Gregory County, S. Dak., Mr. Speaker, is a long way from the National Capital. It is a long way from any large city. It is not near any military or governmental center. But the hearts of these people beat with the hearts of the Americans everywhere. They want victory. They have little patience with strikes, work stoppages, or anything else that might delay victory. They want their boys to win the war and return home. And for their own part they are giving every possible effort to produce food and to perform the part of the job assigned to them. I am sure that you, Mr. Speaker, and other leaders of the Nation will want to join in congratulating the 4–H Clubs and the people of Gregory County on being first to meet their quota in the Fifth War loan.

Omniscient O'Konski

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALVIN E. O'KONSKI

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. O'KONSKI. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include in the RECORD an editorial from the Polk County Ledger, of Balsam Lake, Wis.:

"THE OMNISCIENT O'KONSKI"

There are quotations around the above heading because it is the title of an article that appeared in News Week, a magazine of more than a million circulation. Just so no one gets the wrong impression, the dictionary says "omniscient" means "a man of universal knowledge."

In an intelligence test given Congressmen by the United Press, a news-gathering organization, Congressman ALVIN E. O'KONSKI rated the highest of all Congressmen.

To a good many people O'KONSKI is a source of wonderment. He puzzles the conservatives and leftists alike. His votes are usually cast in a nonpartisan manner, except that he occasionally matches votes on some extremely ticklish issue. But more often than not his vote is the vote that you or I would cast.

But his letters to the public, published in a large number of newspapers in his district, are unmatched by any Washington newsletter we have ever seen. He usually picks out sensational subjects, writes them with an appeal to the common man who has a bit of grudge toward the wealthy or a grudge and/or contempt for politicians on the whole. He constantly repeats to better emphasize his points. Sometimes is inconsistent in his writings from one week to another. And probably has the greatest percentage of constituents reading his column of any Congressman writing a weekly letter.

He is constantly in touch with folks back home. He gets around 150 letters a day and even answers personally a post card addressed to him. Now he spends a great deal of time working on collection of moneys due servicemen, discharged servicemen, and servicemen's families and dependents. During the last year he has settled over a million and a half dollars' worth in claims.

Few agree with him or everything; a very few heartily dislike him; and many of his constituents are loyal supporters because he usually votes their way and because he always exerts every effort to give action on any legitimate complaint coming from his district regarding Federal affairs and gets surprising results.

O'KONSKI, we prophesy, will be reelected next fall. He will be elected by Republicans, Democrats, and Progressives, and what-have-you.

It has been many a moon since this congressional district has had a Representative in the limelight as much as O'KONSKI. He's the little man who's always there and always has something to say. He's an orator, partly by profession, and he knows what people want to say and how to tell it to them.

O'KONSKI will remain a "wonderment" to most voters. But they, like he, will throw party lines into the scrap pile, and vote for him again.

Contractors Guide for Termination of Contracts

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. SPARKMAN

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following publication of the War Department:

CONTRACTORS GUIDE—SUGGESTIONS TO WAR CONTRACTORS AS TO METHODS OF AND PREPARATION FOR CONTRACT TERMINATIONS APPLYING TO FIXED-PRICE SUPPLY CONTRACTS OF THE WAR DEPARTMENT

(Issued for war contractors by the War Department)

REQUIRED READING

Procurement Regulation 15, and the Termination Accounting Manual (TM 14–1005), are the official documents used by the War Department in connection with the termination of fixed-price supply contracts dealt with herein.

These documents, as originally published, and current amendments, may be obtained from the Superintendent of Documents, Government Printing Office, Washington, D. C., for a nominal fee.

The appendix of this booklet contains forms recently approved by the War Department for use in submitting the contractor's list of inventory, statement of charges, and settlement proposal.

The latest approved forms may be obtained from the procurement offices of the various War Department services.

Terminations and settlement of War Department contracts are effected by contracting officers of the following procurement services: Army Air Forces, Army Service Forces, Chemical Warfare Service, Corps of Engineers, Medical Department, Ordnance Department, Quartermaster Corps, Signal Corps, Transportation Corps.

MESSAGE TO WAR CONTRACTORS

Winning the war is our primary duty. Yet so long as the fighting lasts, the termination of war contracts is the task next in importance to American industry. This is true because in fluid war many contracts have to be terminated and new ones begun. Only in this fashion can the rapidly changing needs for new and better weapons be met promptly.

Victory depends in considerable degree on how flexible we can keep war production. The quick and efficient termination of contracts and the clearance of war plants for other work therefore has become an inseparable and vital part of the war supply program.

Here lies its immediate significance. There is also a future significance. The orderly and rapid transition tomorrow from war to peacetime economy depends on how well today we solve the mounting problems of contract termination.

Total terminations of all war contracts are inevitable. Nothing is surer. Industry must handle its share of the termination job today or it cannot expect to handle it tomorrow.

There is now a fortunate opportunity to learn how best to do the job before it strikes in full force. The War Department is building its termination organization and procedures in full recognition of this huge task ahead. To protect itself and the national economy, industry must use more of its best brains on the problem. It is a job for first-rate men. Industry can afford to lose no time in assigning these men, and in establishing a framework in which they are to operate.

If this is not done with the utmost dispatch, industrial plants will become clogged with surplus materials and organizations bogged down in a welter of detailed but nevertheless essential work.

This, in some industries, has already happened.

The urgency of the situation is the keynote of this message. The War Department does not settle a terminated contract until the contractor files his claim. In a surprisingly large sector of industry, this elementary task is not being speeded. As this is written, contractors are entitled to claim a half a billion dollars in settlement of contracts already terminated. On many contracts terminated 6 to 12 months ago contractors have still submitted no claims.

There are two factors chiefly responsible for these delays. The first is inexperience in organizing for termination and in training men to do the job. Education will remedy this.

The second factor is not so easily disposed of. Some contractors fail to give sufficiently serious attention to termination. It is still considered, in some quarters, a nebulous problem for some distant tomorrow. Until the termination problem is viewed as an immediate and current task, a pressing and critical part of winning the war, it will not be solved. This situation can only be remedied by a realistic and determined attitude on the part of industry.

This message is a warning that acute economic dislocation and widespread unemployment can result unless the multitude of complex problems inherent in termination are met and solved now. It is also an earnest invitation for full-strength cooperation of war contractors in our mutual task.

Once again, as in stepping up war production to the greatest peak the world has known, the industry-Army team has the opportunity to reach an achievement of which the Nation can justly be proud and upon the success of which the economic welfare of the Nation most assuredly depends.

For speedy settlement you must avoid these obstacles:

1. Failure to provide sufficient personnel in termination unit.
2. Failure to take inventory promptly.
3. Failure to secure and review subcontractors' claims promptly.
4. Failure to present termination claim properly on standard forms.
5. Failure to submit certified invoice or signed voucher after statement is approved.

PART I

I. PURPOSE AND SCOPE

It is the policy of the War Department to see that every contractor whose war contract is terminated for the convenience of the Government, is quickly and fairly compensated for the work which he has done under the contract, and that his plant is speedily cleared of materials rendered surplus by the termination, and of Government-owned machinery and equipment no longer needed in war production.

The purpose of this pamphlet is to assist the contractor to do his part in bringing about the fast, fair, and final settlement to which he is entitled. It is not a new set of termination instructions, interpretations, directives, or orders, nor does it supersede in any way the official War Department regulations (PR 15 and the Termination Accounting Manual) governing war-contract terminations and the accompanying disposal of surplus property. This publication explains briefly the A B C's of termination from the contractor's point of view, and suggests steps he may take before termination in relation to the Government, his own organization, and his subcontractors.

This publication is primarily prepared for use by contractors, not lawyers. Accordingly, it is not intended and should not be accepted as an authority on any legal question on which a controversy may arise.

The War Department has gained valuable knowledge from actual experience in terminating many supply contracts. It has been in close touch with leaders of American industry, with a cross-section of war contractors, and with national trade associations. The ideas and suggestions from these sources have been of great assistance in formulating and testing termination policies and procedures. This publication is a way of making this information available to all War Department contractors.

It is written for prime contractors holding fixed-price (sometimes called lump-sum) supply contracts with the War Department procurement services, and for their subcontractors. It is not intended to apply to cost-plus-a-fixed-fee contracts, service contracts, or construction contracts.

II. BASIS OF CONTRACT TERMINATION

The Government's privilege to terminate a war contract in whole or in part in order to meet military requirements is based upon a contractual right universally accepted as a reasonable and necessary method of protecting the Government from paying for work not yet performed and no longer needed because of changes in the military situation. It is not the policy of the Government to commit breaches of contract. It must, therefore, reserve the right in its war contracts to terminate them at any time upon conditions which will fairly compensate a contractor for his performance up to the date of termination. Terminations for the convenience of the Government should not be confused with cancelations due to a contractor's default, or with adjustments in contracts to permit changes in specifications or prices.

The War Department has long reserved the right in its contracts to terminate them for the convenience of the Government, but it was not until January 1944 that a termination article uniform for all Government procuring agencies was adopted. This uniform article was authorized for use in all new prime contracts for the manufacture of war supplies entered into after February 20, 1944. It is not mandatory for contracts of less than $500,000 which are to be completed within 6 months or for contracts of less than $50,000 regardless of the date of completion.

A majority of War Department contracts still contain the old War Department standard termination article in use prior to the adoption of the uniform article. For uniformity it is desirable that existing contracts be amended to insert the new uniform article. Contractors are entitled to such an amendment and may request it from their contracting officer.

III. METHODS OF SETTLEMENT

A comparison of the old War Department standard termination article and the new uniform termination article demonstrates certain advantages of the latter. Broadly speaking, the action required to be taken by contractors under both articles is substantially the same, but in the uniform article the provisions are spelled out in more detail and thus provide a clearer pattern for the contractor's action. The uniform article will be particularly valuable to those contractors who have contracts with more than one procuring agency. Under both of these articles there are two methods of settlement—by negotiation and by formula.

A. By negotiation

The uniform article contains full authority for the contractor and the contracting officer to agree upon an amount to be paid the contractor in either complete or partial settlement of his contract. It is intended that the settlement shall be a lump-sum agreement representing the best judgment of the contractor and the contracting officer of the compensation, including such reasonable profit as will be fair to the contractor under all the circumstances, for the work he has actually performed, including profit on articles or materials not processed by the contractor. The settlement should be arrived at quickly and fairly, and once signed without fraud, by representatives of both parties fully authorized to do so, it is binding in the same manner and extent as a similar agreement between private parties.

The negotiated settlement has definite advantages to the contractor. It is faster and brings about a quicker payment of claims. It is not bound by mandatory restrictions.

B. By formula

If the contractor and the contracting officer fail to agree upon a negotiated settlement of the whole or any part of a claim, the termination article provides a formula for determining the amount of the Government's obligation. While the negotiated settlement and the formula settlement are based upon the same information, a more detailed review and investigation of the records of the contractor will normally be made in the case of a formula settlement. Reasonable approximations or estimates which might be sufficient in a negotiated settlement are no longer appropriate. The burden of proof is on the contractor, and just as in court, he must prove the elements of his claim.

Under the uniform article, this formula provides for payment of the following amounts:

a. The contract price for completed articles delivered and accepted.

b. The cost of all other work.

c. The cost of settling and paying claims of subcontractors and of others against the contractor arising out of the termination of work under subcontracts or orders.

d. Reasonable termination expenses.

e. A profit based on the cost of work done by the contractor and computed in accordance with the percentages inserted in the termination article at the time of its inclusion in the contract. The amount of profit is subject to two limitations—(a) the profit to be allowed on articles or materials not processed by the contractor may not exceed 2 percent of their cost; (b) the total profit may not exceed 6 percent of the total costs incurred in performing the terminated portion of the contract exclusive of costs incurred in settling claims of subcontractors.

The determination of allowable costs must be made in accordance with the Statement of Principles for Determination of Costs Upon Termination of Government Fixed-price Supply Contracts which has been reprinted in PR 15-481 to 486. This statement of costs is expressly made applicable to formula settlements by the uniform termination article.

What Costs Can You Include?

Yes

If found to be reasonably necessary for and properly allocable to the terminated contract, and in accordance with the Statement of Principles for Determination of Costs Upon Termination of Government Fixed-price Supply Contracts approved by the Joint Contract Termination Board, December 31, 1943.

1. Cost of inventory.
2. Subcontractors' claims.
3. Depreciation.
4. Experimental and research expense.
5. Engineering and development and special tooling.
6. Loss on facilities.
7. Special leases.
8. Advertising.
9. Interest on borrowed funds.
10. Settlement expenses.
11. Protection and disposition of property.
12. Initial costs.

No

1. Losses on other contracts.
2. Expense of conversion to other uses.
3. Expenses due to negligence.
4. Costs in excess of those required for the contract.
5. Costs already allowed in renegotiation.

NOTE.—The termination claim plus the amount paid or payable on completed items may not exceed the sum of the total contract price and posttermination expenses.

IV. WHAT TO DO BEFORE TERMINATION

Time to get ready: Terminations are occurring now. They are occurring because of continuous changes in military requirements and in spite of increasing procurement in many lines. While numerous contracts will be completed according to schedule eventually nearly every war contractor will be confronted with the termination problem in one form or another. Today is the time to get ready for that eventuality. How quickly the Government can act in settling termination cases, depends entirely on how quickly the contractor does act, and gets his subcontractors to act.

"It is reported to us that in the past an average of 4 months has been required to get contractors to submit a claim. Only a part of this slowness can be laid to preoccupation with the war or to inadequacies of Government policy. Contractors will have only themselves to blame if they do not get set to handle the problems of termination." (Baruch-Hancock Report on War and Postwar Adjustment Policies, February 15, 1944.)

The Government can act only when the contractor has presented correct and sufficient facts on which mutual action is based. A clear understanding of, and a careful preparation for, termination will materially aid both parties in a prompt and efficient settlement.

Contract terminations and property disposal are based on facts. The success and speed of the job is based on men. Both Government and industry must have the right kind of representatives to act for them. For the contractor, as for the Government, these must be men armed with special knowledge and experience. But also, they must be men of sound judgment, intelligence, and courage who possess an open-minded and judicial attitude.

There follows a series of steps which are recommended to contractors. These steps, of course, are not universally applicable * * * many smaller firms will need to take only a few. Neither are these steps necessarily listed in the chronological order which all companies will find convenient to follow. And quite naturally, every contractor, to suit his special needs, will doubtless find certain steps he must take which are not listed here.

The War Department has established termination organizations in Washington and in its procurement offices in the field. Contractors should not hesitate to consult these regional offices in advance of termination. The contractor will also find it wise to keep in close touch, either personally or through his trade associations, with the actions of Government executive agencies and the Congress.

Steps to Take in Your Own Organization

Read the termination article in your contract thoroughly and understand it fully. This is indispensable.

Select an individual of executive level to head Termination Section, giving him the necessary staff after considering the probable size of your termination problem. See that necessary legal and accounting assistance is arranged for, if it is not already available.

It is evident that contractors generally do not realize the importance and size of the termination job, and do not provide adequate personnel to process their termination claims.

It is estimated that 75 percent of the probable settlement proposals based on terminations still unsettled, have not yet been presented to the War Department. Obviously the contractor cannot be paid, or even have his proposal considered, until he has prepared it in proper form. He should provide a staff adequate for this purpose in his own interest and to assist the Government in making prompt settlements.

Reasonable costs of the termination section actually applied to this work, properly proportioned to the several contracts, may be included in termination charges.

Make a thorough study of the methods by which your subcontracts and purchase orders can be identified with the prime contract to which they apply.

If you are a subcontractor know what Government contracts you are producing for, and the procurement office which has charge of them.

Study backlog of contracts with the Government and your subcontractors and reduce all letters of intent, informal orders or changes, verbal agreements, etc., to formal contracts or amendments to existing contracts.

Study your control system for production control, so that inventories will always be reasonable and termination will find them so. Where feasible, prepare lists of standard costs for parts, sub-assemblies or components. This will speed up the pricing of inventory of work-in-process.

See to it that there is an ample supply of cards, inventory tickets, vouchers, and any other forms needed to record inventory, to compile costs, etc., when termination occurs.

See that raw materials, purchased parts and work-in-process can be properly identified with the contracts or orders to which they apply.

Maintain records to show costs of all jigs, moulds, fixtures, gages, dies, patterns, etc., for which you expect reimbursement. Be prepared to identify them with the contracts to which they apply.

Segregate and protect all Government property and keep an accounting. Be sure it can be identified. Keep stock control records accurate and up to date.

Train personnel to take physical inventories. Experience indicates that the greatest delay, on the part of contractors, has occurred in preparing for and in the actual taking of inventories. Proper training and careful preparation can materially reduce the time required. Study the space requirements for storage of inventories. Investigate other storage facilities if room is not available in the plant.

Consider what types of materials and Government-owned production equipment you may desire to purchase if they become surplus upon termination of war contracts.

Assign personnel to study markets and potential sales of surplus property.

Become familiar with Government partial-payment and loan provisions and determine what financing, if any, is likely to be needed to pay off subcontractors, to buy raw materials and production equipment, and to take care of your own working-capital requirements.

Study probable effects of any termination on the size and composition of your labor force; develop a policy and program for effecting any adjustment in this force which may be required, giving special attention to the possibility of transferring any employees affected to other work within your establishment; and work out with the United States Employment Service, or other appropriate State or Federal agency, a plan under which any employees who must be released will be released in an orderly fashion and with the best possible provisions for their placement elsewhere.

Steps to Take With the Government

Consult the termination section of the procurement office with which your contract was negotiated about any particular termination problems which you anticipate.

If you have any large contracts which do not contain the uniform termination article, request the procurement office for the amendment of these contracts in order to insert the new article.

Keep currently informed as to the policies of the W. P. B., the O. P. A., the Surplus War Property Administrator, and other Government agencies outside the War Department concerning disposal of surplus property so as to have knowledge of action required when termination occurs.

If the procurement service is not familiar with your accounting practices, prepare a written statement covering your methods of cost keeping, distribution of overhead, and general accounting procedures for submission to the contracting officer. If this is available, it may make a complete audit unnecessary and permit the contractor's statements to be accepted with only spot checks and an office review.

Steps to Take With Subcontractors

Study the rights of subcontractors as outlined in PR 15–325.2.

Set up necessary procedures, prepare instructions and other forms for notifying subcontractors and suppliers when termination occurs. Such termination notices should be prepared and checked for proper legal form in advance. See PR 15–912.2.

Study forms of contracts and agreements with subcontractors and suppliers and as a general practice reduce all verbal and other informal commitments and agreements to proper legal form.

See that your subcontracts provide for termination.

When desirable, hold preliminary conferences with your subcontractors to discuss mutual problems and to urge preparation and education in advance of termination.

Be sure that your subcontractors understand what action they must take when they receive termination instructions from you.

Suggest that your subcontractors maintain inventories at a reasonable level consistent with production programs.

Make sure that your subcontractors understand the costs and charges for which they will be entitled to reimbursement on termination.

See that your subcontractors are prepared to account for, protect and store materials in their plants owned by you and the Government.

Prepare your subcontractors to assist you in the disposal of surplus materials remaining after termination.

Determine in advance, if possible, what financial assistance your subcontractors will need for themselves and for payment of claims made upon them.

See that your subcontractors are prepared with procedures, forms, notices, etc., so that they can take all necessary actions with reference to their subcontractors, and suppliers, suggested herein for you to take with reference to them.

If a Termination Notice Is Received—Take These Steps

Stop work.

Cancel subcontracts.

Notify local office of W. M. C. re surplus labor.

Consult contracting officer re completing work in process.

Cancel special and service contracts.

Notify your subcontractors re completing work in process.

Hold preliminary conference with contracting officer.

Take inventory.

Instruct employees on taking inventory.

Instruct your subcontractors re taking inventory.

Consult contracting officer re purchase or disposal (if loss involved).

Send required copies to contracting officer at once. Required copies to be filed with claim.

Determine values by contracts.

See that inventories are properly protected.

Account for Government property.

Forward list of Government-owned facilities.

Forward list of free issue materials on hand.

Consult contracting officer re purchase or disposal.

Consult contracting officer re removal or storage.

File your claim.

File all claims of subcontractors as directed.

Complete settlement agreement.

If funds are needed, file request for interim payment.

Transfer title to all inventories, etc., to Government.

Advance funds to your subcontractors if necessary.

PART 2

THE CONTRACTING OFFICER

In its contract relations the War Department generally acts through an agent called the contracting officer, who signs agreements and takes final action on behalf of the Government. Every terminated prime contract has a contracting officer designated to represent the Government in settling that contract. Legally the contracting officer is an individual having the authority to bind the Government. As a practical matter, however, the contracting officer has assisting him a team normally including a trained negotiator, lawyer, and accountants, and, where necessary, an engineer and other technical experts needed for the particular settlement. In his dealings with the Government the contractor is protected from arbitrary action on the part of any one individual by the constant participation of this group of trained experts.

Action 1. Pretermination meeting

The first step in a termination, where conditions permit, may be a meeting between representatives of the contractor and of the Government. The status of production and the extent to which it is economically feasible to terminate the contract are considered. Facts and procedures which will be of aid to the contractor and to the Government in carrying out the proposed termination are developed. In many cases, however, sudden changes in the military situation require the Government to act on the termination without the benefit of this pretermination meeting.

Action 2. The notice of termination

1. When to stop work.
2. What work to stop.
3. Stop work of subcontractors.
4. Stop work of suppliers.

The notice of termination is the means by which the Government exercises its contractual right to stop performance under the contract either in whole or in part. It is an official order signed by the contracting officer, either telegraphed or mailed to the contractor. It identifies the terminated contract, states the extent to which it is terminated, and may contain specific instructions as to the stopping of work, the termination of subcontracts, and the preparation of the contractor's statement of charges. Where a telegram is sent, it will generally be followed by a confirming letter containing complete instructions. The contracting officer who issues the notice of termination, may not always be the contracting officer who is to settle the contract; in such cases the notice generally indicates the procurement office designated to accomplish the settlement.

The notice of termination initiates the sequence of steps which the contractor must take to bring about the settlement of the terminated contract. The description of these steps which follows represents in general the chronological sequence of the settlement process. Normally these steps will be initiated by the contractor in the order stated, but efficient settlement methods require that action be taken on most of these steps simultaneously and that action on all of them be continuous and diligent throughout the course of the settlement.

In your own company: After receipt of the notice of termination the contractor, unless directed otherwise in the notice, should cease as promptly as is reasonably possible all further performance of the terminated portion of the contract. It is important to bear in mind that only a portion of the contract may have been terminated. If for any valid reason, the contractor either cannot cease production precisely as required by the order, or believes it to be contrary to the Government's interest to do so, such as where damage to materials or machinery will result, or where only a small amount of work is needed to convert useless semiprocessed materials into useful finished articles—he should immediately contact the contracting officer, and if some modification of the "cease work" order is agreed to, written confirmation should be obtained from the contracting officer.

With subcontractors: Not only must the contractor stop his own work promptly but he must also take prompt steps to terminate subcontracts and purchase orders affected. He should accomplish this in much the same manner in which the Government terminated the prime contract. It is essential that the Notice of Termination to each subcontractor identify the subcontract or purchase order on which the subcontractor is to stop work and make no further commitments of any kind. It is desirable that the notice also identify by number the Government contract which has been terminated and inform the subcontractor of the name of the procurement office having responsibility for the settlement of the prime contract. Similar notices of termination should in turn be issued without delay by each tier of subcontractors and suppliers having any connection with the terminated contract, so that the termination will reach down throughout all tiers of subcontractors and effectively stop all further work on the terminated contract.

All unused C. M. P. allocations should be returned to the agency or prime contractor from whom the allotment was received, and the regional office of the W. P. B. notified of all unused raw materials (controlled materials) on hand. Release of manpower should be reported to the regional office of the W. M. C.

Action 4. Preliminary conference

As soon as possible after receipt of the notice, a conference between the Government and the contractor will be arranged to discuss procedures and joint action and to determine a time schedule for the settlement of the contract. The importance of this meeting cannot be overemphasized. The contractor should go into this meeting prepared to present a rough estimate of his inventory and of the principal items of his claim. Discussion should commence at once in respect to the disposal of surplus property, the contractor indicating property which he desires to retain for his own use or which he believes can be sold to others, and the material which he believes should be scrapped. The speed with which the ultimate settlement can be reached will be determined to a very considerable extent by the aggressive action taken by contractor and Government personnel at this preliminary meeting. It is important, therefore, that this meeting should not be left to subordinates having no authority or responsibility. It will be desirable at this meeting for the contractor and the contracting officer to exchange lists of personnel who are authorized to act for each party.

Action 5. Partial payments

Neither prime contractors nor subcontractors are required to await final settlement of their claims before obtaining cash payments. Financing may be obtained through V and VT loans prior to termination, and the Government will make partial payments pending settlement as rapidly as a contractor furnishes the necessary information to support such payments.

For all completed articles delivered and accepted, immediate payment at the unit price of the contract will be made.

On the uncompleted portion of the contract, immediate payment on account will be made on the basis of partial claims or estimates of complete claims. Many items of the claim, such as approved subcontractors' claims, direct labor and materials, or termination expenses approved in advance by the contracting officer, can be readily and quickly demonstrated. Contractors desiring partial payments should prepare such portions of their claims immediately and submit them to the contracting officer. If approved, a simple supplementary agreement will be executed and the payment promptly made. Similarly, subcontractors may obtain partial payments from the Government through their prime contractor.

The contracting officer has full authority to make partial payments whenever he is satisfied that the payment is clearly within the entire amount due in connection with the termination. If any partial payment subsequently turns out to be in excess of the total amount due, the partial payment agreement provides that the excess with interest at 6 percent shall be repaid to the Government.

Action 6. Inventories

Clearance of plants: Termination frequently stops performance of the contract in midstream and leaves a considerable amount of surplus materials on hand allocable to the terminated contract. There may be materials in the contractor's plant on which he has done no work, on which he has done some work, or there may be subassemblies, assemblies and parts either partially or completely finished, various tools and equipment, and finally, completed articles.

Since the Government is liable for the cost of surplus property allocable to the terminated contract, its disposal is subject to the directions of the contracting officer. The Government may desire to take title to some of this property because of its strategic value; some of it the contractor will wish to retain; a great deal of it will have to be sold or scrapped.

It is the policy of the War Department that the contractor's plant shall be cleared of surplus property as soon as possible.

It is also the policy of the War Department that settlement and payment of contractors' claims shall not be delayed by reason of failure to dispose of property. Property not disposed of or taken over at the time of the settlement will be removed by the Government or arrangements made for its storage on the contractor's premises.

Limitation on inventories: The War Production Board polices C. M. P. regulations and may impose applicable penalties for deliberate infractions, but it does not look for enforcement of such regulations to the War Department contracting officers charged with settling terminated contracts. Contracting officers, therefore, may reach a decision, in accordance with the principles set forth in Procurement Regulation 15, as to the materials allocable to a contract in process of termination, without deciding whether such materials are in excess of any amount permitted by C. M. P. regulations of the War Production Board.

Before these policies can be made effective in a particular case, the contractor must do his part by preparing a list of the property which he claims is allocable to the contract and for the cost of which he intends to claim reimbursement. This is primarily the contractor's job, but he will have the close cooperation of the Government's representatives.

Divide and List

1. Raw materials, purchased parts, and supplies.
2. Work in process.
3. Production equipment, including tools, jigs, discs, fixtures, etc.

Listing of prime contractor's inventory: All items for which the contractor intends to charge costs to the Government should be first collected or otherwise identified to facilitate listing. Wherever practicable, these segregated materials should be kept under lock and key to avoid loss or inadvertent use for other purposes. In segregating these materials, it will be helpful to have in mind the classification indicated below which is required to be made in listing the inventory.

A descriptive inventory is then compiled of all such materials on the premises. Standard forms for this purpose are included in the appendix (Forms C-1, C-2, and C-3). Listing of the information on these forms will serve the twofold purpose of (a) inventory information necessary for settlement of the claim, and (b) disposition, removal, or storage of the property. This property is to be listed as follows:

a. Raw materials, purchased parts, and supplies;

b. Work in process; and

c. Production equipment, including tools, jigs, dies, fixtures, etc.

Property located in more than one plant should be listed by plants. Property owned by the Government and property owned by the contractor should be listed separately. Rejected or substandard materials should also be separately listed. No claims for rejected or substandard materials will be allowed which apply to articles already invoiced, but such materials when not excessive with respect to the work in process may be considered allocable to the terminated contract.

It is not necessary to complete an entire inventory listing before submitting any part of it. Partial lists will expedite (a) obtaining approval from the contracting officer for the retention of property by the contractor, (b) removal of property for use by the Government or to storage, (c) disposal of property, and (d) obtaining partial payments.

Subcontractors' inventories: Subcontractors should take the same steps with respect to their inventories as the prime contractor takes with his. The same procedures and forms are applicable, and uniformity in this matter will greatly facilitate settlement of subcontractors' claims.

It is the prime contractor's job to instruct subcontractors in the preparation of their inventories and to see that these inventories are submitted to the prime contractor promptly for review by him and by the contracting officer if he requires it. The extent to which the prime contractor should review or check subcontractors' inventory schedules, is dependent on his knowledge of the subcontractor's personnel and business methods. In this situation, he stands in exactly the same position in relation to his subcontractors as the Government stands in relation to him.

Care should be taken in all cases that no materials are inadvertently listed on both the prime and subcontractor's inventory.

NOTE.—Where the contractor's claim is less than $10,000 gross, a combination form (A-2 or A-3—"green") is available, which combines the settlement proposal, the contractor's own charges and the listing of the inventory. For small claims (less than $500 net) a short form (A-4—"pink") is available.

The term "gross" is used to indicate the amount claimed before deducting credits arising from the sale or retention of property. The term "net" is used to indicate the amount remaining after such deduction.

Action 7. Disposal of surpluses

The disposal of surplus materials is a cooperative effort between the contractor and the Government. The contractor's knowledge of industrial and commercial channels of disposition as well as ceiling and market prices are of great value to Government officers in the orderly return of materials to productive uses. Particularly should all inventories applying to claims of less than $10,000 gross be disposed of in place. It is not desired to move into storage any such inventories.

In many cases blanket approval may be obtained in advance from the contracting officer to retain materials at no cost to the Government (i. e., where the cost of such property will be excluded from the claim) or to dispose of all materials at a price not less than a specified percentage of cost.

The contractor is responsible to the Government, while the property is in his possession, for proper storage and protection of all Government materials and of all materials on which he will make a claim against the Government. The contractor may, unless the contract otherwise provides, at any time after notice of termination, remove and store such property at his own risk and expense.

The 60-day policy: Property not disposed of within 60 days after it is first reported on an inventory list will be removed by the Government, upon demand of the prime contractor, or a storage agreement entered into with him. If, after demand of the prime contractor, the property is not removed or a storage agreement executed, the prime contractor may store the property at the expense and risk of the Government. It is essential, however, that he take reasonable precautions for the protection of the property and notify the contracting officer of the action taken. Records should be kept by the contractor to show the costs of protection, removal, and storage for which the Government will be responsible.

The Sequence of Disposal

The disposition of surplus materials will generally be undertaken in the following sequence:

1. Obtain approval from the contracting officer for surplus material the contractor wishes to retain or sell at no cost to the Government, but care must be taken to conform with W. P. B. and other Government agency regulations.

2. Submit contractor's own bid for materials he wants to retain at less than cost, with description, cost, proposed prices and reason for any reduction from market price. It is suggested that the contractor secure quotations from other parties on such items to justify the price he has offered.

3. Return materials to original suppliers if they will give full credit, unless otherwise directed by the contracting officer. If the amount charged to the Government by the contractor is no more than the transportation and packing expenses for shipment to contractor and return to suppliers, it is assumed that full credit has been obtained.

4. Obtain and submit the best quotations from original suppliers, other prospective buyers, or dealers who will buy part of the remaining materials.

5. Report to the contracting officer materials of value only as scrap. After the contracting officer has given written approval for the sale of materials, the contractor should:

6. Complete the transaction with purchaser, as approved.

7. Credit the proceeds of sale against his claim, or transmit proceeds to the Government, when required.

8. If sale as scrap is approved, obtain necessary warranty from the purchaser that the property will in fact be used as scrap.

These procedures should also be followed by subcontractors in the disposal of surplus property resulting from the termination of their contracts. The privilege of prime contractors, however, to store property not removed on demand, at the expense and risk of the Government, has not been extended to subcontractors. Subcontractors having a storage problem should consult, as to the proper procedure, the contractor who placed the particular order or contact.

Action 8. Subcontractor's claims

The settlement of subcontractor's claims should never await the settlement of the prime contract. A contractor in the contractual claim should act promptly in passing on the claim of his subcontractors when presented for approval. He should without delay pass the proposed settlement, if approved by him, up through the contractual chain to the prime contractor regardless of the status of his own claim.

Full cooperation among contractors to speed this process is essential. If any subcontractor finds a lack of cooperation in the contractors above him, he should report this matter directly to the contracting officer.

A prime contractor must review and certify his subcontractors' statements in the same manner and with the same care as he certified their inventories, before presenting them to the contracting officer. He should take into account the efficiency of the subcontractor's cost and inventory methods and general reliability in order to determine the extent to which auditing is required in each case. Claim forms included in the appendix and discussed below in connection with the prime contractor's claims, are suitable for use by subcontractors. Use of these forms will greatly facilitate the swift settlement of their claims. Subcontractors will often require special assistance from the prime contractor in preparing their statements. The War Department does not under existing regulations make direct settlements with subcontractors but will confer with them in cases of particular hardship or difficulty.

You Can Act Now With Your Subs

Under certain conditions the contracting officer may authorize the contractor to make final settlement of any subcontractor's claim of less than $10,000 gross without submitting such settlement for his approval.

It is recognized that subcontracts in many cases may contain termination provisions differing in material respects from the uniform termination article, or may contain no termination provisions whatever. Nevertheless, it is obvious that proposed settlements with subcontractors for amounts not more than would be paid under the uniform termination article, will be acted upon by the contracting officer more promptly than settlements on some other basis.

Action 9. The prime contractor's claims

The two methods: As early as possible in the settlement process the contractor should commence the preparation of the statement of his own charges incurred prior to termination. There are two alternative methods which he may follow: (a) The more usual and distinctly preferable method is the inventory method. Under this method the costs applicable to the uncompleted portion of the contract are determined by pricing the inventory in detail. A profit allowance is then added. (b) In the absence of unit cost information or when the contract is terminated in the early stages of performance, an alternative method known as the total cost method may be used. Under this method the total costs on the contract to the date of termination are computed and a profit allowance added. Deduction is then made for all amounts paid or to be paid for completed articles. No departure from one or the other of these methods should be made without the approval of the contracting officer.

Costs and charges: In preparing his statement of charges the contractor may include all direct and indirect manufacturing, selling, distribution, and administrative costs incurred which were reasonably necessary for the performance of the contract, and properly allocable to it. The contractor should state the amount of profit to which he believes he is entitled on the work done by him under the contract, and the basis of computation of the amount of profit claimed.

The contractor should see that his costs and charges are reasonable and in line with sound accounting practices. Excessive amounts will be rejected in the negotiations and will suggest further investigation, audit, check and review, and thus hold up progress of the case. Detailed instructions as to the inclusion and exclusion of particular items of cost are set forth in PR 15-482 to 486.

The contractor would be well advised where he does not have sufficient trained accountants in his own employ to make use of independent certified public accountants in the preparation of this statement; if approved by the contracting officer, this expense may be charged to the Government. The contractor will also have the assistance of the contracting officer's accounting personnel to instruct him in the manner of presenting the information required.

Proposal for settlement: As soon as all charges are in, including subcontractors' claims and termination expenses, the contractor should prepare his proposal for settlement on Form A-1 (see standard forms included in the Appendix). This form summarizes the settlement of subcontractors' claims, disposal of property and any adjustments agreed to as a result of the preliminary negotiations. The form for presenting the contractor's statement of his own charges is Form B-1, inventory basis; or Form B-2, total cost basis. These are supporting schedules for Form A-1. This statement should be submitted as soon as the contractor (prime or sub) has completed the calculation of his own charges and without waiting for the settlement of subcontractors' claims and the completion of property disposal transactions. Accounting reviews and negotiation of settlements will be greatly facilitated by the use of these standard forms. In exceptional cases, where it is impracticable to use these standard forms, the contractor may request the contracting officer's approval for the use of a special form.

Where the contractor's claim is for less than $10,000 gross, a combination form (A-2 or A-3—"green") may be used which combines in one step and one form (a) submission of the list of inventory, (b) the statement of the contractor's own charges, and (c) his settlement proposal.

In addition a short form (A-4—"pink") is provided and may be used when the contractor's claim is less than $500 net.

Upon submission of the proposal for settlement, the case will be ready for the final meeting between fully authorized representatives of the contractor and of the Government. At this meeting, the final amount of the Government's obligation should be determined.

Action 10. Final settlement

When a lump sum settlement has been agreed to, a settlement agreement will be promptly prepared by the contracting officer. After signature by both parties, the contractor should present to the contracting officer the required certified invoice or signed voucher covering the amount due him, and payment will be made.

If the contractor and the contracting officer are unable to settle the case by negotiation, or if the contractor delays the settlement of the case for an unreasonable length of time, the contracting officer will give the contractor written notice that the case is to be settled by the formula and that the contractor is to submit all evidence bearing on his claim. The contracting officer may conduct further audits and investigations on all issues that were revealed, by negotiation, to be in dispute; if necessary, a hearing may be held at which oral testimony is presented. On the basis of all evidence furnished, the contracting officer will make a determination, supported by appropriate findings of fact, of the amount due the contractor in accordance with the formula.

Questions of fact relating to formula determinations are subject to decision by the contracting officer under the usual disputes article and appeal from his decision may be taken to the War Department Board of Contract Appeals.

Records: The prime contractor and all subcontractors should preserve for a period of at least 3 years after final settlement, all books, records, documents, and other evidence bearing on the costs and expenses of the contractor under the terminated contract, and necessary data (such as bids solicited and received) relating to the disposal of property by the contractor.

CONCLUSION

The cooperative achievements by Government on the one hand and by industry on the other have been outstanding in solving the problem of production. Production will continue to be of prime importance until the war is won.

Delay in reaching prompt settlements of terminated war contracts, and delay in promptly clearing surplus property from war plants, must not be allowed to impede production of needed materials.

It is essential that the same cooperative effort be applied by both Government and industry to this problem of contract settlement and property disposal. It is hoped that this pamphlet will be of some assistance in pointing out various aspects of the problem and in stimulating the thought and energy of all concerned in its solution.

Extension of Emergency Price Control and Stabilization Acts of 1942

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SAMUEL DICKSTEIN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 21, 1944

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, while I am not quite satisfied with every particular of the bill S. 1764 extending the life of the O. P. A. as it finally emerged from our debates as well as the conference committee, nevertheless I feel that I shall vote for the conference report as I do not see any other way to protect the American consumer.

All of us who are old enough to remember the run-away inflation after the last war feel that the only possible way by which our economy may be preserved is by the continuance of the O. P. A. I am well aware of the fact that the O. P. A. is not a perfect organization; I am well aware of the fact that an organization employing thousands of people may have some who are not up to standard or who are not competent enough to hold such jobs. But, by and large, the O. P. A. has done a fairly good job.

Chester Bowles is as competent an Administrator as can be found anywhere in this country. His staff is conscientious, hard-working, and on the whole intelligently alert to their duties. At any rate, we must have price control, if we want to maintain our economy, and we must have rent control, if we want to prevent a situation which developed after the last war, where in my district alone 40,000 tenants were facing eviction because of the rapacity of their landlords.

We must always bear in mind that economic affairs tend to produce inflation whenever there is a scarcity of consumer goods, and an oversupply of available cash. There is no question that the income of the American people has risen sharply since the war, and that production of some ordinary consumer goods has been steadily diminishing.

We do not wish to impose on the American people any greater restrictions than are necessary for that purpose. We must hold the line, and the purpose of the bill is accomplished, if we are able to maintain a status quo.

We could have made our price-control bill more drastic, we could have imposed more severe penalties for violations but it was the consensus of opinion that the important thing to do would be to continue price control, and give the people an opportunity of going to court if dissatisfied with decisions of the administrative agencies.

The court to which the people may go on appeal from decisions of the various administrative agencies is the Emergency Court of Appeals. It was necessary to provide this type of a court, since otherwise jurisdiction to pass on appeals would be scattered among the 85 district courts of the United States; and how could we expect any uniformity of decisions, if scattered among all these courts? However, the Emergency Court of Appeals is a special court and is an independent court and by no means bound to sustain O. P. A. officials when they are not right.

This emergency court is just as independent as any court of the United States and, I am sure, will correct any abuses or any errors which the O. P. A. may possibly commit.

As I said before, even with the best of intentions and the most efficient staff, it is impossible for the O. P. A. to be always right. Therefore, this court.

The judges of this court will in due course become very proficient technically, and, as orders and regulations of the O. P. A. will be submitted to their adjudication, they will become more and more efficient and will eventually create a fine body of law which will streamline O. P. A. procedures and will make every consumer very well acquainted with what is required of him.

The bill as it finally emerged from the conference committee is necessarily a compromise. I am voting for it in the spirit of compromise and only because I feel that either this bill should pass or we shall not have price control, and a run-away inflation will follow.

Teamwork Wins

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SAM HOBBS
OF ALABAMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. HOBBS. Mr. Speaker, it has been truly said that cooperation is winning the war. We saw it demonstrated in the invasion and subjugation of north Africa. We see it again as we sweep the Pacific on our way to the Philippines and Tokyo. We see it day by day not only in the Pacific and the seven seas but also in the air above them and on every battle line the world around. All honor to these heroes who have left their homes and the lands of their nativities to win their deathless glory.

These, however, are not the only heroes. There are other battlefields where cooperation is helping to win this war, speeding victory, and saving innumerable lives. The transportation front is one of those. Without this, it is not too much to say that victory elsewhere might be doubtful. In our own fair land, as yet untouched by bomb, the railroad corps is winning its battle on the transportation front. Whether on the rails, in yards, shops, depots, or offices, the spirit of cooperation has welded these men of steel into a fighting force unconquerable, daily doing the impossible.

All honor to these railroad men of America as well as to every other fighting man who is winning the war.

From the Washington Star of June 23, 1944, let me read you a thrilling editorial paying tribute to them and to their marvelous record:

A FINE RECORD

Usually the annual E. H. Harriman memorial medals for safety leadership are granted to individual railroads, but it has been decided that this year there will be a special collective award as well. Nothing could be more fitting. With 500,000 fewer freight cars and 22,000 fewer locomotives, the railroads of America have handled 55 percent more freight during this war than during the last; yet, as the American Museum of Safety reports, even though their job thus has been twice as big this time, they have done it with only one-fourth the fatal accident rate. In transporting passengers last year, they traveled 64 percent more miles than in 1942, and 269 percent more than in 1940. Even so, despite this enormous traffic increase, the 1943 fatality record was only 2.97 per billion passenger miles. These statistics speak pretty much for themselves. Wholly apart from their great and spectacular physical contribution directly to the war effort—a contribution without precedent in our history—the railroads have made a superb showing in the field of safety. As an outstanding example of private enterprise carrying out a huge and complex task with remarkable care and efficiency, they can well afford to be proud of themselves, and the Nation as a whole can be proud of them, too.

The G. I. Bill of Rights

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EUGENE WORLEY
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. WORLEY. Mr. Speaker, this Nation owes a debt to the veterans of this war. It is not possible for this obligation to be measured in dollars and cents but the duty to evidence the Nation's grateful appreciation to the eleven million men and women of the armed forces still exists.

After the last war proper provision was not made for the veterans and their dependents. But this time the story will be different. This time the returning veteran will not have to stand in bread lines nor ask for a dole, nor stand on the street corner with a tin cup.

The Congress of the United States, fully aware of its obligations and responsibilities, has enacted the G. I. bill of rights and I am glad to have had a part in its passage. One can see at a glance that the Government of the United States is liberal with those who are wearing and have worn the uniform of their country; our servicemen are the best paid and the best equipped in the world; our veterans and their dependents receive more adequate care than any others in the world. Because of the different kind of warfare which has developed, the needs will change and many future requirements will have to be met, but our immediate duty is to help them readjust their lives to the new conditions that have been imposed upon them.

ALLOTMENTS AND ALLOWANCES FOR DEPENDENTS

Dependents of all grades of enlisted men and aviation cadets of the Army and Navy are eligible to receive a dependent's allowance from the Government in addition to the serviceman's allotment. Those men and women serving as officers come under another system. The allowances provided by the Government are as follows:

Class A dependents: A wife, $50; a wife and one child, $80; each additional child, $20. A divorced wife, $42; a divorced wife and one child, $72, and $20 for each additional child. Note: If the divorce or separation order of the court does not call for alimony or separate maintenance, the wife will not receive any allotment, and in case of a court order providing alimony or separate maintenance, she will get no more than the amount fixed by the court.

Class B dependents: The dependent must prove that he or she is substantially but not completely dependent upon the serviceman for support. A parent, $37; two parents, $37; a parent and any number of brothers and sisters, $37; two parents and any number of brothers and sisters, $37.

Class B–1 dependents: The dependent must prove that he or she is completely dependent upon the serviceman for support. One parent, $50; one parent and one brother or sister, $68; one parent and each additional brother or sister, $50 plus $11 for each brother or sister; two parents, $68; two parents and one brother or sister, $68 plus $11 for each brother or sister; a brother or sister but no parents, $42; each additional brother or sister without parents, $11.

It is important that men and women with dependents make application through their commanding officers for allotment and allowance, as these benefits will begin the date application is filed. Allotments are compulsory only for class A dependents. If the service man or woman for some reason or other fails to make application or is in a position where he or she cannot make application, any class A dependent can make application instead. The Army requires their regular application blank to be filled out; the Navy requires merely a letter giving the name of applicant's wife and children and dates of birth. In case a man is reported missing in action, the allotment and allowance continue to be paid for a period of a year, unless in the meantime his status is definitely determined.

Parents and brothers and sisters who can prove dependency can receive an allowance at the same time as wife and children. Parents can get an allowance from more than one son or daughter in the service. For instance, if two parents are greatly dependent upon a son or daughter in the service, they get $68 per month. Now, if another son or daughter in the service helped support these same parents, they can get another $37 from the second son or daughter.

The agency for the Navy having jurisdiction over allotments and allowances is: Bureau of Naval Personnel, Navy Department, Washington 25, D. C.; the agency for the Army is: Office of Dependency Benefits, War Department, 213 Washington Street, Newark, N. J. If you experience any difficulty contact your Congressman.

TEMPORARY AID FOR DEPENDENTS OF SERVICEMEN

Sometimes cases of extreme hardship arise involving dependents of servicemen. Many dependents, and even members of the armed forces themselves, are not fully acquainted with the two emergency agencies set up for the express purpose of helping such persons in need. These two agencies have branches all over the country. They are the Army Emergency Relief Fund, whose functions have recently been assigned to the Red Cross, and the Navy Relief Society, which also can be reached through the Red Cross.

ARMY RELIEF FUND

Any member of the armed forces in the Army can appeal to the Army Relief Fund, represented in all camps, or through the Red Cross if the soldier is not at camp, for needed immediate financial assistance. He will receive courteous and willing assistance at all times. The fund is also open to all dependents of men and women in the Army and anyone needing relief should get in touch at once with this fund through the local Red Cross.

NAVY RELIEF SOCIETY

Any serviceman or servicewoman in our naval forces or his dependents can appeal to this agency for urgent financial assistance. To get immediate action, it is advisable to take the case up through the Red Cross.

MUSTERING-OUT PAY

This benefit is payable to all honorably discharged personnel of our services whose rank is below captain in the Army, and lieutenant senior grade in the Navy. Payments are made in the following sums: Personnel with less than 60 days' active service, $100; personnel with 60 days' or more active service, none of which was outside continental United States or Alaska, $200; personnel with 60 days' or more active service, any part of which was outside continental United States or Alaska, $300. Whenever mustering-out payments amount to more than $100, payments are made in monthly intervals of $100 each. Servicemen who are discharged at their own request are not entitled to mustering-out pay.

FREE MEDICAL AND NURSING CARE FOR WIVES AND INFANTS OF MEN IN ARMED FORCES

In most States through cooperation with the Federal Government, a wife of any man in service may receive prenatal care from a qualified doctor at her home or at the doctor's office. At childbirth, whether the wife of the man in service stays at home or goes to a hospital, she and her baby can receive free medical and nursing care. Complete maternity care is provided, including a physical examination 6 weeks after the baby is born. Besides all this, the baby is entitled to free medical care during the first year of life.

The wife should see a doctor at the first sign of pregnancy. She should then ask the doctor for an application form to apply for this free service if it is provided in that State. Fill out the application blank carefully. Be sure to include your husband's serial number. The wife fills in part 1 of the blank. Ask your doctor to fill in part 2. In the case of emergency, be sure that the doctor makes application for you within 48 hours after service is rendered. If the application is not made within 48 hours, no bills for medical or hospital service will be paid. The charges are paid directly to the hospital and the doctor and the nurse; no money is given to the wife. This service is extended to wives and infants of servicemen in Hawaii, Puerto Rico, and Alaska, but not to any other foreign country.

SERVICE-CONNECTED DISABILITY PENSIONS

Our honorably discharged veterans of all wars are entitled to a pension for disabilities incurred in or aggravated by their service in line of duty. The rates range from $10 per month for 10-percent disability to $100 per month for total disability. Special rates are payable for specific losses, such as a hand, foot, or eye, blindness, and so forth, the highest rate being $250 per month.

The disability claim is filed by the veteran for benefits payable to him as the result of injury or disease resulting from military service. The award of compensation is based on the degree of disability which is determined according to the Veterans' Administration schedule provisions. Any disability, except misconduct, is compensable if it is as much as 10-percent disabling. This application is known as Form 526. It is simple to execute and seldom does one have any trouble answering the questions. Additional evidence is seldom required. This is particularly true on the adjudication of the initial claim. No subsequent formal claim need be filed. If the veteran is dissatisfied with his present rating, he can submit medical evidence to this effect.

However, it should be borne in mind that the doctor's statement must state not only his diagnosis but sufficient findings to warrant it. It is essential that this evidence show, or at least indicate, a higher degree of disability than the present evaluation. Upon receipt of competent medical evidence, the Veterans' Claim Service will authorize an official physical examination for rating purposes, thereby reopening the case for further consideration.

Except in cases of members of the military or naval service transferred from one Veterans' Administration facility to another, and except in cases of enlisted men discharged for disability whose claims, with essential service and medical records, are forwarded to area offices for settlement, veterans should file claim on proper form which will be supplied them by any Veterans' Administration facility, or the local representative of the American Red Cross. If the disabled person is insane or incompetent, the manager of the Veterans' Administration facility will file all necessary claims for him.

READJUSTMENT TO CIVIL LIFE

One of the provisions of the so-called G. I. bill of rights offers an education to any man who served for a period of 90 days, on or after September 16, 1940, and prior to the termination of the present war, and who was discharged under conditions other than dishonorable, and who was not over 25 years of age at the time he entered the service. Application must be made therefor within 2 years after discharge. The Government will pay to the school of the veteran's choice up to $500 per year for tuition and books, and will pay to the veteran $50 per month maintenance if without dependents and $75 if he has dependents. In no event shall the total period of education exceed 4 years. There is also a provision for part-time attendance in a course of education or training at a reduced subsistence allowance or without allowance but with payment of tuition and other expenses.

A veteran also has the right to vocational education for service-incurred disabilities, extended to those who served during the period from September 16, 1940, to December 6, 1941.

Application for education and training should be made to the Director, Servicemen's Education and Training, Veterans' Administration, Washington, D. C.

Adequate hospital facilities are provided for the care and treatment of veterans for nonservice disabilities or diseases as well as for disabilities or diseases incurred in service.

The veteran has the right to adequate prosthetic appliances and necessary training to effect the greatest possible benefits in the use of such appliances.

A veteran has the right of review in cases of irregular discharge or release from active service, (a) by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to determine whether the person at time of committing the offense was insane, in event of which determination benefits to which the person would otherwise be entitled shall not be forfeited; (b) except in case of separation by sentence of general court martial, any enlisted man or officer may have a review by an authorized board to determine the correctness of such discharge or dismissal; (c) any officer retired or released to inactive status without pay may likewise have a review by an authorized board to determine retirement rights.

Under both (b) and (c) above, the claim for review must be filed within 15 years after discharge or dismissal or within 15 years after the effective date of the act, whichever be the later.

Loans provided for the above-mentioned purposes or for the alteration or improvement of buildings or equipment may be guaranteed not to exceed 50 percent of the loan, the total amount guaranteed as to any one person not exceeding an aggregate of $2,000. Loans may be made by an individual or by private or public—State or Federal—lending agencies or institutions. The interest rate must not exceed 4 percent. The loan must be practicable and suitable to veterans' circumstances. The loan must be repaid in 20 years. Application must be made to the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, Veterans' Administration, Washington, D. C.

A veteran of any war, honorably discharged from any one of the services, has the right to register for employment and for placement in employment by the Veterans' Employment Service. He should contact his local United States Employment Office in his home town or county.

There is also a provision for unemployment allowances of $20 per week while unemployed. To be eligible, the person must reside in the United States, be completely unemployed, or, if partially unemployed, at wages less than $23 per week, be registered with and report to a public employment office, be able to work, and available for suitable work.

Any person will be disqualified if he leaves suitable work voluntarily without good cause or is suspended or discharged for misconduct; if he, without good cause, fails to apply for suitable work offered; if he fails, without good cause, to attend an available free training course; if he is participating in a strike or labor dispute causing a work stoppage.

BENEFITS FOR DEPENDENTS AS A RESULT OF LOSS OF SON, DAUGHTER, HUSBAND, OR FATHER

There are four money benefits provided for the dependents of a deceased veteran: 6 months' gratuity payment, monthly insurance payments—if the serviceman applied for insurance—monthly pension, and back pay.

The gratuity is a lump-sum payment equal to 6 months' pay at the rate received at the date of death. In addition, the dependents of any private or seaman who dies in foreign service receive 20 percent of his base pay, and the dependents of any officer who dies in foreign service receive 10 percent of his base pay. If the serviceman was in either the flying service or submarine service, his dependents receive, in addition, 50 percent of his base pay. There is also a longevity provision in addition to the above amounts.

The gratuity is automatically paid to a wife of a deceased veteran, or if there is no wife, it is automatically paid to the surviving child or children. It is not automatically paid to parents or brothers or sisters of an unmarried serviceman. The serviceman should designate someone of this latter class to receive it; however, if he does not, they may apply for it. If two parents survive, the amount is divided between them. A grandparent must show an insurable interest in order to receive it.

Application should be made by the surviving relative of a soldier to Gratuity Pay Branch, Finance Office, United States Army, 60 Florida Avenue NE., Washington, D. C.; by the surviving relative of a seaman to Bureau of Naval Personnel, Navy Department, Washington 25, D. C.

This insurance is not paid in a lump sum; it is paid on a monthly basis, depending on the age of the beneficiary—the older the beneficiary, the higher is each monthly payment. On a $10,000 policy, if the beneficiary to whom payment is first made is under 30 years of age at the date of death of the insured, payments shall be made in 240 equal monthly installments, at the rate of $5.51 for each $1,000 of insurance. If the beneficiary to whom payment is first made is 30 or more years of age at the date of death of the insured payment shall be made in equal monthly installments for 120 months certain, with such payment in installments continuing during the remaining lifetime of such beneficiary. For instance, under a $10,000 policy, a 50-year-old beneficiary will get $53.90 monthly. Under the same policy a 70-year-old beneficiary will get $35.10 monthly, and so forth.

It would be well to have parents and next of kin check with the men and women in service to see that all insurance policies are in order and in the hands of the beneficiaries. An insurance policy taken out by men and women in service can name any of the following as beneficiaries: Wife, husband, child, stepchild, illegitimate child, parents, brother, or sister, including those of half blood. There is nothing to prevent a parent or brother or sister from being the beneficiary of more than one serviceman.

All dependents and next of kin ought to check their insurance policy now. See that everything is in order now. It might save a lot of grief in the future. Negligence has caused many a beneficiary to lose out. A little care can avoid a lot of trouble should anything happen. I would suggest that you send your serviceman this pamphlet so that he may check all matters pertaining to his beneficiaries.

This pension is paid automatically to a wife and children. All children under 18 are eligible. Children up to 21 are eligible if they are in school up to that time. If a child marries before 18 or 21, they are not eligible for this pension. Parents who have been dependent upon the deceased man or woman in service are also entitled to a pension. Parents who have been dependent upon a deceased serviceman can get a pension at the same time his wife and children are getting a pension. The amounts of the monthly pension are as follows:

One parent, $45 a month. Two parents, $25 each. Widow but no child, $50; widow with one child, $65, with $13 for each additional child. No widow but one child, $25; no widow but two children, $38; no widow but two children, $38 equally divided, with $10 for each additional child, the total not to exceed $100.

The fact that a widow, a child, or parents gets the insurance does not prevent them from getting a pension also. They can collect both insurance and a pension.

When a casualty occurs, that service man or woman who has become a casualty may have back pay coming. All this back pay is paid to the nearest heir. Application should be made by the surviving relative of a soldier to—Finance Officer, United States Army, 60 Florida Avenue NE., Washington, D. C.; by the surviving relative of a seaman to Bureau of Naval Personnel, Navy Department, Washington 25, D. C.

Any person may make application for a headstone for the grave of any veteran of any one of the Army or Navy services whose service was honorable, to the Quartermaster General, War Department, Washington 25, D. C.

After honorable service, reimbursement for burial may be allowed, not exceeding $100, on burial, funeral, and transportation expenses. Application should be made to Director, Dependent Claims, Service, Veterans' Administration, Washington 25, D. C.

Burial in a national cemetery may be arranged for any honorably discharged veteran or for anyone who dies while in active service, with right of burial therein of his wife or widow, and under certain circumstances, his minor children or adult unmarried daughters.

WRITE FOR OTHER INFORMATION

It is practically impossible to cover briefly all the details of benefits available to veterans of this and previous wars. I have tried to outline the benefits relating primarily to World War No. 2 veterans, as many pamphlets are available covering the provisions for veterans of other wars. I offer this digest mainly as a helpful guide to servicemen and their dependents. If anyone has special questions or individual problems not covered in this summary, I shall be glad for you to write to me personally at the following address: Congressman EUGENE WORLEY, House Office Building, Washington, D. C. If you have no particular interest in this pamphlet, please pass it on to a friend.

Wartime Sabotage

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SAM HOBBS

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. HOBBS. Mr. Speaker, the Rules Committee of the House of Representatives has granted a rule making in order the consideration of the bill, H. R. 3442. This is an exceedingly important bill. The issues raised by the minority reports on which the Committee on the Judiciary is so evenly divided, challenge the careful thought of every Member of Congress. Therefore, I invite the study of Report No. 843 and the minority reports. They are as follows:

REPORT NO. 843—AMENDING THE SABOTAGE LAW (WARTIME)

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3442) to amend sections 1, 2, and 3 of the act entitled "An act to punish the willful injury or destruction of war material, or of war premises or utilities used in connection with war material, and for other purposes," approved April 20, 1918, as amended (40 Stat. 533; U. S. C., title 50, secs. 101, 102, and 103), having considered the same, report the bill favorably to the House with amendments, with the recommendation that, as amended, the bill do pass.

The committee amendments are as follows:

Page 2, in lines 3 and 4, strike out the words "with reason to believe" and insert in lieu thereof the word "knowing."

Pages 2 and 3, strike out all of section 2 of the bill, from line 18, page 2, down through and including line 16 on page 3.

Section 1 of the bill will replace the existing wartime sabotage law (title 50, U. S. C., secs. 101, 102, and 103). It will cover all offenses now covered by those sections and extend the law to certain dangerous acts which are not, or may not be, included in the present law. It does not affect the law concerning sabotage during peacetime.

Existing wartime sabotage law, section 101, defines "war material," "war premises," and "war utilities"; also "United States" and "associate nation." Section 102 fixes a penalty of a fine of not more than $10,000 or imprisonment for not more than 30 years, or both, for willfully injurying or destroying or attempting to injure or destroy any war material, war premises, or war utilities, with intent to injure, interfere with, or obstruct the United States or any associate nation in preparing for or carrying on war, or with reason to believe that the act may injure, interfere with, or obstruct the United States or any associate nation in preparing for or carrying on war. Section 103 fixes the same penalty for willfully making or causing to be made in a defective manner, or attempting to make or cause to be made in a defective manner, any war material, tool, implement, machine, utensil, or receptacle used or employed in making, producing, manufacturing, or repairing any such war material, with intent to injure, interfere with, or obstruct the United States or any associate nation in preparing for or carrying on war, or with reason to believe that the act may injure, interfere with, or obstruct the United States or any association nation in preparing for or carrying on war.

Section 1 of H. R. 3442, instead of defining the terms "war material," "war premises," and "war utilities," is more comprehensive in that it covers "any property, real or personal, which is being used or which is intended for, adapted to, or suitable for use in the preparation for or carrying on war."

Another substantial change in the law made by section 1 of the bill is the provision for punishment by imprisonment for not more than 30 years or a fine of not more than $10,000, or both, for a conspiracy to commit any of the prohibited acts. Under present law conspiracies must be tried under the general conspiracy statute (title 18, sec. 88, of the United States Code), which provides a maximum penalty of 2 years' imprisonment or a fine of not more than $10,000, or both.

There has been added to existing law by section 1 of the bill the offenses of damaging, carrying away, concealing, and tampering with property intended for, adapted to, or suitable for use in preparing for or carrying on war.

The existing statute does not cover a situation where a person knowingly sells defective war material to the Government, punishing only persons who are chargeable with making it defectively. A certain amount of the production of war plants is defective and is rejected. Brokers or others may buy up such goods and palm it off on the Government, knowing the material to be defective, without being subject to punishment under the statute. Of course, there may be prosecutions for fraud of persons perpetrating such offenses, but it seems apparent that present law is insufficient in this respect, considering the seriousness of such offenses.

COMMITTEE AMENDMENTS

The committee proposes in section 1 of the bill to change the language "with reason to believe" to "knowing", as it does not favor the use of such language first mentioned in criminal statutes of this character.

The second committee amendment would strike out section 2 of the bill, which is discussed immediately following.

Section 2 of the bill, proposed to be stricken out by the committee, would apply only to persons who hold contracts or subcontracts for war or national defense material or who have ownership in, or management responsibility for, facilities used for the manufacture of such material. It would make such persons subject to a maximum penalty of death and a fine of $1,000,000 if they should intentionally make or cause to be made or knowingly sell or cause to be sold to the Government or our allies war material which is (1) below the standards or specifications provided therefor, and (2) made so defectively that the maker or seller would have reason to believe that its defectiveness or inferior quality would endanger the life, safety, or health of members of the armed forces of the United States or any associate nation or the success of their military operations.

The burden of proof which would be imposed upon the Government by this section is substantial. The Government would have to show: First, that the material was made or caused to be made below specifications; second, that it was intentionally so made; and third, that the maker had reason to believe that use of the property, on account of its defective condition, would be dangerous to the armed forces or impair the success of military operations. With respect to the sale of defective material, it would have to be established that the seller knew the material was defective and had reason to believe that its use would be dangerous, and intentionally sold it in such condition.

The committee gave consideration to section 2 of the bill and the provisions which were designed to protect manufacturers and businessmen against the possibility of groundless prosecutions involving transactions in which they participated in good faith; however, it concluded, among other considerations, that in some cases there might be a possibility that criminal prosecutions could be successfully maintained, resulting even in capital punishment, in a close case where eminent engineers might disagree as to whether in fact the war material was below the standards or specifications provided therefor, and that they were so defective that the maker or seller would have reason to believe that its use would endanger the life, safety, or health of members of the armed forces or the success of their military operations.

This section of the bill, as introduced, extends the definition of "associate nation" and "Government of the United States" to include corporations producing property for the United States or Allied Governments or furnishing property thereto. This is necessary in order to bring within the act persons who sell defective war materials to war contractors or to the numerous agencies acting for our allies in this country in the purchase of war materials.

DEPARTMENTAL ENDORSEMENTS

The following letters in support of the bill have been received from the Department of Justice and the War and Navy Departments. The letters were directed to an earlier bill, H. R. 2503.

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., April 21, 1943.

Hon. HATTON W. SUMNERS,
Chairman, Committee on the Judiciary,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: This is in response to your request for my views concerning a bill (H. R. 2503) to amend the existing provisions of law relating to sabotage in time of war.

The existing law on this subject, act of April 20, 1918 (40 Stat. 533; U. S. C., title 50, secs. 101, 102, and 103), defines the terms "war material," "war premises," and "war utilities." It provides that when the United States is at war, whoever, with intent to injure, interfere with, or obstruct the United States or any associate nation in preparing for or carrying on the war, or whoever, with reason to believe that his act may cause such injury, interference, or obstruction, shall willfully injure or destroy or attempt to do so, any war material, war premises, or war utilities, as heretofore defined, shall be imprisoned for not more than 30 years, or fined not more than $10,000, or both.

It further provides for the punishment by the same penalty of anyone in time of war who with the same intent or reason to believe, willfully makes or causes to be made in a defective manner any war material, or any tool, implement, machine, utensil, or receptacle used in making, producing, manufacturing, or repairing any such war material.

The bill under consideration proposes to amend the existing law by in effect substituting new and broader provisions therefor. The definitions of war material, war premises, and war utilities contained in existing law would be abandoned, and the protection of the statute would be extended to all property, real or personal, which is being used or which is intended for, adapted to, or suitable for use in preparing for or carrying on the war. In addition, it would punish a conspiracy to commit any of the forbidden acts by the same penalties as the substantive offenses.

The absence of a conspiracy provision in the existing statutes relating to wartime sabotage is a grave defect in the existing statutory structure, which must be remedied.

The bill would also fortify the existing provisions of law by punishing the intentional manufacture or sale of defective property intended for use in preparing for or carrying on the war.

Section 2 of the bill which relates to this matter provides the penalty of death or imprisonment for life, or for such term of years as the court may direct, or a fine of not more than $1,000,000, or both. The conspiracy clause is also included in this section.

This legislation would accord an added protection to the Government against sabotage in time of war and would cure some grave defects and omissions in existing law.

I find no objection to the enactment of the bill.

Sincerely yours,

FRANCIS BIDDLE,
Attorney General.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, April 20, 1943.

Hon. HATTON W. SUMNERS,
Chairman, Committee on the Judiciary,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. SUMNERS: The War Department has no objection to enactment of H. R. 2503, Seventy-eighth Congress, a bill to amend sections 1, 2, and 3 of the act entitled "An act to punish the willful injury or destruction of war material, or of war premises or utilities in connection with war material, and for other purposes," approved April 20, 1918, as amended (40 Stat. 533; U. S. C., title 50, secs. 101, 102, and 103), on which you have requested an expression of the views of this Department, if the bill is amended as hereinafter suggested.

The purpose of the bill is to amend sections 1, 2, and 3 of the act of April 20, 1918, as amended, to provide (1) for the punishment, during wartime, by imprisonment for not more than 30 years, or a fine of not more than $10,000, or both, of willful injury, damage, destruction, theft, concealment, tampering with, or the making or repairing in a defective manner, or the sale or delivery in a defective or inferior condition to the United States or any associate nation, of any real or personal property used or intended or suitable for use in preparing for or carrying on of war, and attempts or conspiracy to commit any such acts; (2) the punishment of contractors or subcontractors for the production or sale, during wartime, of war material, who intentionally make or cause to be made, or sell, such material which is below the standard or specifications provided therefor, or of defective or inferior quality, or who attempt to or conspire to do so, by death, imprisonment for life, or such term of years as the court may direct, or by fine of not more than $1,000,000, or both; and (3) to define the terms "associate nation," "the Government of the United States," and "United States."

If enacted in its present form, this measure would supersede sections 1, 2, and 3 of the act of April 20, 1918, as amended, but would leave sections 4, 5, and 6 of that act intact as they now exist.

Section 4 of the act of April 20, 1918, defines the terms "national defense material," "national defense premises," and "national defense utilities," as used therein. Section 5 provides for the punishment of those who, with the intent to injure, interfere with, or obstruct the national defense, willfully injure, destroy, or attempt to do so, any national defense material, national defense premises, or national defense utilities; and section 6 provides for the punishment of those who, with like intent, shall make or cause to be made in a defective manner, or attempt to do so, any national defense material, as defined in the act, or any tool, implement, machine, utensil, or receptacle used in making, producing, manufacturing, or repairing national defense material, as defined in the act.

The terms "national defense material," "national defense premises," and "national defense utilities" do not appear in sections 1, 2, and 3 of H. R. 2503. Therefore, enactment of that bill without repeal of sections 4, 5, and 6 of the original act, as amended, would render the entire law ambiguous.

Sections 1, 2, and 3 of H. R. 2503 appear to be intended to supersede the entire act of April 20, 1918, as amended, and seem to adequately cover the field of that statute. Accordingly, the suggestion is made that, if enacted, there be added to H. R. 2503 a fourth section providing for the repeal of sections 4, 5, and 6 of the act of April 20, 1918, which were added thereto by the act of November 30, 1940 (54 Stat. 1220). The following language is deemed appropriate to accomplish that result:

"SEC. 4. Sections 4, 5, and 6 of the act of April 20, 1918, as amended (54 Stat. 1220), are hereby repealed: Provided, That offenses committed, and penalties, forfeitures, or liabilities incurred, prior to the enactment of this act under any of said sections 4, 5, and 6, may be prosecuted and punished in the same manner and with the same effect as if said sections 4, 5, and 6 had not been hereby repealed."

In order to make section 1 of H. R. 2503 consistent with section 2 thereof, it would appear that the word "the" preceding the word "war" should be stricken from both lines 6 and 14 on page 2.

Amendment of section 3 in the following manner is suggested:

In line 4, page 3, strike out the words "and so defectively or of such inferior quality that its use," and insert in lieu thereof a comma and the words "with reason to believe that its defectiveness or inferior quality."

In line 7, page 3, after the word "shall", insert a comma and the words "with like reason to believe,".

In line 11, page 3, after the word "shall", insert a comma and the words "with like reason to believe,".

Without the amendments suggested in the preceding paragraphs, section 3 would be unnecessarily sweeping, covering even those who made full disclosure of the defective or inferior quality of a product.

Enactment of H. R. 2503 would broaden considerably the scope of the law with respect to acts of sabotage and conspiracy to commit such acts, as well as strengthen the criminal statutes concerning the production for or sale or delivery to the United States or any of its associate nations of defective or inferior property useful for carrying on war in the national defense. This is believed to be desirable.

Accordingly, the War Department recommends enactment of H. R. 2503, if amended as suggested above.

In the opinion of the War Department, the enactment of this measure would not result in the expenditure of additional public funds, since enforcement probably would be no more difficult or expensive than under existing law.

Since the committee has asked that this report be expedited, the Bureau of the Budget has authorized its submission without a determination by the Bureau as to whether enactment of the proposed legislation would be in accord with the program of the President.

Sincerely yours,

ROBERT P. PATTERSON,
Acting Secretary of War.

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, May 13, 1943.

Hon. HATTON W. SUMNERS,
Chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: The bill H. R. 2503 to amend sections 1, 2, and 3 of the act entitled "An act to punish the willful injury or destruction of war material, or of war premises or utilities used in connection with war material, and for other purposes," approved April 20, 1918, as amended (40 Stat. 533; U. S. C., title 50, secs. 101, 102, and 103), was referred to the Navy Department by your committee with request for views and recommendation thereon.

The purpose of the proposed legislation is to amend sections 1, 2, and 3 of the act entitled "An act to punish the willful injury or destruction of war material, or of war premises or utilities used in connection with war material, and for other purposes," as amended, so as to broaden the law relating to wartime sabotage in order to meet the needs of the present emergency.

The language of the first section of the bill appears to be much broader than present law (50 U. S. C., secs. 101, 102, and 103), and in addition an attempt or conspiracy to commit any of the acts mentioned in both the first and second sections of this bill are made substantive offenses.

Section 2 of the bill is likewise very broad and provides severe penalties for, in effect, intentionally making war material below standard or below specifications so defectively as to endanger the life, safety, or health of members of our armed forces or of the armed forces of associate nations. Section 3 of this bill, among other things, defines "associate nation" and "Government of the United States" very comprehensively.

The Navy Department is of the opinion that the proposed legislation is not the appropriate way to maintain proper standards of quality in the manufacture of war materials. It is further considered that its enactment would tend to reduce the output of the country's war industries.

In view of the foregoing, the Navy Department recommends against enactment of the bill H. R. 2503.

The Navy Department has been advised by the Bureau of the Budget that there would be no objection to the submission of this recommendation.

Sincerely yours,

FRANK KNOX.

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, August 27, 1943.

Hon. HATTON W. SUMNERS,
Chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: The bill H. R. 2503 to amend sections 1, 2, and 3 of the act entitled "An act to punish the willful injury or destruction of war material, or of war premises or utilities used in connection with war material, and for other purposes," approved April 20, 1918, as amended (40 Stat. 533; U. S. C., title 50, secs. 101, 102, and 103), was referred to the Navy Department by your committee with request for the views and recommendation of the Navy Department thereon. Responsive to such request, the Navy Department under date of May 13, 1943, transmitted an unfavorable report on the bill H. R. 2503 to your committee.

By letter of July 2, 1943, the Attorney General requested the Navy Department to give further consideration to the bill. The letter of the Attorney General reads, in part, as follows:

"This Department, which has the responsibility for administering the sabotage laws, is of the opinion that their extension as provided in the bill is necessary at this time. Many cases of intentional defective manufacture of war goods are now under investigation by this Department which cannot be reached under the existing sabotage laws. Some of these cases may be prosecuted as frauds on the Government. But this involves a lesser penalty than sabotage and ignores the gravamen of the offenses as war crimes.

"It is difficult for me to see how this bill would, if enacted, reduce war production. Section 1 applies only to 'willful' conduct, the same state of mind required under existing law. It does not increase the present penalty. Section 2 applies only to persons who intentionally make or sell war materials in such a manner that their use will endanger the life, safety, or health of members of the armed forces. Good faith conduct by producers of war material could never constitute a violation of either section."

The Attorney General referred to a meeting between representatives of the Departments of War and Justice in consequence of which a full accord was reached between those Departments in support of the bill. It is understood that the accord mentioned was reached upon the basis of certain amendments to the bill suggested by the War Department, as set forth in the War Department's letter of April 30, 1943, addressed to the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, House of Representatives, stating that the War Department recommends enactment of the bill if amended as follows:

(2) Amend section 2 as follows:

(a) In line 4, page 3, strike out the words "and so defectively or of such inferior quality that its use" and insert in lieu thereof a comma and the words "with reason to believe that its defectiveness or inferior quality."

(b) In line 7, page 3, after the word "shall", insert a comma and the words "with like reason to believe,".

(c) In line 11, page 3, after the word "shall", insert a comma and the words "with like reason to believe,".

(3) Add a section, to be numbered section 4, reading as follows:

"SEC. 4. Sections 4, 5, and 6 of the act of April 20, 1918, as amended (54 Stat. 1220), are hereby repealed: Provided, That offenses committed, and penalties, forfeitures, or liabilities incurred, prior to the enactment of this act under any of said sections 4, 5, and 6, may be prosecuted and punished in the same manner and with the same effect as if said sections 4, 5, and 6 had not been hereby repealed."

The report of the Navy Department under date of May 13, 1943, referred to the bill as introduced rather than to the bill with the suggested amendments above set forth.

The suggested amendments to section 2 of the bill would materially change its effect by introducing an additional element in the definition of the crime, namely, reason for belief on the part of the person charged that the departure from specifications would endanger life, safety, or health of members of the armed forces. It is believed that the enactment of the bill with such amendments would diminish or eliminate the risk that its enactment would tend to reduce the output of the country's war industries.

The Attorney General advised that many cases of intentional defective manufacture of war goods are now under investigation which cannot be reached under existing sabotage laws. The Navy Department is in full accord with the view that such intentional defective manufacture should be made a criminal offense as a war crime. It is believed that the necessity for such law and the measure of the penalty are matters with which the Department of Justice is primarily concerned.

The Navy Department has also noted the statement of the Attorney General that good-faith conduct by producers of war material could never constitute a violation of the bill if enacted into law. Such interpretation of the bill would seem to eliminate the risk that the output of war industry could be adversely affected by its enactment.

For the foregoing reasons, the Navy Department would have no objection to the enactment of the bill H. R. 2503 if amended as above set forth.

The Navy Department has been informally advised by the Bureau of the Budget that there would be no objection to the submission of this report.

Sincerely yours,

JAMES FORRESTAL, Acting.

MINORITY REPORT

We, the undersigned members of the Committee on the Judiciary, cannot assent to the committee amendments, and therefore hereby, most respectfully, dissent from the report filed by those members of the Committee on the Judiciary who constitute, in this instances, the majority.

The first committee amendment would strike out of the first section of H. R. 3442 the words "with reason to believe" and insert in lieu thereof the word "knowing."

While the first section of the bill H. R. 3442 proposes to amend the existing law, it did not change the present law insofar as the "reason to believe" clause is concerned.

The change proposed by the first committee amendment is not only not needed but, to the contrary, would dangerously weaken the Government's enforcement efforts by requiring a higher degree of proof than is now necessary.

Under the existing sabotage laws (title 50 U. S. C. secs. 102, 103), the Government can make out a case by showing that the act was willful and was accompanied by either one of the following states of mind:

"(1) Intent to injure, interfere with, or obstruct the United States * * * in preparing for or carrying on the war; or

"(2) With reason to believe that his act may injure, interfere with, or obstruct the United States * * * in preparing for or carrying on the war."

Almost all of the cases brought charge "reason to believe" under No. 2 above. It is almost impossible to prove that a man intended to injure the war effort since he usually has some other primary motive for his act. For example, a man spoils a mass of steel because he is mad at the employer or puts emery dust in the motor because he wants to get the inspector into trouble. In such cases he does not intend to hamper the war effort but certainly has reason to believe that what he does will have that effect.

It is proposed to change the law by requiring the Government to show the following state of mind:

"Knowing that his act may interfere with or obstruct the United States * * * in preparing for or carrying on the war."

This amendment would practically emasculate the sabotage law. It would require the Government to prove that the man actually knew that his act was likely to hurt the war. Proof that any reasonable man in the same circumstances would have known is not enough. The word "knowing" refers to the man's actual knowledge. It is practically impossible for any person to explore the mind of another person sufficiently to prove what the other man knew. The Government should have no greater burden than to establish that in the same circumstances a reasonable man should have known that his act would harm the war effort. Therefore it is vital that the proposed amendment be defeated, and the "reason to believe" standard found in the existing law should be retained.

An example of what the courts will very likely do in interpreting the word "knowing" is found in the case of State v. McBarron (66 N. J. L. 680 (1901) 51 A. 146), in which the court was called on to interpret a statute punishing anyone who obtained the registration of a voter "knowing that he was not qualified." The court said (p. 682):

"A conviction in this case cannot be sustained solely upon the fact that the plaintiff (in error) procured the name of an unqualified voter to be registered, but it must further appear that he knew when he caused such registration to be made that the person so registered was not entitled to vote at the next election; the significant word of the statute is 'knowing,' which means knowledge of mental assurance, or scienter; it is positive, not negative. Such knowledge must be clearly proved or shown by such circumstances as leave no reasonable doubt in a fair mind; the proof of the knowledge must be clear, not a mere inference that he could have found out by further inquiry; there must have been culpable intent shown, not mere ignorance."

The second committee amendment strikes from the bill section 2.

This section seeks to bring to justice, not the workingman who merely obeys orders; but the higher-ups who give them.

Section 2 was aimed at those who intentionally make or cause to be made war matériel below the standard or specifications provided for the same, with reason to believe that its defectiveness or inferior quality would endanger the life, safety, or health of members of the armed forces of the United States, or of any associate nation, or the success of their military operations; or those who, with like reason to believe, sell, convey, transfer, or cause to be sold, conveyed, or transferred to the Government of the United States, or to the government of any associated nation, any such property or thing knowing it to be below the standard or specifications provided for the same; or those who attempt or conspire to commit any of the above acts.

We respectfully submit that any contractor, subcontractor, or other person having ownership in, or responsibility for, the management of any facilities for the manufacture of war materiel, who intentionally causes the same to be made below the standard or specifications provided therefor and with reason to believe that its defectiveness or inferior quality would endanger the life, safety, or health of members of the armed forces of the United States, or of any associate nation, or the success of their military operations, should, upon conviction, in the sound discretion of the court, suffer death or life imprisonment, or imprisonment for such term of years as the court may direct, or be fined up to $1,000,000, or both.

The same thing is true of any such person, who, with like reason to believe, should sell, convey, transfer, or cause to be sold, conveyed, or transferred to the Government of the United States or to the government of any associate nation, any such property or thing knowing it to be below the standard or specifications provided therefor.

The same is true of any such person, who attempts or conspires to violate this section.

Under section 2, the punishment prescribed could be as low as imprisonment for 1 day and a fine of 1 cent. The maxima fixed, of course, would be applied only in those few cases of the most heinous, flagrant, and horrible kind.

Section 2 is expressly limited to those cases which occur "when the United States is at war."

If a worker in a war industry, with no authority save to do his work, can be punished under existing law for sabotage committed on the spur of the moment because of anger suddenly engendered and without thought of consequences, how much more should those in management of the concern for which he works, be punished when they intentionally and with reason to believe that the carrying out of their nefarious orders would endanger the lives of our fighting men? And is not the guilt of such higher-ups all the greater when they premeditatedly and deliberately "fix" the testing machines in their plant so as to conceal their iniquity from Government inspectors?

We are convinced that the striking out of section 2 is a profound mistake.

Of course, the third committee amendment, which simply would renumber the sections because of the deletion of section 2, should go out if section 2 is retained, as we fervently hope may be your action.

The Department of Justice has the duty of prosecuting the violators of our sabotage law. They have more than 100 cases of sabotage, clearly established by competent evidence, which the present law does not cover. They desire the passage of this bill, H. R. 3442, without amendment. Neither the War nor Navy Department, nor any other group, objects. Is it not our duty to make all kinds of sabotage illegal and properly punishable? Why should the saboteur be a privileged character when the loyal patriotic citizens are making daily, all-out efforts to win the war? We surely do not wish to encourage obstruction by leaving it lawful.

MINORITY REPORT OF THOMAS J. LANE

While I concur in the minority report generally, I doubt the wisdom of that provision of section 2 of H. R. 3442, which would permit the imposition of the death penalty. I, therefore, reserve the right to offer, or to support an amendment striking from section 2 the death penalty provision, if and when the committee amendments shall have been voted down.

Keynote Address of Gov. Earl Warren, of California

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS ROLPH
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. ROLPH. Mr. Speaker, under permission granted me by unanimous consent, I extend the address of Gov. Earl Warren, of California, delivered in Chicago, Ill., June 26, 1944, before the Republican National Convention.

We are here to do a job for the American people. And we mean business.

What is our job? Ask any American. Ask the anxious American mother and father. Ask the anxious wives and sweethearts of our fighting men. Ask our fighting men themselves. They will tell you what our job is.

They will give you the keynote for this convention. They will tell you out of their hearts and what they say will be the same—east and west, north and south, it will be the same. For now the same anxieties are on every American heart—the same hour-to-hour concern for what the day may bring forth, the same steadfast courage to sustain them, the same dreams, the same hope that they will have a chance to make their dreams come true.

This is what is in their hearts. This is our job:

To get our boys back home again—victorious and with all speed.

To open the door for all Americans—to open it, not just to jobs, but to opportunity.

To make and guard the peace so wisely and so well that this time will be the last time that American homes are called to give their sons and daughters to the agony and tragedy of war.

Isn't that a plain and homely story? But is there any other story which any American would put in place of it? Is there any other thing which, in his heart, any American wants more than these? Is there any American who would not give everything he has to bring these things to pass?

We know there is only one answer to these questions. We know, also, that that answer makes our job. To get that job done is why we are here. This convention and this election are not time out from the job of winning the war and the peace. This convention and this election are part of that job. We are here to speed the cause—to help America to speed the cause—for which our fighting men are giving their lives. We are here to make the road on which America can march toward victory, toward opportunity, toward peace.

That is the biggest job Americans have ever undertaken together. It is too big a job for little Americans; it is too big a job for a quarreling America. There is room for honest differences among us. There is no room for disunity. We can be of differing minds. But we must be of one heart.

That singleness of heart is not something we can wait for. Our boys in Normandy, in Italy, in India, and China, in the far reaches of the South Pacific—they are not waiting for it. They are of one heart. What a highly courageous, steadfast heart it is.

What they ask of us—what they have the right to expect of us—is singleness of heart here at home. Freedom is in the balances. We dare not be found wanting.

For so great a venture together, we must be together. Here and now, we can begin to get together. That is our purpose. It is the purpose of this convention to put the public welfare above private self-interest; to put the Nation above the party; to put the progress of the whole American community above special privilege for any part of it; to put indispensable principles—once and for all—above indispensable men.

The choice of me as a keynote speaker was not made because of any personal attribute of mine. There were others far abler who could have been chosen.

The only good reason I was chosen was because I come from the great, hopeful, energetic West. Ours is the youngest part of America. My own State of California was a child of 4 years when the Republican Party was born.

Growth and change and adventure are still a part of our daily life.

In the West there is little fear of failure and no fear of trying. That spirit of youth is the spirit of this convention.

Certainly, we are not here to look for a road back to some status quo. There is no status to which we could or should return. The future cannot be overtaken in reverse. Neither are we here to work out some easy-sounding scheme whereby America can stand still. We believe that America wants to get going and keep going. A forward-going America is what we are here for.

In that spirit we can be confident of the future. It will not be easy. We have nothing easy to offer. Dark days lie ahead. We have no tricks to escape them. We expect tough going and we are ready for it. There is no pessimism, no defeatism, no bitterness, no jauntiness among us. Too much that we love and cherish is at stake. And of one thing we are sure: America can come through these trying, desperate times a finer, happier, better-spirited America. It is our purpose to see to it that America does come through that way.

That is what the American people expect the Republican Party to accomplish. They are already turning to us for its accomplishment. That is why, in so many streams of late, they have been changing so many horses. That is why—in city halls, courthouses, and State capitals, where government is closest to the people—the people have returned to Republican government. That is why, in election after election, they are restoring Republican leadership to Congress.

The people did this, not just because they wanted a change. They did it because they wanted a chance. As times became more critical, as their problems became more complex, as strange policies and questionable practices added to their difficulties and increased their confusions, they instinctively returned to the Republican Party.

In Congress, from 16 Republicans in the Senate in 1937 the people have now elected 37; from 88 Republicans in the House of Representatives, the people have now elected 212. From 8 Republican governors in 1938, the people have now elected 26. Three out of every four Americans now live under Republican State administrations. In Washington, where the bureaucrats live, there is still a Democrat in the White House. But out where the people live, the country is predominantly Republican.

In those 26 Republican States, the people have already elected the kind of government which the job ahead of us requires.

They are determined, this year, to have more of that kind of government. They are determined to have more of it in the States. They are determined to have more of it in Congress. They are determined to have more of it—a great deal more of it—in the White House.

In those States where the people have returned to the Republican Party, government is not only for the people, but of, and by the people. That means not some of the people, but all of the people. Their kind of representative government reaches from ocean to ocean and from border to border. It extends to both sides of the tracks. It includes every citizen. That is why the platform of this convention will be one on which all of us can stand together—not divided by race or creed, not as minorities or majorities, but as fellow Americans.

No party that stands for less than that can unite America. A better world for others must begin with us. That is where, in 26 of our States, it has already begun.

In those States which are already Republican, you will find the record of public administration is progressive, enlightened, and in the public interest. In those States you will find increased emphasis upon the public health, upon free education, upon care for orphaned and neglected children, upon support for the aged, for the victims of industrial accidents, for those handicapped by physical disabilities, and for the victims of economic misfortune.

Those are the States of this Union where labor has achieved its highest dignity; where labor and management have come to their best understanding; where they have learned to work together most effectively; where, together, they are doing the best job.

What is the result of that kind of government? I can tell you. I can tell you in terms that every American with a son fighting overseas will understand. To win the war in the air, those Republican States have been called on to produce more than 81 percent of all our airplanes. To win the war at sea, those States have been called on to produce more than 76 percent of all our ships. To win the war on land, those States have been called on to produce more than 87 percent of all our ordnance—and more than 83 percent of all our other fighting equipment.

The American people were introduced, not long ago, to Dr. Win-the-War. From the record of these States it is clear that Dr. Win-the-War is a Republican.

But this war cannot be fought and won as Republicans or Democrats. This is an all-American war. There is a place for every American in it. There is no place of honor for any American who is not in it.

In or out of office, Republicans and Democrats share the responsibility of winning the war. We want to share it in the same spirit in which the sons of all of us fight from the same fox holes, through the same jungles, across the same beaches, in the same ships at sea and in the air.

The generals who command our armies, the admirals who command our fleets are no more Republican or Democratic than the armies and the fleets which they command. They are not a product of politics. They are products of our nonpolitical Military Establishment. Their concern is not with the party in power—whether it is Republican or Democratic. Their concern is how to get the men and the materials out where the war will be won. They know how to run the war and we will see to it that they have the opportunity to run it without political interference.

Our purpose is to see that the country is responsive to their military leadership, to stand back of them through good days and bad, to see to it that they get the materials needed for victory.

How well that victory can be won; how magnificently it can be won when Government unites all the people to win it is plainly written in the record of those 26 States whose government is now Republican. That is what needs to be done for the Nation as a whole. To that we dedicate ourselves as our first objective, to keep the war out of politics and politics out of the war, to strengthen among us, that spirit of single mindedness, of unity, of self-forgetfulness that will hearten our military leaders, strengthen their hands and speed the day when having bivouacked along the main streets of Germany and Japan, they will lead our boys victoriously home again.

But when the war is won, what then? We will have 11,000,000 men and women out of uniform. We will have millions of war workers whose war work has stopped. We will have tens of thousands of businessmen whose war contracts have been canceled.

What will those millions of Americans want: They will want what is the right of every American to have. They will want jobs. By jobs, they do not mean made jobs—with the Government as employer. That is not what we mean either. They mean money-making jobs in private industry. Those are the kind of jobs we mean.

But these young people will not be satisfied with just jobs. We will not be satisfied either. These young people will want good jobs and a chance to get ahead. Hundreds of thousands of them will want to set up in small businesses for themselves; to be their own boss; to have their own farm; to own their own filling station; to run their own store, or operate their own little factory.

We will see to it that they get that chance. We can see to it, because we know what is is that makes jobs and opportunity. We know that Government does not make them, not the kind of jobs the people want and which we aim to help the people get. Government is nonproducing. It lives off the production of others. Government-made jobs can be a crisis necessity. But such jobs are not good enough for the long pull. For the long pull, the American people want a highway, not a dead-end street.

The belief that we have come to the end of the road, that a dead-end street is all that we have ahead of us—that will not produce jobs and opportunity either. That belief is defeatism. The fruit of defeatism is an economy of scarcity. We know what scarcity produces. It produces scarcity—of jobs, of opportunity, of the good things of life.

We know what it is that makes jobs and opportunity. We know that private production makes them. We know that our productive system going ful' blast can make enough of them. It is the Republican Party that has kept that knowledge alive in America. We have kept it alive against great odds. And now the country knows how important it is that the Republicans kept that knowledge alive. For that confidence in our productive system and the know-how to get that system into full-blast production made the difference, when war came, between life and death. The same knowledge and the same know-how will make the difference when the war is won.

But we Republicans also know that full-blast production—and the jobs and opportunity which it makes—can only come in a climate that is friendly to production. A climate that is friendly to production requires a government that is friendly to production. It requires a government which believes that our economic soil, far from being worn out, is still life giving; a government which believes that those who work honorably and well to make that soil produce, far from being a threat to our well-being, are the hope of it; a government which, far from penalizing production, encourages it; a government which believes in an economy of plenty because its aim for all the people is abundance.

In such a climate, labor and management will not be set off—one against the other. They will realize—government can help them to realize—that they do not represent two different systems; that they are, rather, part of the same system. They will understand that they are partners in that system. If for any reason one partner fails, both will be destroyed. They will understand also that such a partnership system exists for more than profit; that its even more important reason for existence is the increasing security and well-being of all the people.

With such an understanding of their relationship to each other and their responsibility to the community, labor and management can reconcile their day-to-day differences, in order, together, to make full production possible. It is a Republican responsibility to foster that climate and speed that understanding. That we will do.

In such a climate also the farm will no longer be set off against the city, the city against the farm. Farmer and city dweller will come to see that they do not represent two rival economic communities; that, in fact, they are partners in the same community. They will understand that bad times for one mean bad times for the other; that good times for one must include good times for the other. It is a Republican responsibility to speed that understanding and foster a climate in which prosperity is possible for both. That also we will do.

We know that this can be done. We know that the people expect us to do it. They have turned to us because—under the threat of war—they wanted to get going. When the war is won, they want to keep going—toward full, peacetime production that will insure, not jobs alone, but opportunity and a fair and increasing share of life's good things. To that we dedicate ourselves as our second objective.

But to insure such a future, this war must end in something better than an armistice. This war must end in peace. For our homes, our sons, and our daughters, this time must be the last time.

In their hearts the American people know what kind of peace they want. They may differ upon details but they are agreed upon the things that are really important. What is needed is effective leadership, honestly and vigorously to carry into realization the aspirations upon which our people are united.

We want a peace that will be lasting. That means a peace that will be just. That means not only justice for the few and powerful but justice also for the many and less powerful.

We want a peace that is based upon realities and not upon the insecure foundation of mere words or promises. That means a peace which, being mindful of the interest of other nations, does not neglect or sacrifice the interests of our own Nation.

None of these aspirations can be realized under a leadership that plays power politics on a world-wide stage. They cannot be achieved under a leadership which neglects the interests of America. No such leadership can hope to keep the world's respect or to unite America in helping to solve the world's problems. Nor can they ever be achieved by a leadership which holds itself superior to the wisdom of the people.

As Republicans we are united in uncompromising opposition to aggression. We are prepared to take a definite stand against aggression not merely to denounce it but to resist it and restrain it. That calls for effective cooperation with all the peace-loving nations of the world—for the establishment of a tribunal for the settlement of international disputes which otherwise might lead to war. We are agreed, too, that if such a program is to be effective, the friendly cooperation of the war's principal Allied combatants—the United States, Great Britain, Russia, and China—is as essential as the keystone of an arch. But beyond that is the task of establishing order, maintaining peace, and extending prosperity. We stand ready to welcome every nation that is prepared in honesty and good will to join with us in the accomplishment of that purpose. And we know that if we are to maintain respect among the nations of the world, if we are to be able to keep our own commitments and to compel recalcitrants to keep theirs, we must keep America ever strong and self-reliant.

The Republican Party has not waited to declare these principles. At the Mackinac conference we blazed the way for them. The future of America and the happiness of our children depend on their establishment.

Whatever the exact procedures, on these principles the American people in their hearts agree. I do not believe that any sound American political party should say more. I am sure that in good conscience no such political party can say less.

This is the job we are here to do. These are the things about which we mean business—to get the boys victoriously back home; to open the door to jobs and opportunity; to make a peace that this time will be lasting. This is too great an undertaking for petty politics; for name-calling or for hate-making. There is no place among us for malcontents. We are in no mood for torchlight jubilation. Whether we win as a party is of less importance to us than whether we win as a people.

There has been progress in every decade of American history. Progress is an American habit. We do not propose to deny the progress that has been made during the last decade; neither do we aim to repeal it. Whatever its source, if it is good, we will acknowledge it. If it is sound, we will build on it. If it is forward-looking, we will make use of it as we go forward from here.

Neither do we aim to turn the clock back and make an issue of every administration mistake in the past 11 years. We are less concerned about these past errors than about the direction in which for the future we are going.

We believe the New Deal is leading us away from representative government. We believe that its centralization of power in the numerous buraus at Washington will eventually destroy freedcm as Americans have always understood it—freedom in the home, freedom of individual opportunity in business and employment, freedom to govern ourselves locally.

We believe the New Deal is destroying the two-party system. The New Deal is no longer the Democratic Party. It is an incongruous clique within that party. It retains its power by patronizing and holding together incompatible groups. It talks of idealism and seeks its votes from the most corrupt political machines in the country. The leaders of its inner circle are not representatives of the people. They are the personal agents of one man. Their appointments to public office are not made on the basis of efficiency or public approval but on the basis of loyalty to the clique. Under their rule the Constitution has been short-circuited. The Cabinet has ceased to be a voice and has become an echo. Congress, wherever possible, has been circumvented by Executive decree. Both Congress and the judiciary have been intimidated and bludgeoned to make them servile. Over all of this—and over all of us—is the ominous, gargantuan figure of an arrogant, power-intoxicated bureaucracy. Nowhere in its vast domain has it been satisfied with merely one bureaucrat, if by hook or crook desks could be found for two. These bureaucrats of the New Deal tell the farmer what to sow and when to reap—sometimes without regard for either the seeds or the season. They require him to work in the fields all day and keep books for the Government all night. These same bureaucrats tell the worker what union he shall join, what dues he shall pay, and to whom he must pay them. They soon will tell the worker where he can work and where he cannot work. Then the workers of America will be a long way down the road toward that kind of government which our Nation is now resisting with all its power.

These bureaucrats encumber the small businessman with a multiplicity of rules, regulations, orders, and decrees which entangle him, stifle his business and darken his future. They move in—like political commissars—to watch over the shoulders of our industrialists—to say what, where, and how industry can produce.

They have threatened our free press. They have intimidated our free radio. They are using every device and excuse to insinuate themselves into control over the public schools of our States. They have injected a low grade of politics into the administration of relief and social welfare.

They have by-passed the governments of the States in an effort to destroy State effectiveness and compel the people to rely solely upon the New Deal clique at Washington for the solution of all their problems.

For years they have deprived entire regions of representation in the policy-making agencies of the Federal Government.

To perpetuate themselves in power the New Deal clique has always capitalized upon some crisis. It has always had the indispensable man—the same man—for each succeeding crisis. The first time it was the depression. The second time it was the recession. Last time it was to keep us out of war. This time it will be to achieve peace. The next time—who knows what crisis it will be? That there will be one and that the indispensable man will still be indispensable, we can rely upon the New Deal clique to assert. The New Deal came to power with a song on its lips: Happy Days Are Here Again. That song is ended. Even the melody does not linger on. Now we are being conditioned for a new song: Don't Change Horses in the Middle of a Stream. That melody isn't likely to linger either. For 11 long years we have been in the middle of the stream. We are not amphibious. We want to get across. We want to feel dry and solid ground under our feet again.

The life of a nation is a succession of crises. War and peace and economic and social adjustments have always followed each other in endless succession. No party, clique, or individual can rightfully claim priority in government because a crisis occurs during its administration.

The Republican Party was born in a great crisis. The American people turned to it because they wanted to get safely, speedily through that crisis and get on their way again. Then as now, the Republican Party was called by the people to displace a regime of men who had grown tired, complacent, and cynical in the business of government. Then as now, the Republican Party was called upon to replace a party that was torn with dissension and in revolt against itself. Then as now, the Republican Party was called by the people to furnish youth and vigor and vision.

Now as then, the Republican Party will respond to that call. It will represent the Nation, the whole Nation and nothing but the Nation. It will devote itself fervently to the problems of the people and in everything it does the Constitution of the United States of America will be its guiding star. It will function through established law and not through the caprice of bureaucratic regulation. There shall be one law for all men. Its greatest concern will always be for those who have the greatest need. It will conduct government openly where the people can see, discuss, and decide. It will operate less from the Government down and more from the people up. It will make wise and careful use of the people's money. It will keep the public's books in such a way as to allow the people to see how their money is used. It will see that taxes are just, visible, and designed to stimulate rather than punish. It will strengthen our great public-school system, keep it under the control of State and local government, where it is responsive to the people, and prepare it to play a stronger part in the life of the Republic. It will promote peace in industry by stimulating good will between labor and management. It will free the agencies of public information from the domination of government. It will make fully effective the immeasurable strength of the Nation by promoting good will and unity at home. It will not be cocksure in good times or depressed and cynical in bad times. It will direct our combined material and spiritual resources against the enemies of our country. It will make any sacrifice to achieve victory even 1 day sooner so our boys can come home. It will see to it that they are cared for when they do come home. It and we will honor them the rest of our lives.

But we will start building right now, that finer America which during their night vigils they dream of as they look at the stars from their fox holes on land and from their gun turrets at sea and in the air; the America that to them spells happy homes and freedom of opportunity for all; the America that represents unity at home and peace with the countries of the world.

It takes faith to build such an America—a strong faith, the same faith that now sustains our fighting men; a faith that is truly "the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things unseen."

With such a faith—which is our faith—we shall march under God toward victory, toward opportunity, toward peace.

A Battle of the War Against Crime

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SAM HOBBS

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. HOBBS. Mr. Speaker, please let me call attention to the bill (H. R. 3690) to safeguard the admission of evidence in certain cases, favorably reported by the Committee on the Judiciary.

It is not claimed of this bill that it is a panacea. It is not a complete answer to the problem, with one phase of which it deals. It is an arm to be thrust into a breach in the dike that impounds the bitter waters of crime, pending adequate repair and remodeling.

THE NEED FOR SUCH LEGISLATION

The Supreme Court of the United States handed down a decision in the case of McNabb v. United States (318 U. S. 332) on March 1, 1943. That decision established, without constitutional or legislative authority, a rule of evidence utterly new and variant from the standard set up by the Constitution of the United States in the Bill of Rights. In that part of the Bill of Rights known as the fifth amendment there is the familiar guaranty that no person shall "be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself." Since the Bill of Rights became fully ratified as a part of the Constitution on December 15, 1791, this has been recognized as the supreme law of the land on this subject. Such recognition has been accorded by repeated decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, and prior to the McNabb decision it had become well settled that the sole test of admissibility of statements made by persons accused of crime while in custody was whether they were "made freely, voluntarily, and without compulsion or inducement of any sort"—Wilson v. United States ((1896) 162 U. S. 613, 623); see also Lisenba v. California ((1943) 314 U. S. 219, 239).

Whether an individual in custody had or had not been arraigned prior to the obtaining of a confession from him was never before considered a determining factor in considering its admissibility.

For the first time in legal history, in the McNabb case, the Supreme Court used section 595, title 18, of the United States Code as a factor in determining the admissibility of confessions. This section provides that it shall be the duty of the marshal or other officer who may arrest a person charged with any crime or offense "to take the defendant before the United States commissioner or the nearest judicial officer having jurisdiction under existing laws for a hearing, commitment, or take bail for trial." A similar statute is found in Fifth United States Code, section 300a, requiring agents of the Federal Bureau of Investigation to take arrested persons immediately before a committing officer.

Thus, the Supreme Court has substituted a rule or law of evidence, written and adopted by a majority of the Court, for and instead of the Constitution. The Constitution says that involuntary confessions must not be admitted as evidence in any criminal case. Therefore, by plain implication and on ample authority, voluntary confessions should be admitted as evidence. Yet, in the McNabb case, the Supreme Court says:

> Quite apart from the Constitution, therefore, we are constrained to hold that the evidence elicited from the petitioners in the circumstances disclosed here must be excluded. For in their treatment of the petitioners the arresting officers assumed functions which Congress has explicitly denied them.

The Supreme Court does not say that the confessions of the McNabbs were involuntary, but "quite apart from the Constitution," and although "Congress has not explicitly forbidden the use of evidence so procured," because the arresting officers failed to comply with the requirement that defendants should be promptly arraigned—no matter how voluntary the confessions may have been, no matter that the trial judge, jury and the Supreme Court of Tennessee had held them to be voluntary, no matter that Congress had not forbidden, and no matter what the Constitution provides—the confessions were inadmissible as evidence.

> Mr. Justice Rutledge took no part in the consideration or decision of this case.

Mr. Justice Reed dissented, as follows:

> I find myself unable to agree with the opinion of the Court in this case. An officer of the United States was killed while in the performance of his duties. From the circumstances detailed in the Court's opinion, there was obvious reason to suspect that the petitioners here were implicated in firing the fatal shot from the dark. The arrests follow. As the guilty parties were known only to the McNabbs who took part in the assault at the burying ground, it was natural and proper that the officers would question them as to their actions.
> The cases just cited show that statements made while under interrogation may be used at a trial if it may fairly be said that the information was given voluntarily. A frank and free confession of crime by the culprit affords testimony of the highest credibility and of a character which may be verified easily. Equally frank responses to officers by innocent people arrested under misapprehension give the best basis for prompt discharge from custody. The realization of the convincing quality of a confession tempts officials to press suspects unduly for such statements. To guard accused persons against the danger of being forced to confess, the law admits confession of guilt only when they are voluntarily made. While the connotation of voluntary is indefinite, it affords an understandable label under which can be readily classified the various acts of terrorism, promises, trickery, and threats which have led this and other courts to refuse admission as evidence to confessions. The cases cited in the Court's opinion show the broad coverage of this rule of law. Through it those coerced into confession have found a ready defense from injustice.
> Were the Court today saying merely that in its judgment the confessions of the McNabbs were not voluntary, there would be no occasion for this single protest. A notation of dissent would suffice. The opinion, however, does more. Involuntary confessions are not constitutionally admissible because violative of the provision of self-incrimination in the Bill of Rights. Now the Court leaves undecided whether the present confessions are voluntary or involuntary, and declares that the confession must be excluded because in addition to questioning the petitioners, the arresting officers failed promptly to take them before a committing magistrate. The Court finds a basis for the declaration of this new rule of evidence in its supervisory authority over the administration of criminal justice. I question whether this offers to the trial courts and the peace officers a rule of admissibility as clear as the test of the voluntary character of the confession. I am opposed to broadening the possibilities of defendants escaping punishment by these more rigorous technical requirements in the administration of justice. If these confessions are otherwise voluntary, civilized standards, in my opinion, are not advanced by setting aside these judgments because of acts of omission which are not shown to have tended toward coercing the admissions.
> Our police officers occasionally overstep legal bounds. This record does not show when the petitioners were taken before a committing magistrate. No point was made of the failure to commit by defendant or counsel. No opportunity was given to the officers to explain. Objection to the introduction of the confession was made only on the ground that they were obtained through coercion. This was determined against the accused both by the Court, when it appraised the fact as to the voluntary character of the confession, preliminarily to determining the legal question of its admissibility, and by the jury. The Court saw and heard wtnesses for the prosecution and the defense. The defendants did not take the stand before the jury. The uncontradicted evidence does not require a different conclusion. The officers of the Alcohol Tax Unit should not be disciplined by overturning this conviction.

It is most interesting to note, in connection with the McNabb decision, that no point was made by the defendants nor by their counsel of any failure on the part of the arresting officers to arraign the defendants promptly. The decision is grounded solely upon the assumption indulged by the court that the petitioners had not been promptly arraigned. The record was silent on this most important point. The petitioners and their counsel did not claim that the petitioners had not been promptly arraigned. The truth is that the petitioners had been promptly arraigned. The prisoners were arrested early Thursday morning on the charge of operating an illicit still. They were properly and promptly arraigned and committed on that charge between 8:30 and 10:30 the same morning. During the raid on the distillery, or shortly thereafter, the murder had been committed in an adjacent cemetery in the darkness of night. No one had been seen, nor apprehended. There was no clue as to the identity of the murderer or murderers. There was a strong suspicion that the McNabbs, who had been operating the illicit distillery, or some of them, were also guilty of the murder. However, there was no evidence sufficient to justify a committing magistrate in binding them over on the murder charge. So there was no arraignment on the murder charge until after three of them had confessed; but every question put to any one of the prisoners was put after they had been promptly arraigned, and committed.

Almost immediately after the decision in the McNabb case was handed down, the administration of justice in criminal courts was thrown into confusion because of the McNabb decision, and in case after case defendants were, solely because of the rule promulgated in the McNabb case, freed by orders of the courts nolle prossing, or reversing, or directing verdicts in pending cases. Many of such cases are cited in the hearings on H. R. 3690, pages 21—cited by the author of the bill—31, 32, 33—cited by the Attorney General—and 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, and 60—cited by members of the Metropolitan Police Department of Washington.

In one of these cases, Mitchell against United States, the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia (138 Fed. 2d 426) reversed convictions and upon certiorari granted by the Supreme Court the decision of the Court of Appeals was reversed by the Supreme Court, April 24, 1944, although the Supreme Court said in part: "We adhere to that decision"—McNabb against United States—"and to the views on which it was based."

The history of the Mitchell case is bad enough, but that of the Wilborn case is infinitely worse. While the convictions of Mitchell were reversed by the court of appeals, yet this reversal has now been reversed by the Supreme Court, so Mitchell may now be punished. In the Wilborn case, however, Judge Pine is quoted as having stated from the bench on the trial that, although his acquittal would constitute a "miscarriage of justice," nevertheless he must be acquitted because of the Supreme Court's decision in the McNabb case. So, Judge Pine directed a verdict of acquittal, and Wilborn walked out of the court a free man. The Constitution prohibits another trial, because a second trial would constitute double jeopardy, so he is as free and clear as anyone could be. What was his self-confessed crime? About 1 a. m. of March 18, 1943, he broke into the apartment occupied by three girls, where he assaulted one of them, inflicting lacerations requiring 11 stitches, though he did not complete the rape because of the screams of the other girls. He was arrested about 2 a. m. on the same night. About 4 a. m. he confessed. About 5 a. m., in the presence of the arresting officers and his victim, he reenacted the circumstances. About 11:30 of the same day he signed a written confession, and was arraigned about 3 o'clock that afternoon. But the McNabb decision held that no confession could be used as evidence if the self-confessed criminal had not been arraigned promptly, and the judge construed this to mean just that. So, Wilborn, not having been arraigned for several hours after he might have been, was freed by a reluctant jury, because of the courts' direction, made solely because of the McNabb decision! Is this only a "miscarriage of justice" or is it a license to rape?

WHAT H. R. 3690 WOULD DO

It would merely nullify the new rule of the McNabb decision.

It would declare that no such policy as that indicated in the McNabb decision underlies the laws Congress passed requiring prompt arraignment.

It would leave the law exactly as it was before the turmoil and confusion caused by the McNabb decision and wipe out the attempt to bypass and ignore the Bill of Rights, restoring to the full the protective guaranty that no person shall "be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself."

MERELY A TEMPORARY EMERGENCY MEASURE

The bill H. R. 3690 is not designed to be a complete nor permanent solution of the problems involved in arrest, detention, and interrogation of criminal suspects. These problems are many, varied, and important. They cry for adequate remedies—for full, painstaking study and solution.

All of us favor prompt arraignment. Failure to observe the legal requirement thereof should be punished. The punishment, however, should be inflicted upon the guilty—not the innocent. The arresting officers are the guilty when they fail to see to it that prisoners are promptly arraigned. The public—"We, the people"—are the innocent. Yet under the McNabb decision only the law-abiding, innocent citizens, whose safety is jeopardized by turning self-confessed criminals loose, are punished.

A part of the solution should be the enactment into law of the requirement that all arresting officers be bonded, so that any failure on their part to observe the law would make them not only subject to suit, as they are now, but also able to respond in damages.

THE UNIFORM ARREST ACT

The Uniform Arrest Act, by Hon. Sam B. Warner, is a suggested solution that should have careful study.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S SUGGESTION

The suggestion given by the Attorney General of the United States—see his testimony in the hearings, pp. 35, 36, and 37—that the arraignment statutes should be made uniform and should have but one requirement as to time, to wit: "Within a reasonable time," also demands full consideration.

ENGLISH RULES

As suggested in the McNabb decision, the English rules for the interrogation of prisoners while in custody prescribed by the judges of the King's Bench should also be studied diligently and constructively with a view to seeing how they may be adapted to the administration of the criminal law in the United States. As so adapted, similar rules should be made by law a part of the solution of this problem.

BRIEF OF AMERICAN BAR COMMITTEE

The bill-of-rights committee of the American Bar Association, under date of May 15, 1944, has furnished the subcommittee that held the hearings on H. R. 3690 with a splendid brief showing clearly and fully the need for protracted and indefatigable study of this whole problem and for the enactment into law of its proper solution. They very kindly offer the services of this committee in collaboration toward these objectives.

CONCLUSION

Therefore, it is manifest that this bill is but an emergency measure, the sole purpose of which is to stop immediately the wrecking of our law-enforcement machinery resulting from the McNabb decision.

The enactment of this bill would do this and give your Committee on the Judiciary time, without the pressure and penalty of suspended law enforcement, within which to study these delicate and difficult problems and for the preparation of such a bill as may be then agreed upon.

Don't Let Careless Talk Cost American Lives

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. COCHRAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, some people do not seem to realize the danger that might result to those in the armed forces by carelessly talking concerning the movements of our armed forces. When this is explained to them, however, they realize that the officials of the Army and Navy have adopted a strong policy solely for the purpose of protecting our men and women engaged in carrying the attack to our enemies. One of the most closely guarded secrets is the departure from this country of members of the armed forces for foreign lands. If the enemy knew when a convoy was leaving this country they could advise their submarines by radio. If one of our transports was torpedoed it would be easy to realize the great loss of lives.

Mr. Speaker, I have received from Miss Bertha Bruening, of the Business Letter Co., Inc., of St. Louis, some suggestions that she has placed in print and liberally distributed. Under the permission granted me, I include this as part of my remarks. It follows:

CARELESS TALK COSTS LIVES

America is now in a war of attack.

Our enemies are losing. They are getting desperate.

They're working harder than ever to learn our plans, our weapons, the movements of our forces.

If they succeed, they will use the information to kill our men, throw back our attacks, delay victory.

YOUR HELP IS NEEDED

Civilians as well as fighters must help America win.

We must prevent the Axis from getting vital information. We must guard against careless talk which may be repeated and reach the ears of the enemy.

Little things can often give the enemy the clues he needs to discover important plans.

Seemingly unimportant "bits and pieces" of careless talk about our men, our weapons, and our equipment are gathered and studied by enemy experts.

These are carefully put together to reveal our plans, sink our ships, kill our men.

GUARD WHAT YOU KNOW

Don't tell anyone where a fighter is located outside the United States. Don't tell where he is going, when he is leaving, or anything about his training or equipment.

Never mention where ships are located, what cargoes they carry, when they (or the men on them) expect to sail, or where they are going.

Don't give out any information about the strength of our defenses, our armament, planes, tanks, ships, guns, or other military equipment.

Remember these simple rules for fooling the enemy:

If you hear it from someone, don't repeat it.

If you see it yourself, don't repeat it.

But if you read it in the press or hear it on the radio, it's public property; talk about it as much as you like.

Remember: Careless talk costs lives.

Establishment of a Permanent Nurse Corps in the Veterans' Administration

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced H. R. 5103, Seventy-eighth Congress, "A bill to provide for the establishment of a permanent Nurse Corps in the Veterans' Administration," which is in line with the purposes of the act of June 22, 1944, Public Law No. 346, Seventh-eighth Congress, commonly referred to as the G. I. bill of rights. Title I of that act contains administrative provisions to insure adequate protection to the veterans of World War No. 2 and prior wars, and to assist the Veterans' Administration in the discharge of its functions in the care of the disabled veterans.

NEED FOR A NURSE CORPS IN THE VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION

In the G. I. bill of rights, the Veterans' Administration is declared to be a war agency and its needs are to be met by priorities second only to the War and Navy Departments. Only in recent months has there been definite action to grant the Veterans' Administration the recognition required to retain necessary personnel and to secure additional workers required to meet the load. This belated action has meant the loss of Veterans' Administration personnel to the War and Navy Departments and other agencies and a definite handicap to the Veterans' Administration in competing with other agencies to secure necessary employees for the hospital functions. This weakness is most pronounced in regard to nurses. The lack of adequate pay, professional status, retirement, and other privileges militates against recruitment of nurses in the Veterans' Administration. Besides losses to other Government departments, civilian hospitals can make better offers than the Veterans' Administration. While aid has been given by commissioning Veterans' Administration doctors in the Army and giving them active duty status in the Veterans' Administration, nothing has been done to meet the nurse problem in similar manner.

There is pronounced need for nurses now, and during the coming year and thereafter, that need will be accelerated. Lack of adequate provision for nurses has burdened the head nurses with the problems resulting from loss of younger and more active nurses and has required them to perform bedside nursing thus neglecting ward supervision and teaching.

The inability of the Veterans' Administration to offer adequate status to student and graduate nurses necessarily reduces the possibility of necessary recruitment.

A CRITICAL SITUATION

The present situation is acute because it is not possible for the Veterans' Administration to give ex-service men and women adequate nursing care unless further inroads into and obstruction of recruitment to the nursing service are prevented. To reveal the critical situation at present, there are now 896 vacancies in nurse positions in the Veterans' Administration.

ADVANTAGES OF A NURSE CORPS

With the establishment of a Nurse Corps in the Veterans' Administration provided in my bill, H. R. 5103, the students now receiving training in Veterans' Administration facilities as senior cadet nurses will be attracted to this service as a permanent career, thus preventing turnover in nurse personnel. Further, the graduate nurses in the service and those contemplating appointment will have and be offered a status in keeping with their profession and more on a parity with the Army and Navy Nurse Corps.

Certainly our disabled veterans should be assured as efficient and adequate nursing service as furnished them prior to their discharge or release from active service. Thousands of our disabled World War No. 2 veterans are being transferred from Army and Navy hospitals directly to Veterans' Administration facilities. The nursing service to which they are sent will be made adequate only by providing a sufficient number of well-qualified nurses in those facilities.

I urge upon the Congress the necessity for recognition of this problem and early enactment of H. R. 5103.

McNutt's July 1 Order Blacks Out Independence Day in 1944

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOWARD BUFFETT
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. BUFFETT. Mr. Speaker, July 1, 1944, will be long remembered as a black day in the history of the United States. It is the day when the true liberty of man is to be snuffed out in America by McNutt's national-service edict. On this Fourth of July, the Declaration of Independence will have been repudiated by politicians who talk about freedom while setting up laws that destroy it.

The inalienable right of "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness" will have been eliminated by Executive order. Instead of our Government achieving unconditional surrender by Hitler and the Japs, we see the administration decreeing unconditional surrender of the liberty of the people of America.

I am familiar with the sugar-coated and honeyed words of explanation which accompany this order.

I am familiar with the smooth and clever language which outlines and makes so simple to understand this decisive step toward slave-labor battalions.

I am familiar with the cry of war necessity and the "essential to the war effort" ballyhoo which is being used to cover up the brutal truth about this referral and placement scheme.

I am familiar with all the booby-trap trickery concealing this slave-labor edict, because it follows so perfectly the pattern used by the dictators of Europe.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that on this Independence Day the fathers, mothers, wives, and sweethearts of our soldiers everywhere will be thinking about this McNutt labor-battalion Executive order. The loved ones of our soldier boys should be thinking about what kind of America their boys will come back to.

Will their boys come back to an America ruined by the same human slavery that those boys were sent thousands of miles to destroy? Have the free workers of America failed? This order says that the workers of America have failed, and must be enslaved. I deny it. It is the administration which has failed the people.

How will this McNutt order work out in practice? Here is an example from the same methods in England. It is the life story of 18-year-old Joseph Henry Wright, of Bursiem, Stoke-on-Trent.

He was killed, at the age of 18, in a pit explosion, on New Year's day, 1942. His father was a miner, too, and when he was injured in a pit he advised his son at all costs to get out of coal mining and seek other work. The youngster did this. In the spring of 1941 his father died, from injuries received down the pit. A few days before the end of 1941 the son was ordered to return to the pit. As he was getting ready for work, on New Year's day, he asked his widowed mother who should let the New Year in, and she said he could do this when he left the house for the pit. So he opened the door to the New Year, and, calling out "A Happy New Year" to his mother, started down the road. He never came back.

Here you have a father trying to rescue his son both from the living death and the actual death of labor in the pit, and the son then taken in the grip of officialdom and forced to return to it, and to his death.

The death of 18-year-old Joseph Wright is sad. That tragedy might pass unnoticed, however, as today many boys are dying because the brass hats have bungled. The fact that strikes terror in the hearts of common people is this—that officials, not responsible to the people, can treat the people like cattle. Truly the lights of liberty are growing very dim when men, like steers in the feedlots, are traded about in the market places and sent to labor and die without right of appeal or hope for the future. This order can end justice, it can end liberty, it can end righteousness in America.

Lincoln said at Gettysburg, "These dead shall not have died in vain." Will our own dead in World War No. 2 have died in vain? The answer is "Yes," if the slave-labor yoke can be fastened on the neck of the common people in full defiance of the Congress representing those people.

Mr. Speaker, 100 years ago, Daniel Webster said to the patriots of America:

There are men, in all ages, who mean to exercise power usefully; but they mean to exercise it. They mean to govern well; but they mean to govern. They promise to be kind masters; but they mean to be masters.

Patriots in 1944 should reread the Declaration of Independence and ponder Webster's warning as the McNutt National Service order locks its shackles on the laboring folks of America.

Railroad Reorganization

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SAM HOBBS
OF ALABAMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. HOBBS. Mr. Speaker, the battle now being waged by Wall Street against Main Street has terrific post-war implications, since it threatens the whole future of railroad service of the United States by destroying the confidence of the investing public in railroad securities. But the winning of this battle for Main Street cannot be postponed until after the war, because the slaughter of the small bona fide investors is now going on.

Wall Street owns high-priority railroad bonds, bonds secured by mortgages. No one questions the absolute necessity of insuring full payment of these bonds, both principal and interest. The pending bill, H. R. 4960, would not affect such adequate existing insurance. Like Portia, however, this bill insists that Wall Street has a right to demand its pound of flesh, but no blood.

Wall Street is now taking advantage of the "slaughter of the innocents"—Main Street bona fide investors in common stock and junior bonds—by buying bonds whose unearned increment is being built up by wiping out Main Street's junior securities. As usual, however, Wall Street is taking no chances. It is speculating on a certainty. There is no speculation, and will be none, in those classes of so-called securities now held by Main Street. Wall Street knows its game. Its denizens are, as usual, profiting by the killing of "the goose that lays the golden eggs." Since Wall Street wrote the rules by which this game is played, there is no hope for Main Street without amending those rules. National need of adequate railway service requires the protection of the investments of both Wall Street and Main Street in railway securities. The cardinal principle of fair play demands equal justice to both. Hence this bill.

The preservation of railway service will require credit of the kind extended by both Wall Street and Main Street and the restoration of what was supposed to be the true connotation of the word "securities." Security must mean complete assurance for the high priority mortage bond investors and at least reasonable assurance for the investors in common stock and bonds of lower priorities. Otherwise fewer railroads will run; and those that run will operate inadequately. Each of these deplorable results means fewer jobs for railroad men and lowered wages for labor as well as management.

From 30 to 40 percent of the railroad mileage in the United States is in receivership or reorganization. Yet there is no overcapitalization. As required by section 20A of the Interstate Commerce Act, all the "water" has been squeezed out of railroad stocks and junior bonds. Of course there never was any "water" in high priority bonds—Wall Street has always seen to that. Under section 19A of the Interstate Commerce Act, the honest appraised value of the physical properties of all railroads has been carefully made and is kept current by the Interstate Commerce Commission. So, under the law, we know that the stocks and all other securities issued by railroads have been approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission as fair to the investing public for the last 24 years, and, also, we know the fair market value of rights-of-way, tracks, yards, depots, rolling stock, supplies, and everything else the railroads own, less depreciation and obsolescence. Therefore, there should not be much uncertainty in the calculation of the value of either railroad paper or physical properties. The only serious question grew out of the fact that properly capitalized and equipped railroads vary in earning power. So, in 1935, Congress amended the law so as to require that in addition to all the accurate and dependable information furnished by the Interstate Commerce Commission as to the value of railway paper and equipment, it should, in conjunction with the ascertainment of these values, go further and consider earning power, past, present, and prospective.

In the reorganization of railroads under this amended statute, however, the Interstate Commerce Commission seems to discard two-thirds of the formula fixed by the amendment—to wit, present and prospective earnings—and to pay little or no attention to the value of railroad paper and equipment as fixed by the Commission itself under sections 20A and 19A of the Interstate Commerce Act. The apparent theory being that the war has caused present railroad earnings to be abnormally high and that future earnings are unpredictable, so that the actual earnings of the depression period is the only criterion left for fixing values, no matter what the Commission may have said theretofore. This means that the capital structures now being fixed by the Commission for reorganized railroads are based almost exclusively upon depression earnings. These, of course, were as notoriously low as the war earnings are notoriously high. Neither is a fair criterion. The law required and still requires that—

> The value of any property used in railroad operation shall be determined on a basis which will give due consideration to the earning power of the property, past, present, and prospective, and all other relevant facts.

The purpose of the Bankruptcy Act particularly of section 77 was to relieve debtors of some of their burdens, not of all of their properties.

With these ideas in mind, may I not commend to your careful study the unanimous report of the Committee on the Judiciary, recommending the passage of H. R. 4960?

AMENDING SECTION 77 OF THE BANKRUPTCY ACT (RAILROAD REORGANIZATIONS)

Mr. HOBBS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following report:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4960) to amend section 77 of the act of July 1, 1898, entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," as amended, having considered the same, report the bill favorably to the House, with the recommendation that it do pass. This report is unanimous.

The present bill has been substituted for an earlier bill, H. R. 2857, on which hearings were held, and contains changes made as a result of the hearings.

NECESSITY FOR REVISION OF SECTION 77

The purpose of the bill is to correct a very serious situation arising from the interpretation placed by the Interstate Commerce Commission and the courts upon the amendments of section 77 enacted by the Congress August 27, 1935. We believe this situation results from a misapprehension of the intention of Congress with respect to the 1935 amendments. The consequences have been and are so disastrous to railroad investors, and so dangerous to the credit of the railroads in general, that they should be corrected by legislation.

From a legal standpoint, the problem may be stated simply. Section 77 was directed primarily to the relief of financially embarrassed railroad companies through a revision of their capital structures and a reduction of fixed charges. It does not expressly provide for any reduction in the existing total capitalization; but the Interstate Commerce Commission has interpreted paragraph (d) of the section as authorizing it to fix the total capitalization of the reorganized company. In so doing, it has estimated a "capitalizable value of the assets" of the property based almost entirely upon "earning power"—earning power of the property, past, present, and prospective—as these words are used in section 77 (e). Its estimates of prospective earning power are necessarily speculative. Nevertheless, it has used its estimates of earning power to fix capitalizations in all cases very substantially below the existing capitalizations, regardless of the investment in the property and of the valuation previously determined by the Commission under section 19a of the Interstate Commerce Act. The Supreme Court in passing upon two major reorganization plans—the Western Pacific and the Chicago, Milwaukee, St. Paul & Pacific—upheld the Commission in this interpretation of the section, and has further held that the Commission's findings will not be disturbed where there is some evidence to support them. In other words, these administrative findings are beyond judicial review.

The result of this interpretation of the statute by the Commission, and the subsequent refusal of the courts to review the Commission's findings, has caused the destruction of hundreds of millions of dollars of railroad securities representing actual investment in the property made, to some extent at least, in reliance upon the belief that such investments could not be confiscated except by due process of law. In more detail, the legal problem is as follows:

The original section 77, "An act for the relief of debtors," enacted March 3, 1933, contained a provision in paragraph (d) that the Commission after a hearing on a plan of reorganization shall render a report approving a plan which "may be" different from any that had been proposed. As carried forward into the amendments of August 27, 1935, the language was as follows:

"After the filing of such a plan, the Commission, unless such plan shall be considered by it to be prima facie impracticable, shall, after due notice to all stockholders and creditors given in such manner as it shall determine, hold public hearings, at which opportunity shall be given to any interested party to be heard, and following which the Commission shall render a report and order in which it shall approve a plan, which may be different from any which has been proposed, that will in its opinion meet with the requirements of subsections (b) and (e) of this section, and will be compatible with the public interest; or it shall render a report and order in which it shall refuse to approve any plan. In such report the Commission shall state fully for the reasons for its conclusions."

Section 77, as amended, nowhere specifically authorizes the Commission to reduce the existing total capitalization. It does specifically authorize the Commission to reduce the fixed charges. Under subsection (d) as quoted, the Commission has acted upon the assumption that it had the power to reduce the total capitalization, even though that capitalization was well below the investment in the property and below the Commission's physical valuation fixed under section 19a of the act to regulate commerce.

Subsection (e) of the 1935 amendments requires the judge to approve the plan, if satisfied that it conforms with the provisions of subsection (b) (the principal one of which is the requirement that the plan shall provide for fixed charges of the reorganized company in such an amount that there shall be adequate coverage by the probable earnings available for the payment thereof), but contains no requirement that the court shall satisfy itself of the correctness of the Commission's action under subsection (d). The action of the Commission, therefore, in fixing the total capitalization under subsection (d) is not made specifically dependent upon the approval of the court.

Another of the 1935 amendments involved is the valuation section of paragraph (e). It will be recalled that in the Valuation Act of 1913 (Interstate Commerce Act, sec. 19a), the Commission was directed to determine the value of all the property owned or used by every common carrier, except certain street or suburban railways. It was required to report in detail as to each piece of property, the original cost, cost of reproduction new, the cost of reproduction less depreciation, and all other values and elements of value of the property of such common carrier; also, in detail and separate from improvements, the original cost of all lands and the present value of same. Having completed this work, it was required to serve notice of its tentative valuation upon the carrier, the Attorney General, and the Governors of the various States in which the properties are located. Thereupon, after hearing if a protest was filed, the valuation became final (sec. 19a (h) (i)). The latter section provides:

"All final valuations by the Commission and the classification thereof shall be published and shall be prima facie evidence of the value of the property in all proceedings under the Act to Regulate Commerce as of the date of the fixing thereof, and in all judicial proceedings for the enforcement of the act approved February 4, 1887, commonly known as the Act to Regulate Commerce, and the various acts amendatory thereof, and in all judicial proceedings brought to enjoin, set aside, annul, or suspend, in whole or in part, any order of the Interstate Commerce Commission."

The Commission further is required by section 19a to keep these valuations up to date by keeping itself informed of all new construction, improvements, retirements, and other changes in the condition, quantity, use, and classification of all such property. This valuation work has been in progress ever since the passage of the act and the Commission's files contain full information as to all the property of the carriers.

The 1935 amendments of section 77 included the following paragraph as to valuation:

"If it shall be necessary to determine the value of any property for any purpose under this section, the Commission shall determine such value and certify the same to the court in its report on the plan. The value of any property used in railroad operation shall be determined on a basis which will give due consideration to the earning power of the property, past, present, and prospective, and all other relevant facts. In determining such value only such effect shall be given to the present cost of reproduction new and less depreciation and original cost of the property, and the actual investment therein, as may be required under the law of the land, in light of its earning power and all other relevant facts."

This section was proposed to us by the late Joseph B. Eastman, then Federal Coordinator of Transportation. Both Mr. Eastman and his counsel expressed the view that it was desirable, and also that it would not deprive the stockholder affected by any valuation found thereunder from having his day in court for a judicial determination of the value of the property so found.

In proceedings under section 77, the Interstate Commerce Commission has developed what it terms a "capitalizable value" of railway properties, derived from its consideration of earning power under subsection (e); and purporting to act under subsection (d), has limited the capitalization of the reorganized company to the capitalizable value so determined.

At the time these 2 amendments were adopted, some 30 class I railroads, owning an aggregate of 75,000 to 80,000 miles of line, were undergoing reorganization. At this time, only a few of these reorganizations are complete. The first of the reorganization cases to reach the Supreme Court were those of the Western Pacific (Frederick H. Ecker v. Western Pacific R. R. Corp., 318 U. S. 448, 87 L. ed. 892), and the Chicago, Milwaukee, St. Paul & Pacific (Group of Institutional Investors v. Chicago, Milwaukee, St. Paul & Pacific R. R. Co., 318 U. S. 523, 87 L. ed. 959), both decided March 15, 1943. The Court held in these cases that the findings of the Interstate Commerce Commission as to "capitalizable value" would not be disturbed if they were supported by substantial evidence, and the courts were powerless, under section 77, to grant a judicial review of the findings of the Commission as to valuation determined under section 77 (e), and as to the total capitalization determined under section 77 (d). The result was that the stockholders of both companies were eliminated from participation in the reorganized company, although their stock represented actual investment in the properties, and all security holders of both companies suffered a reduction in the integrity of their holdings and in the probable return on their investments.

In five major companies now undergoing reorganization, the reductions in capitalization aggregate some $600,000,000, meaning that this amount of railroad securities has been eliminated in the reorganization of these five companies alone, although there is no question that the investment in road and equipment and the 19a valuations at the present time are far in excess of the capitalization determined by the Commission. The same is true generally of the other roads involved in reorganization, these five being specifically mentioned, because they are included in one exhibit submitted to this committee by the Interstate Commerce Commission (hearings on H. R. 2857, serial No. 9, p. 199).

That this situation has created an unbearable hardship upon the junior investors in railroad securities and constitutes a real danger to railroad credit may be easily seen from a glance at current railroad earnings. In 1942 the Missouri Pacific earned $32.67 a share on the common stock outstanding under the old capitalization; the Denver & Rio Grande Western, $34.40 a share; Rock Island, $25.11; Frisco, $18.03; St. Louis Southwestern, $27.23. These figures approximately were repeated in 1943, and the high earnings are continuing in 1944. Yet these stocks, which have demonstrated such an earning power, have been absolutely wiped out in reorganization, and the stockholders are without remedy. Moreover, the junior securities of all these roads have been drastically cut in reorganization and the senior securities have been very largely converted into income bonds and preferred and common stock. In one case, the Commission estimated a normal earning power of $11,000,000, and based its capitalization upon that figure; yet in the same year in which the Commission's plan was announced (1941) that road earned more than $18,000,000. In 1942, it earned $36,000,000, and in 1943 $37,000,000. Nevertheless, the Commission still says the old common stock is worthless. The stockholders are without remedy. There is in practical effect no judicial review of the action of the Commission. Although its guess as to future earning power has been demonstrated to be wrong, its findings are final.

It is true that in the last few years earnings due to wartime traffic have surpassed all expectations. It is a fortunate thing for the country that its first line of defense—the transportation system—was able to handle this traffic with such magnificent results. The Commission, in fixing its plans, did not foresee it; likewise, no one can foresee what traffic there will be for the railroads after hostilities have ceased. There will, of course, be a reduction in the wartime traffic, but, unless we are to concede that we are willing to get along with a much less adequate transportation system, and unless we are to admit that our efforts at readjustment after the war will be a failure, then we must insist that the owners of these securities now being confiscated should share in the prosperity which has come as a result of the war and in that which necessarily will follow in rebuilding the Nation's industries.

THE PURPOSE OF THE BILL

The primary purpose of the bill is to insure that the courts shall make an independent judicial review of each plan and of the evidence upon which the plan is based. Under the existing statute, the Commission is required to certify to the court a transcript of its proceedings; and the court is required to notify all parties and, if objections are filed, to have a hearing. The effect of the proposed amendments is to require the judge to make an independent judicial determination of the facts found by the Commission, and not to hold that the administrative finding of the Commission is beyond judicial review. With this object in mind, the bill provides that the judge shall not only be satisfied that the plan complies with the provisions of subsection (b) as in the present statute, but must also be satisfied that it complies with the provisions of subsection (d), which the Supreme Court held was not within the province of judicial review. This will add nothing to the requirements of the present statute as to the hearing and the scope of the evidence; it will merely direct the courts to exercise the traditional right of review, and to give the parties and the public the benefit thereof.

Second, and as a means of insuring that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall be guided by some standard in determining the permissible capitalization of the reorganized company, the bill provides that the existing total capitalization shall not be reduced below the lower of either the investment in the property or the physical valuation as previously determined by the Commission under section 19a. Naturally, if the existing capitalization exceeds the investment, it should be susceptible of reduction, if the Commission finds it is not supported by earning power; or, if the existing capitalization exceeds the physical valuation found by the Commission, it should be susceptible of reduction, unless in that event the Commission deems the earning power sufficient to support it. But where the existing capitalization represents actual investment in the property, or where it is not in excess of the value determined by the Commission under the mandate of law, then it should not be disturbed.

If the transportation system of the country is to be adequately financed, investment in railroad securities must be kept attractive for private investors. It is folly to expect investors to finance new railroads by purchasing stocks or junior securities which may be arbitrarily eliminated. Twenty-four years ago in Congress the question of railroad credit was discussed by Mr. Rayburn, of Texas, who, in advocating the enactment of section 20a of the Transportation Act of 1920, stated (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 66th Cong., 1st sess., vol. 58, pt. 8, p. 8376):

"Of course, the credit of the railroads has been destroyed. But if we write into the law of the land a statute to the effect that before a railroad can issue new securities, before it can put them on the market, it must come before the properly constituted governmental agency, lay the full facts of its financial situation before that body, tell that body what it intends to do with the money derived from the sale of the issue of securities, and after it has received the approval of that regulating body and it goes out and puts those securities on the market, then the Interstate Commerce Commission by this law is empowered at any time to call it to account and have it tell to that regulating body that it expended the money, the proceeds of the sale of securities, for the purposes for which it had made the application. Then we shall have railroad securities that will stand for value in the markets of this country and in the markets of all the world."

It is under this section 20a that the Commission has authorized the issue of some $20,000,000,000 of securities, plus some 20,000,000 shares of capital stock without par value (I. C. C. Activities, 1887–1937, p. 168). Section 20a of the act requires in every case that the Commission certify that the proposed issue of securities is compatible with the public interest. It is ironical that many of the securities which the Commission is now wiping out in reorganizations under its determinations of permissible capitalizations are securities which, directly or indirectly, have been approved by the Commission under section 20a. Many instances have been cited to us which it is not necessary to repeat here.

The important thing is that the Commission in determining total capitalization has no standard to guide it. It must make an estimate of future earning power. In the very nature of things, it cannot foresee with any degree of accuracy what the future earning power will be. As Commissioner Miller said in one case (242 I. C. C. 475), "We are not omniscient and cannot foresee the future."

Another reason why the Commission's estimates of earning power are unsatisfactory as a means of determining value is that the earning power of the carriers generally is within the control of the Commission. Under our scheme of regulation, it is the Commission's duty so to regulate the rate structure that there will be a fair return on the value (as determined under sec. 19a) of the property devoted to public use (act, sec. 15a). It is that provision which justifies an investor in investing his funds in railway capitalization. To say that because the Commission has failed, for whatever reason, to obtain this result, the investor should be destroyed, is certainly not due process of law and cannot conceivably benefit railway credit.

In order to carry out the policy, however, of having fixed interest charges reduced, the bill contains a proviso in section 1 (11) that, if the existing capitalization is in excess of the value of the debtor's property as certified by the Commission under subsection (e)—that is, of what the Commission terms "capitalizable value"—the excess shall be represented by no-par stock issued at the rate of one share for each $100 of such excess. The purpose of this is to afford to the existing stockholders and junior security holders a continued interest in the property. This no-par common stock will still represent actual investment in the property and will still represent a value which the Commission itself has determined under section 19a. It will in no sense be a speculative medium. In bad years, it will pay no dividends; in the good years it should reap the benefit of prosperity at least sufficient to compensate for what the investor has lost in the bad years. As the matter stands now, the investor has suffered through the bad years, and when prosperity has returned the procedure under section 77—originally designed as an act for the relief of debtors—has taken his investment and turned it over to his creditors.

In this connection, the bill contains an additional provision which may be quite helpful. It requires the Commission to name one of its members to confer with the parties in interest and to endeavor to act as a mediator to reconcile their differences. It is thought that this provision will avoid much controversy and consequently shorten the proceedings.

EFFECT ON PENDING REORGANIZATIONS

The bill is made to apply to all reorganization proceedings now pending, except where the property dealt with by the plan has been transferred to a new corporation or retained by the debtor pursuant to the plan, or where the plan has been voted on and accepted by the requisite percentage of creditors of each class prior to the effective date of this amendment.

It is not believed that the provisions of the bill will result in any delay in the pending cases. If it did so result, however, that would not be an objection to correcting a wrong. All of the facts in all of the pending cases are already of record. No long-drawn-out investigation in any case would be necessary to enable the court to pass judicially upon the Commission's determination of earning power. The standards by which the new capitalization is to be measured, that is, the actual investment and the 19a valuations, are readily accessible from the files of the Commission, and in most cases have been introduced into the records already before the courts. While the Commission's valuations under section 19a are by statute made only prima facie evidence (sec. 19a (1)), and may be contested in court when improperly made (United States v. Los Angeles & Salt Lake R. R. Co., 273 U. S. 299) 19a valuations do not involve any conflict as to the facts, all of which are matters of record. The controversy would relate only to principles, or the evaluation of evidence.

We conclude, therefore, that the enactment of this portion of the bill would not tend to delay the progress of pending plans. Delay, however, would be preferable to confiscation.

The committee has held protracted hearings on H. R. 2857 for which the present bill is a substitute embodying amendments made as a result of those hearings, and has reached the conclusion that the consummation of the reorganization plans as now framed would be a severe blow to railroad credit and make it well-nigh impossible for any but the richest railroads to obtain new capital on attractive terms. Certainly the present prices of railroad stocks, which are discouragingly low in spite of very high earnings, indicate that no new financing can be done through the medium of common stock until something has been accomplished toward the restoration of railroad credit. Particularly is this true in the case of the reorganized railroads whose preferred and common stocks are being traded in on a when-issued basis at far below par, generally around 35 to 40 for new preferred stocks, and 15 to 20 for new common stocks. This in itself is a commentary on the public regard in which railroad stocks are held. Just emerging from reorganizations after years of careful consideration by the Commission and in a time of rare prosperity, the natural expectation would be that all of the new securities would bring par. As it is now, the only way for the reorganized roads to finance their necessary capital requirements, which we are advised will be heavy after the war, is to issue first-morageg bonds to provide funds, and this will lead back to the evils which section 77 was designed to prevent. The current prices of the new junior securities about to be issued under the Commission's plan indicate that future investment therein has been discouraged by what has happened to the present holders of existing issues. We believe this bill will go far toward curing this situation and, therefore, recommend its passage.

Freedom in America and the World

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHRISTIAN A. HERTER

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. HERTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the following address by Hon. Herbert Hoover before the Republican National Convention in Chicago on June 27, 1944, entitled "Freedom in America and the World":

Delegates and guests of the Republican Convention, we meet at a difficult time for a political convention. Millions of sons of both Republicans and Democrats are fighting and dying side by side for the freedom of mankind. But it is the part of freedom for which they fight that we should carry on at home. Nothing could be a greater shock to freedom than for us to suspend the national election or the soul-searching criticism which will make the more sure that the war will be won and freedom preserved.

Tonight I propose to speak to you upon some larger forces which are contending in this world convulsion. And the direction our country should take if freedom of men is to be preserved.

You will, I am sure, permit me to claim some personal experience with these larger forces which are today dominating mankind.

Like most of you, coming from forebears to whom hard work was the price of existence, I worked with my hands for my daily bread. I have tasted the despair of fruitless search for a job. I have seen the problems of labor both as a workman and as a manager of industry. Long before the First World War professional work took me to many lands under many governments, both of freemen and tyrannies. I dealt with the poverty and squalor of Asia and the frozen class barriers of Europe. I participated on behalf of my country in the First World War. I saw the untold destruction and misery from that war. I dealt with famine among millions. I dealt with violence and revolution. I saw the degeneration and regeneration of nations. I saw intimately the making of the peace treaty at Versailles.

And in all those years of travel to every corner of the earth I landed a hundred times on the shores of my country. Every time it was with deep emotion and gratitude. Emotion, because here was the sanctuary of real freedom. Here was a land of opportunity, a land of wider-spread comfort, a land of greater kindliness, a land of self-reliance and self-respect among men. And gratitude, because I had been born in this land.

During another 12 years I was placed by my countrymen where I had to contend with peace and war and where I had to deal with the hurricanes of social and economic destruction which were its aftermaths. I have had to deal with explosions of Asiatic antagonism to the west. I have seen the rising tide of totalitarianism sweeping over the world.

Why do I recite all of this? Because the experience that has come to me, the honors that have been given to me demand of me that I contribute whatever I can to preserve freedom in America and the world.

THE 170 YEARS OF STRUGGLE AND FREEDOM

Over long periods the deep-rooted forces in the world move slowly. Then from accumulated pressures have come explosive periods with wars, convulsions, violent change, and a train of stupendous problems. And always a part of the complex forces in these gigantic explosions has been the quest of man to be free.

The first of these gigantic explosions which was to shake the modern world began 170 years ago with the American War of Independence and the French Revolution. After those world wars there followed a hundred years of comparative peace in which the will to freedom spread widely over the earth.

Then came the gigantic explosion of the last World War. Again among the forces in that convulsion was the death clash of freemen and dictatorship.

Men inspired by freedom were victorious 25 years ago and freedom spread to additional millions of mankind. But victorious men failed to lay the foundation of lasting peace. And from the destruction of that World War came unemployment and poverty over the whole world. And in its wake also came instability of governments, lowering of morals, frustration of ideals and defeatism. Out of this desperate aftermath despotism rose again in the grim shapes of fascism and communism. By them the freedom of men was defeated over a large part of the earth.

Now we are in the midst of the greatest explosion in all the history of civilization. Again freemen are fighting for the survival of human liberty.

FREEDOM PERMITS NO COMPROMISE IN THIS WAR

By whatever failures of statesmanship the world were brought to this ghastly second world war, the realistic fact is that we are in it. There is only one way out of war—that is, to win it. And victory will come again to our armies and fleets for the sons of America do not quit. By winning the war I mean absolute victory over the enemy armies. Any compromise with Hitler or Tojo will destroy all hope of either freedom or a lasting peace. That is our pledge to these thousands of our men who are dying in the islands of the Pacific and upon the fields of Italy and France.

We are fighting not alone for preservation of freedom, but also for the moral and spiritual foundations of civilization. And it is not alone these foundations under other parts of the world which concerns us today. We have need to look to our American house.

OUR MEN WANT FREEDOM WHEN THEY COME HOME

Recently a canvass was made among youth, both in the armed forces and on the home front, to learn what sort of a world they wanted after this war. I may tell you:

They want a home with a family, a dog, and an automobile. They want the security and self-respect of a job. They want to be free to choose their own jobs and not to be ordered to them by a bureaucrat. They want to prove their own worth and have the rewards of their own efforts. They want to be free to plan their own lives. They want to be free to undertake their own adventures.

They want the pleasure of creative work. They want the joy of championing justice for the weak. They want to tell every evil person where he can go. They want a government that will keep down oppression whether from business or labor. They want a fair chance. They want peace in the world that their children never need go through the agonies and sacrifices they have themselves endured.

They want to be free Americans again. Unexpressed in all this there is deep in their souls a force that reaches back into a thousand generations. That is, the ceaseless yearning of humankind to be free. Its advance is as sure as the movement of the stars in the universe. It is as real as the law of gravitation. It is as everlastihg as the existence of God.

DEGENERATION OF FREEDOM IN THE UNITED STATES

At each of the great rallies of our party in 1936, in 1940, and today in 1944, I have been called to speak upon the encroachments and the dangers to freedom in our country. Each time I knew even before I spoke that our people would not believe that the impairment of freedom could happen here. Yet each subsequent 4 years has shown those warnings to have been too reserved, too cautious.

The reason why these warnings have been accurate is simple. From the beginning the New Deal in a milder form has followed the tactics of European revolutions which have gone before. The direction being set, the destination is not difficult to foresee.

The violent forms of these European revolutions all have certain methods in common. They seek to destroy every safeguard of personal liberty and justice. Their method was to create centralized government and a single political party. Purge was their political weapon. Their economic system is regimentation through coercion by bureaucracy. Their faith is the negation of Christianity—that the end justifies the means. Their strategy is to make public opinion by falsehood and to destroy opposition by assassination of character through smearing.

Now I ask you a question. Do you recognize any similarity between these practices and the 10 years of the New Deal?

Has not every distress, every sorrow, every fear of the people been used to further fasten some part of these totalitarian practices upon us?

With the blessing of the Attorney General, the Communists, and the fellow travelers are spending vast sums to reelect this regime. Would they spend their money to support the freedom of men?

We all recognize that to win this war many liberties must temporarily be suspended at home. We have had to accept much dictatorship of bureaucracy. We must adopt some of the very practices against which we are fighting. In former wars we had no fear of such temporary suspension of liberty. Abraham Lincoln and Woodrow Wilson believed in freedom of men.

Long before the war, in an address on January 3, 1936, Mr. Roosevelt recounted how he had built up new instruments of public power which could provide shackles for the liberties of the people in any other hands. Freedom is not promoted by shackles in anybody's hands.

We now know the peacetime shackles they provided for the liberties of the people. They put shackles on our farmers. They put them on honest labor unions, on the freedom of workmen, on honest business enterprise. They have done more. These bureaucrats with these instruments of power fanned bitter hatreds between labor unions which divided the ranks of labor. And they fanned hate between employers and workmen. They built class conflict instead of national unity.

Can a regime which forged shackles on the liberties of the people in peacetime be trusted to return freedom to the people from the shackles of war?

Our present rulers have now issued an abridged edition of the Bill of Rights and the other constitutional guaranties of the citizens from oppression by government. They call the new version the "four freedoms." The original edition, issued and perfected by the fathers, contains 30 freedoms, not 4 only. True freedom abides in the whole 30. They have enriched the soil and the soul of this land for 170 years. Not 1 or 4 but all of them together have brought the greatest advance in civilization in the history of mankind. In this time of crisis to freedom should we amend or abandon any of them?

The Constitution of the United States is a philosophy of government. It is not suspended even by war. But apparently some of these guaranties in our Constitution have not yet been approved by the O. P. A., the W. L. B., the N. L. R. B., the F. E. C., the F. C. C., and some other parts of the alphabet.

If you happen to get into the clutches of these agencies, you will find a lot of the spirit of even the Magna Carta has been forgotten, to say nothing of the Constitution. As an exercise in history you might read again some of those rights, such as trial by jury; the right of appeal to the courts; just compensation for property taken for public use; the provisions against search and seizure; taking of property without due process of law; and others.

These 30 freedoms guaranteed by the Constitution will survive only so long as their safeguards also survive. I need not remind you of the steady invasion of States' rights; the packing of the courts; the dictation to Congress; the constant proof that executive officials arrogate unlawful authority.

Only by a change in administration will our returning soldiers find freedom preserved at home.

REGENERATION OF FREEDOM IN THE UNITED STATES

The price of freedom is not only vigilance as to rights and their safeguards. It also requires vision and action to keep freedom in step with social and economic change that would restrict it.

There is little real freedom for citizens, who, because of forces beyond their control, must go hungry, cold, sick, or ignorant. From the very beginning the faith of America has been that we were our brother's keeper. In earlier time that responsibility was attended to by neighbors, by counties, by municipalities. Many years ago the State governments began to assume a larger part in these responsibilities. In recent years the Federal Government has assumed a part of the burden in education, public health, and by various experiments in old-age pensions and unemployment insurance. But if all these services are to bear the full fruit in freedom, they must be cleared of politics and discrimination. They must be placed upon expanded and firmer foundations.

For the past 70 years the American people have had to engage in battle for freedom on our own economic front. The fertile soil of freedom has grown gigantic business and labor organizations which have immensely increased our comfort and our standards of living.

The vast majority of both business and labor leaders are honest and patriotic. We cannot, however, permit even a small minority of arrogant and irresponsible business leaders to dominate the freedom of men through monopolies, unfair treatment of labor, and manipulation of elections. Neither can we have even a small minority of arrogant and irresponsible labor leaders dominating the freedom of men, dictating who can have jobs and manipulating elections. The truly American concept is that we shall maintain freedom from such abuses by a government of law instead of by the whimsicalities of men or the regimentation of men. We do not need to burn down the house of freedom with the fires of totalitarianism to destroy a few rats.

An imperative problem in freedom is rising before us in the transition from war economy to peace economy. We must convert huge plants and find peacetime jobs in industry for 30,000,000 men and women.

We must begin now to make the blueprints of this transition. But before the blueprints can even be commenced, the major question for America must be determined. That is, in what economic and social climate, under what sort of conditions is this transition to be made? Already the new dealers have planned a large number of Trojan Horses labeled "liberalism" and "freedom" stuffed with a mixture of totalitarian economics and with doubtful statistics. The easiest task of government is to suppress individuals, subject them to bureaucracy, and subsidize them to lean on governments—or a political party. If a government has enough power, it can always do that. The hard task of government, and the really liberal task, is to build self-reliance, stimulate initiative, and thereby create men and women of energy, of dignity, and of independence. That is the motive power of America.

We will need every atom of this power in the Nation, if we are quickly to convert from guns to plowshares in such fashion as to provide jobs and opportunity for all our people. That can never be had by bureaucratic curbing of initiative, class war, or any other mixture of this totalitarianism with freedom. The decision between these philosophies of government must be made now. For the plans must be established now. We cannot be without a peace program as we were without a preparedness program. We owe it to our fighting men that they find no delays in productive jobs.

Only by a change in administration will these gigantic problems be solved in a climate of freedom.

A WORLD IN WHICH FREEDOM CAN LIVE

We are faced already with the gigantic problems of making a peace where freedom can live. The world cannot go on like this. Science daily creates more dreadful weapons. Chivalry and compassion have gone out of modern war. Women and children are slaughtered and starved with the same ruthlessness as armed men. We cannot fail again in making peace that sticks if civilization is to survive.

Already during this war we are making the mold in which the new world will be cast. Some of these shapes are already beginning to emerge.

1. It is obvious that the hot fires of nationalism are rising out of the emotions of this war just as they do from every war. The Communist internationalism of Russia has been driven out by the nationalist aspiration to free Mother Russia and expand the Empire. Other United Nations are demanding the independent resumption of their possessions. Mr. Churchill has stated that he did not become His Majesty's Prime Minister to preside over the liquidation of the British Empire. I am sure that if the Republican Party comes to power it will not be to liquidate either the economic welfare or the independence of the United States.

2. It is obvious from the rise of nationalism that ideas of world super-government, no matter how idealistic, are already dead from these cold blasts of realism. Peace must be based upon cooperation between independent sovereign nations.

3. It is obvious that three great dominant centers of power will emerge from this war—that is, the United States, Great Britain, Russia and possibly China as a fourth. And France will someday return as a major power.

4. It is obvious that there must be some sort of world organization to preserve peace. It is proposed that, like the League of Nations, it shall have a general assembly representing all peaceful nations and a council in which the great centers of power have a permanent part. If the general assembly is not to be a mere debating society, it should be split into three divisions—one for Europe, one for Asia and one for the Western Hemisphere. And each region should be given the primary responsibility for peace in its area before the central council is called upon. Especially should that responsibility be imposed on Europe where the dangers of world wars come from.

5. It is obvious that there must be a long transition period from war to stable peace. Before any organization to preserve peace can succeed, the foundations of political and economic reconstruction of the world must be laid in such a manner as to allay the causes of war. Unless these foundations are securely laid, any temple dedicated to preserving peace will be built upon sand. That was the disaster of the League of Nations. A good league has never cured a bad peace.

6. It is obvious that the great centers of power in Washington, London, and Moscow will dominate these vital political and economic settlements no matter what peace-preserving machinery is set up. Their approach to these settlements must be that of trustees for all nations not their selfish interests. They must not become a disguised military alliance or become the scene for power politics or balance of power. The whole history of the world is punctuated by the collapse of such methods into renewed wars.

7. It should be obvious that there can be no lasting peace unless the productivity of the world be restored. That can come only by exertion from within nations and from political settlements which give them a chance. The United States must furnish food to thousands of starving towns and cities ravaged by the enemy. We should have long since been feeding the undernourished children for compassion is not dead in America. The United States can be helpful to all mankind, but it is certain we cannot finance a world W. P. A.

8. It is obvious the American people have but one purpose in this war. We want to live in peace. We do not want these horrors again. We want no territory except some Pacific island bases that will protect the United States. We want no domination over any nation. We want no indemnities. We want no special privileges.

But we do want the freedom of nations from the domination of others, call it by whatever name we will—liberation of peoples, self-government, or just restored sovereignty. We want it both in the cause of freedom and we want it because we know that there can be no lasting peace if enslaved peoples must ceaselessly strive and fight for freedom.

There are constants in the relations between nations that are more nearly to be found in their history, their surroundings, their ideals, their hearts, than in the declarations of their officials. Foreign relations are not sudden things created by books or speeches or banquets. The history of nations is more important than their oratory.

The ideal of freedom for other peoples lies deep in American history and the American heart. It did not arise from Woodrow Wilson's Fourteen Points nor from the Atlantic Charter. It was embedded in the hearts of the American people by the suffering and sacrifice with which they won their own independence. It was in response to the cry for liberation and freedom of peoples that we established the Monroe Doctrine, that we fought the Mexican War, the Spanish War, and the First World War. And now, after 20 years, we again sacrifice the sons of America to the call of freedom.

Without this spiritual impulse of freedom for others we would not have engaged in a single one of these wars. Had we not been concerned with the freedom of China, we would not have been attacked at Pearl Harbor. Only because freedom was in jeopardy in all Europe are we making this gigantic effort.

Therefore, the American people are not likely to welcome any settlements which do not include the independence of Poland as well as every other country which desires to be free from alien domination. Americans do not want this war to end in the restriction of freedom among nations. It is obvious that the United States will emerge from this war the strongest military, and thus political, power in the world. Our power to bring freedom to the world must not be frittered away.

SOME ROADS THAT DO NOT LEAD TO FREEDOM

During the past month Forrest Davis has published a circumstantial account of the Teheran Conference. It is said to have been authorized. It has not been denied. It relates to President Roosevelt's new peace method, called by him, "The Great Design." A peace method under this same name, "The Great Design," was proposed by Henry the Fourth, a French monarch, some 350 years ago. It had some similarities to Mr. Roosevelt's idea.

We are told Mr. Roosevelt had this "Great Design" in mind during his recent conference at Teheran.

So far as these published descriptions go this method is power politics and balance of power diplomacy. That is not the diplomacy of freedom. And worse still apparently the United States is to furnish the balance between Britain and Russia. If that be the case you may be sure that we will sooner or later gain the enmity of both of them. The basis of lasting peace for America must be friendship of nations not brokerage of power politics.

There may have been no political commitments at Teheran. But certainly since that conference we have seen a series of independent actions by Russia which seem to be the negative of restored sovereignty to certain peoples. Certainly the Atlantic Charter has been sent to the hospital for major amputations of freedom among nations. The American people deserve a much fuller exposition of this great design.

And the Teheran Conference raises another question. Under our form of government the President cannot speak either for the Congress or the conclusions of American public opinion. The only way for America to succeed in foreign relations is by open declaration of policies. They must first have seasoned consideration and public understanding. These do not come by secret diplomacy. America cannot successfully bluff, intrigue, or play the sordid game of power politics.

Nothing contributed more to the tragedy of Versailles than the suspicion and misunderstandings which arose when the heads of states sought to persuade and beguile each other in secret. Such unchecked bartering results in implications, deductions, and appeasements will rise to plague us.

Direct conferences by heads of state and their military leaders on military questions are useful. But under our institutions and our public opinion negotiation in political matters with our allies should be conducted by secretaries of state. The President of the United States is far more influential delivering considered judgments from the White House. The voice from that pulpit is far more potent than any beguilement in private conversation in some foreign city, or any personal power diplomacy.

President Wilson also had a "great design" most of which was lost by the blandishments and pressures of personal negotiation. Every thinking American views with great apprehension a repetition of 1919. America needs a change in administration to get out of personal power diplomacy.

FREEDOM, THE JOB OF YOUTH

There is a force for freedom as old as life itself which will emerge with new vividness from the complexities of the times. Not only life but freedom itself must find regeneration from youth.

In every generation youth presses forward toward achievement. Each generation has the right to build its own world out of the materials of the past, cemented by the hopes of the future.

Older men declare war. But it is youth that must fight and die. And it is youth who must inherit the tribulation, the sorrow, and the triumphs that are the aftermath of war.

This convention is handing the leadership of the Republican Party to a new generation. And soon to support these younger men there will be an oncoming generation who will differ from all others. Twelve million young men matured far beyond their years under the supreme tests of war will be coming home. To them will be added the other millions of young men and women serving in the shops, on the farms, and in the offices. They also, by the responsibilities they have shared, have had their minds and understanding advanced beyond their age. From the tremendous experience in this war this new generation will have grown in responsibility, in dignity, in initiative, and skills.

And these young men who are offering their lives on the beaches and in the mud, those who are fighting in the air, those who battle on the seas, will return to demand justification for their sacrifices and for the sacrifice of their buddies who have died. They will insist upon a reckoning and they will be stern and hard-faced. They will reject the easy language of politics, the straddlings and compromises, and the senseless phrases of skilled ghost writers. And they will be watchful of political leaders lest they again be led into the giving of the blood and risking the future of their families from failures in international statesmanship. Today, more than any new generation that we have known, youth will demand a voice in its own destiny.

I rejoice that this is to be. Youth can bring the courage, the ideals, and confidence which can erect a new society in America upon the debris of two world wars. We need their courage as never before.

We, the older generation, who have learned something of the great forces in the world, can advise and counsel. The issues are not new, and we can distill principles from the experience of the past. But youth must act and the past can never wholly point the way through the changing future.

And let me say this to the many younger Republicans in this convention. On each election night, I read of able young Republican men and women who are chosen by their countrymen to positions of trust and eminence. I see men whom I have known since they cut their eye teeth in district politics, rise to State and city government, to the Congress, and to the governorship in their State. From that I know that our party is a living institution recruiting from the oncoming generation its brilliant men and women and setting them to work for the good of our country. And it is through this living institution, the Republican Party, that I call upon the younger generations to take up the weapons for American liberty, to fight the good fight in the manner and according to the lights of their own time.

And may I say this to youth: You have a great material heritage. You are receiving millions of farms and homes built by your forebears. There have been prepared for you magnificent cities, great shops, and industries. But you have even a greater heritage. That is a heritage of religious faith of morals and of liberty. There is no problem which confronts the Nation that you cannot solve within this framework.

You in your own manner can lead our people away from the jungle of disorderly, cynical, and bitter ideas, the topsy-turvy confusions, the hopelessness and lack of faith and defeatism that have haunted this Nation over these dozen years. You can lead our Nation back to unity of purpose again.

We of the older generation know that you will carry forward. We wish you to carry the torch bravely and aloft. Carry it with the dauntless assurance of your forebears who faced the chill of the ocean, the dangers of the forest and desert,. the loneliness of the pioneer to build upon this continent a nation dedicated to justice and liberty and the dignity of the individual man. Watch over it. Vigilantly guard it. Protect it from foes, within and without. Make for this a sanctuary and dedicate it to God and all mankind.

Youth of the Republican Party, I, representing the generation of your fathers, greet you and send you forth crusaders for freedom which alone can come under a constitutional republic—a constitutional America.

We who have lived long, turn our eyes upon your generation lovingly with hope, with prayer, and with confidence for our country.

Absentee Voting by Members of the Armed Services

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM J. MILLER

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, during the past year the Congress of the United States and the General Assembly of the State of Connecticut have enacted laws providing an opportunity for citizens of Connecticut now serving in our armed forces to cast an absentee ballot in any local, State, or national election.

The Connecticut General Assembly, it seems to me, met its responsibility by passing one of the most comprehensive and liberal absentee ballot laws in the country. The Federal law, however, is more restrictive and cumbersome than seemed to me to be necessary.

During the debate on the servicemen's absentee voting bill I supported the Green-Lucas-Worley bill because that proposal was more simple and direct than the bill finally approved by Congress. I would have liked to see every State make the necessary arrangements to send an absentee ballot to every service man and woman from each respective State. Congress could then have provided for the transportation, via air mail, to and from every camp and battlefront with the State ballot. We could then have provided that whenever a soldier or sailor failed to receive the ballot from his home town he could have then voted the so-called Federal or short-form ballot without any red tape, and without the necessity of swearing that before a certain date that he applied for a State ballot and that by another certain date it had not reached him. The Federal ballot provides only for the election of a President, Vice President, Members of the Senate, and Members of the House of Representatives. That debate is now water over the dam and the immediate task before us is to see that every man and woman serving in the Army, Navy, merchant marine, or the various Army and Navy auxiliaries that I will refer to later have a chance to vote this fall. For the convenience of Connecticut service men and women I submit the following information:

VOTING PROCEDURE UNDER CONNECTICUT LAW

Under the law approved by a special session of the Connecticut General Assembly held in January 1944, members of the armed forces, which include members of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, or merchant marine, or those serving in the American Red Cross, the Society of Friends, the Women's Auxiliary Service Pilots, or the United Service Organization attached to and serving with the armed forces:

Members of the above-named organization do not need to be absent from the State in order to vote by absentee ballot but merely be away from their home town. They may apply in person for such a ballot, they may apply through an authorized agent, or by mail. The record shows the voters in every town are authorized under the law to make application on behalf of the serviceman and cause an absentee ballot to be sent to him. Anyone, friend or relative, may make such a request of the registrar of voters who will in turn make application to the town clerk and the ballot will be sent forthwith. This ballot may be sent to the service address or if it is lacking to the best known address in the possession of the registrar, which will probably be his home address and then forwarded. These ballots will be sent 4 months prior to the election which will give ample time for the ballot to be executed and returned to the town clerk. Accompanying the ballot will be complete instructions together with a list of all nominations made by August 15. The ballot provides for the voting of a straight Republican or Democratic ticket, a split ticket, or a complete slate of the names of the voter's own choosing. After the serviceman has made out his ballot, sealed it in an envelope provided for the purpose, appeared before a commissioned officer, and executes the affidavit printed on the envelope, the procedure for obtaining a ballot is simple. The ballot itself is cleared, and there is a minimum of red tape involved as far as the serviceman is concerned.

Another law passed by the general assembly of Connecticut, provides for the making of motors in the field. Any person may ask the town clerk in his town to send the proper forms to any serviceman who is 21 years of age and not a voter or will become 21 years of age on or before election day. The serviceman then fills in these forms, swears to the truth of the statement therein before a commissioned officer, and returns them to the town clerk. Should the serviceman be home on a furlough, he may appear before his town clerk and fill out these forms. This application is then presented to the board of admission of electors at their next meeting or at a special meeting called for the purpose and the qualifications passed upon,

When the application is either accepted or rejected notice of the action is then sent to the serviceman. Any such application sent to a serviceman after July 7 should be accompanied by a ballot. This is done to save time. If the application is accepted and the serviceman's name placed on the voter's list the ballot will be a valid one. If the application is rejected for any reason, the ballot is merely not used and kept in the possession of the town clerk until disposed of at a later date.

Under Connecticut's servicemen's ballot, the serviceman can vote for every office from President right down to the smallest office in his town. Under a Federal ballot he is allowed to vote only for President, Vice President, Senator, and Congressman. Should the serviceman vote both ballots only, the State ballot or complete ballot will be counted, the other simply being set aside.

ABSENTEE VOTING BY SERVICEMEN UNDER THE FEDERAL ACT

Connecticut men and women serving outside of the United States with the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, or merchant marine, or in the American Red Cross, the Society of Friends, the Women's Auxiliary Service Pilots, or the United Service Organizations attached to and serving with the armed forces may vote the Federal ballot, providing they can state under oath that prior to September 1 he applied for a Connecticut ballot but as of October 1 had not received it.

It is the responsibility of the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy to see that these Federal ballots are made available to every person entitled to use them. Federal ballots may not be used by servicemen stationed in the United States.

Post-card applications for ballots, ballots, and envelopes shall be transmitted free of postage, including air-mail postage, in the United States mails.

From the above explanation it will be apparent that it would have been much better to have allowed a serviceman to vote the short Federal ballot if he was satisfied with that ballot without requiring him to apply first for a State ballot.

It is my sincere hope that every Connecticut resident who has a friend or relative serving with the armed forces will take upon themselves the responsibility of making sure that the proper local official sends out an absentee ballot.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM P. LAMBERTSON

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, it was the most harmonious National Convention in a hundred years, yet 400 policemen were distributed about the scene.

Lincoln's picture was the only one in the giant stadium, well decorated all about.

The Philippine standard was supporting a wreath—never before in our history was there such a spectacle.

JOE MARTIN was a little bigger than his gavel, and he presided with the least ostentation.

It was Hoover's bad luck to draw only one mike when all the others had three.

The reconversion of the Hotel Stevens back to normal, after occupation by the Air Corps, was effective and complete.

During the waiting on the resolutions, Tuesday, no one was allowed to speak, though there were scores present who could have held the attention.

The platforms will both be forgotten. Parties do not run on them anymore. It is the men who sound, not the printed word.

The delegates told the leaders what they wanted. It was not handed down.

A country cousin of a House Member, sitting in his Congressman's seat, yelled down six Senators, standing at one time in front of him.

Griswold's speech from the point of oratory was B flat. No speech could have defeated Dewey.

The hour Dewey spoke the temperature dropped to decency for the first time in 3 days. We need more normalcy.

D-Day: June 6, 1944

OF

HON. SAM HOBBS

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. HOBBS. Mr. Speaker, it is a misnomer to call our invasion for the liberation of conquerd France the opening of "the second front," but, whether second or seventh, it was fraught with so much hope and doom that its number had lost significance.

We all prayed, and had been praying, but Edna St. Vincent Millay, through her genius, the facilities of the National Broadcasting Co., and the vocal cords of Ronald Colman, gave us on this D-day, June 6, 1944, the Poem and Prayer for an Invading Army, worthy of the occasion. With pen dipped in the stream of time, saturated with the sentiment of the momentous history being written in its hours, on that day she wrote this splendid contribution to American thought.

With the kind permisison of the author, it is a real joy to incorporate it in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

They must not go alone
Into that burning building!—which today
Is all of Europe!

Say that you go with them, spirit and heart and mind!
Although the body, grown
Too old to fight a young man's war; or wounded
Too deeply under the healed and whitened scars
Of earlier battles, must remain behind.

You, too, may not be with them, save in spirit, you
So greatly needed here, here in the very van
And front of duty,
To fashion tools and engines, and to engineer
Their transport; build the ships and mine the coal
Without which all their efforts would be worse than vain!

You men and women working in the workshops, working on the farms;
Makers of tanks and of tractors, fitters of wings
To metal birds which have not left the nest
As yet, which yet must try their flight;
Sowers of seed in season, planters of little plants
At intervals, on acres newly plowed
And disked and harrowed,
To feed a starving world;

You workers in the shipyards, building ships
Which crowd each other down the ways;
You miners of coal in dark and dangerous corridors,
Who see the sun's total eclipse
Each morning, disappearing as you do under the earth's rim,
Not to emerge into the daylight till the day's
Over, and the light dim;

All you without whose constant effort and whose skill—
Without whose loyal and unfailing aid—
Our men would stand
Stranded upon a foreign and a hostile shore
Without so much as a stout stick to beat away
Death or Pain:
Bullets like angry hornets buzzing 'round the ears and the bewildered brain,
And from the sky again and yet again
The downpour of the heavy, evil, accurate, murderous rain;

You who have stood behind them to this hour,
Move strong behind them now: let still
The weary bones encase the indefatigable will.
But how can men draw near
So fierce a conflagration?—even here,
Across a gray and cold and foggy sea
Its heat is felt!—Why,
Touch your cheek—is it not hot and tight and dry?
And look what light climbs up the eastern sky, and sinks
And climbs again!

Like to the bright Aurora of the North
It floods and flushes, pulses, pales—then glows,
Lighting the entire East majestically;
As if it were the sun that rose.
I wish it were!
Have patience, friend; it yet may be.
Surely our fiber and our sinews, the backbone
And brain of us, are made of some less common stuff
Than clay?—Surely the blood which warms the veins
Of heroes at the front, our brothers and our sons,
Runs also in our own!

And are we not then capable perhaps of something more courageous than we yet have shown?
Surely some talisman, some token of
Our lofty pride in them, our heavy gratitude,
And so much, so much love,
Will find its way to them!
Some messenger, the vicar and the angel
Of what we feel,
Will fly before them where they fly, before them and above,
Like patron goddesses in wars of old,
Cleaving with level lovely brows the hard air
Before the eager prows,
Lighting their way with incandescent wings and winged heel.

This is the hour, this the appointed time.
The sound of the clock falls awful on our ears,
And the sound of the bells, their metal clang and chime,
Tolling, tolling,
For those about to die.
For we know well they will not all come home, to lie
In summer on the beaches.

And yet weep not, you mothers of young men, their wives,
Their sweethearts, all who love them well—
Fear not the tolling of the solemn bell:
It does not prophesy, and it cannot foretell;
It only can record;
And it records today the passing of a most uncivil age,
Which had its elegance, but lived too well,
And far, oh, far too long;
And which, on history's page,
Will be found guilty of injustice and grave wrong.

* * * * *

O Thou, Thou Prince of Peace, this is a prayer for war!
Yet not a war of man against his fellowman.
Say, rather, Lord, we do beseech
Thy guidance and Thy help:
In exorcising from the minds of Man, where she has made her nest.
A hideous and most fertile beast—
And this to bring about with all dispatch, for look, where even now
She would lie down again to whelp!

Lord God of Hosts! Thou Lord of Hosts not only, not alone
Of battling armies Lord and King;
But of the child-like heart as well, which longs
To put away—oh, not the childish, but the adult Circuitous and adroit, antique and violent thing called war;
And sing the beauties of this late-to-come by oh-so-lovely Spring!
For see where our young men go forth in mighty numbers, to set free from torture and from every jeopardy
Things that are dear to Thee.

Keep in Thy loving care, we pray, those of our fighting men Whose happy fortune it may be to come back home again
After the war is over; and all those who must perforce remain,
The mourned, the valiant slain.
This we beseech Thee, Lord. And, now before
We rise from kneeling, one thing more:
Soften our hard and angry hearts; make us ashamed
Of doing what we do, beneath Thy very eyes, knowing it does displease Thee.
Make us more humble, Lord, for we are proud

Without sufficient reason; let our necks be bowed
More often to Thy will;
For well we know what deeds find favor in Thy sight; and still
We do not do them.
Oh, Lord, all through the night, all through the day,
Keep watch over our brave and dear, so far away.
Make us more worthy of their valor;
And Thy love.

"Let them come home! Oh, let the battle,
Lord, be brief,
And let our boys come home!"
So cries the heart, sick for relief
From its anxiety, and seeking to forestall
A greater grief.

So cries the heart aloud. But the thoughtful mind
Has something of its own to say:
"On that day—
When they come home—from very far away—
And further than you think—
(For each of them has stood upon the very brink
Or sat and waited in the anteroom
Of death, expecting every moment to be called by name).

Now look you to this matter well; that they Upon returning shall not find
Seated at their own tables—at the head,
Perhaps, of the long festive board prinked out in prodigal array,
The very monster which they sallied forth to conquer and to quell;
And left behind for dead."

Let us forget such words, and all they mean,
As hatred, bitterness and rancor, greed,
Intolerance, bigotry; let us renew
Our faith and pledge to man, his right to be Himself and free.

Say that the victory is ours—then say—
And each man search his heart in true humility—
"Lord! Father! Who are we,
That we should wield so great a weapon for the rights
And rehabilitation of Thy creature man?
Lo, from all corners of the earth we ask
All great and noble to come forth—converge
Upon this errand and this task with generous and gigantic plan:
Hold high this torch, who will.
Lift up this sword, who can!"

Important Veterans' Benefits

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM J. MILLER

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, recently I have received several requests for information about the benefits made available to men and women now serving in our armed forces in the G. I. bill.

For the convenience of those interested, I have prepared a brief summary of not only the G. I. bill but also of other veterans' legislation passed by the Seventy-eighth Congress.

Every one of these measures have had my wholehearted support. I took a very active part in protecting the G. I. bill when it was under consideration in the House.

Experience may indicate some needed changes but in its present form it seems to me that this law will guarantee a well-rounded rehabilitation program for the veterans of World War No. 2.

The provisions of Public Law No. 144, approved July 13, 1943, providing rates of pension for widows, children, and dependent parents of World War No. 1 and World War No. 2 veterans based upon death in service or service-connected deaths are frankly inadequate, it seems to me. The widow of a man killed in service or whose death is due to his war service should receive not less than $80 per month. The American taxpayer will gladly contribute toward a generous pension to such widows and orphans. I intend to do everything in my power to see that this comparatively small group are more adequately provided for by the next Congress.

The highlights of veterans' legislation enacted by the Seventy-eighth Congress follows:

1. MUSTERING-OUT PAY

The Mustering-Out Payment Act of 1944, approved February 3, 1944, Public Law No. 225, Seventy-eighth Congress, provides, under certain conditions and limitation, mustering-out payment of $300 for persons who, having performed active service for 60 days or more, have served outside the continental limits of the United States or Alaska; $200 for persons who, having performed active service for 60 days or more, have served no part thereof outside the continental limits of the United States or Alaska; and $100 for persons who have performed active service for less than 60 days.

2. SEEING-EYE DOGS FOR THE BLIND

The act of May 24, 1944, authorized the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to provide seeing-eye dogs trained for the aid of blind veterans who are entitled to disability compensation under laws administered by the Veterans' Administration, and to provide such veterans with mechanical and electronic equipment for aiding them to overcome their handicap of blindness.

3. SERVICE-CONNECTED COMPENSATION INCREASE

The act of May 27, 1944, Public Law No. 312, Seventy-eighth Congress, increased by 15 percent the service-connected disability rates of compensation or pension payable to veterans of World War No. 1 and World War No. 2, and veterans entitled to wartime rates based on service on or after September 16, 1940, for service-connected disabilities; increased the rates for widows and children under Public Law No. 484, Seventy-third Congress, as amended, which provides compensation to the widow and children where any World War No. 1 veteran dies of non-service-connected cause, but at time of death had a service-connected disability; and included widows and children of World War No. 2 veterans for benefits under the said Public Law No. 484, as amended.

4. SPANISH-AMERICAN AND WORLD WAR NO. 1 PENSION INCREASE

Non-service-connected disability: Under Public Law No. 313, Seventy-eighth Congress, approved May 27, 1944, the rate of pension for permanent and total non-service-connected disability, applicable to veterans of the Spanish-American War, including the Boxer Rebellion, the Philippine Insurrection, and World War No. 1, was increased from $40 to $50 per month, with an increase to $60 per month where such veterans have been rated permanent and total and in receipt of pension for a continuous period of 10 years, or reach the age of 65 and are permanently and totally disabled. This act also provides that the above pension for non-service-connected disability shall apply to veterans of both World War No. 1 and World War No. 2.

5. SERVICE-CONNECTED WIDOWS' PENSION INCREASE

Service-connected death: The rates of compensation or pension for widows, children, and dependent parents of World War No. 1 and World War No. 2 veterans based upon death in service, or service-connected death, are as follows:

Widow, no child	$50
Widow, 1 child (with $13 for each additional child)	65
No widow, but 1 child	25
No widow, but 2 children (with $10 for each additional child, the total not to exceed $100)	38
Dependent father and mother:
Each	25
Or 1 only	45

The above rates are contained in Public Law No. 144, Seventy-eighth Congress, July 13, 1943, and constitute a material liberalization of the prior rates.

6. NON-SERVICE-CONNECTED WIDOWS' PENSION INCREASE

Non-service-connected death: The widow, child, or children of any deceased veteran of World War No. 1 or World War No. 2 are entitled to the following rates of compensation if the veteran at the time of death from a non-service-connected cause had a disability incurred in or aggravated by such war service:

Widow but no child	$35
Widow with 1 child (with $5 for each additional child)	45
No widow but 1 child	18
No widow but 2 children (equally divided)	27
No widow but 3 children (equally divided)	36

With $4 for each additional child (the total amount to be equally divided).

Payments are limited to an aggregate of $64 in any one case.

Public Law No. 312, Seventy-eighth Congress, act of May 27, 1944, increased the rates to the above amounts and also included widows and children of World War No. 2 veterans, the law previously having applied only to World War No. 1 veterans.

7. VOCATIONAL REHABILITATION

Public Law No. 16, Seventy-eighth Congress, approved by the President March 24, 1943, provides first that any person who served in the active military or naval service at any time after December 6, 1941, and prior to the termination of the present war; second, and who was honorably discharged; third, and who has a disability incurred in or aggravated by such service for which pension is payable under laws administered by the Veterans' Administration or would be but for the receipt of retirement pay; fourth, who is in need of vocational rehabilitation to overcome the handicap of such disability, shall be entitled to such vocational rehabilitation as may be prescribed by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to fit him for employment consistent with the degree of disablement.

While the disabled veteran is in training his pension, unless it equals or exceeds such amounts, will be increased to $80 per month, if single; $90 per month, if married, with $5 additional for each child, and $10 for each dependent parent. All expenses of training, including necessary transportation, are paid. Medical care is given as required.

8. SPANISH AMERICAN SERVICE-CONNECTED PENSION INCREASE

The act of March 1, 1944, Public Law No. 242, Seventy eighth Congress, increased the service pension rate for veterans of the Spanish-American War, including the Boxer Rebellion and the Philippine Insurrection, based upon total disability or age 65, from $60 to $75 per month; liberalized the delimiting marriage date governing eligibility of widows of deceased veterans of that group for service-pension purposes by changing the delimiting marriage date from September 1, 1922, to January 1, 1938; and provided for increased pension to widows of this group by granting $40 per month to a widow when the age of 65 years is attained or $50 per month if the widow or former widow was the wife of the veteran during the period of his service in the war.

9. NON-SERVICE-CONNECTED PENSIONS

The act of May 27, 1944, Public Law No. 313, Seventy-eighth Congress, increased the pension payable for non-service-connected disability of permanent and total degree applicable to veterans of World War No. 1 and the Spanish-American War, including the Boxer Rebellion and the Philippine Insurrection, from $40 to $50 per month, and increased the rate to $60 per month where such veteran shall have been rated permanent and total and in receipt of pension for a continuous period of 10 years, or reached the age of 65 and are permanently and totally disabled. The act also made the benefits above described available to World War No. 2 veterans.

10. THE G. I. BILL OF RIGHTS

Generally speaking, to be eligible for the benefits provided, the person must have served in the armed forces for a period of at least 90 days unless sooner discharged for a disability incurred in service in line of duty, and such service must have been during the period beginning September 16, 1940, and ending with the termination of the war. While benefits are provided immediately for those who have been discharged or released from the service under prescribed conditions, the general scheme of the legislation contemplates the affording of readjustment benefits, particularly during the more difficult post-war period. General provision is therefore afforded that the benefits may be claimed and secured within 2 years after discharge or release from the active service or the end of the war, whichever be the later, with an over-all limitation which will permit the serving of one enlistment after the end of the war, and yet permit the person so serving to receive the maximum benefit extended within the prescribed period subsequent to his later discharge.

Subject to the above, the following direct and indirect benefits for veterans of World War No. 2 and certain benefits of similar nature to veterans of prior wars are afforded:

TITLE I. HOSPITALIZATION, CLAIMS, AND PROCEDURES

First. Adequate organization of the Veterans' Administration to administer all veterans' benefits except employment.

Second. Adequate hospital facilities for the care and treatment of veterans for nonservice disabilities or diseases as well as for disabilities or diseases incurred in service.

Third. The right to have explained to him before discharge or release from active service all rights and benefits to which he may be entitled as a veteran and an opportunity, if he so desires, to file a claim therefor.

Fourth. The right to adequate prosthetic appliances and necessary training to effect the greatest possible benefits in the use of such appliances.

Fifth. Adequate safeguards as against forced statements against interest.

Sixth. Adequate contact facilities in Army and Navy discharge centers, including those furnished by the services, by the American Red Cross, by national veterans' organizations, and by the Veterans' Administration.

Seventh. Prompt transfer of the essential records of service departments to the Veterans' Administration and prompt adjudication of claims for benefits.

Eighth. The right of review in cases of irregular discharge or release from active service, (a) by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to determine whether the person at time of committing the offense was insane, in event of which determination benefits to which the person would otherwise be entitled shall not be forfeited; (b) except in case of separation by sentence of general court martial, any enlisted man or officer may have a review by an authorized board to determine the correctness of such discharge or dismissal; (c) any officer retired or released to inactive status without pay may likewise have a review by an authorized board to determine retirement rights.

Under both (b) and (c) above, the claim for review must be filed within 15 years after discharge or dismissal or within 15 years after the effective date of the act, whichever be the later.

TITLE II. EDUCATION OF VETERANS

First. One year, or the equivalent thereof in continuous part-time study, of education or training (a) at any school or institution of his own choice; (b) in any subject or subjects desired for which he is fitted.

Second. Not to exceed 3 additional years of education and training dependent upon (a) length of service; (b) satisfactory progress in studies or training; (c) the condition that the person was not over 25 years of age at the time of entrance into service, or if over such age, that his education or training was impeded, delayed, interrupted, or interfered with by reason of entrance into service.

Third. Payment of all tuition and other fees, cost of books, supplies, equipment, and other necessary expenses not to exceed a maximum of $500 per school year.

Fourth. Subsistence allowance while pursuing education or training in the amount of $50 per month if without dependents, or $75 per month with a dependent or dependents.

Fifth. Part-time attendance in a course of education or training at a reduced subsistence allowance or without allowance, but with payment of tuition and other expenses.

Sixth. The right to have released to him books and equipment furnished if he satisfactorily completes his course of education or training.

The right to vocational education for service-incurred disabilities is extended to those who served during the period from September 16, 1940, to December 6, 1941.

TITLE III. LOANS FOR THE PURCHASE OR CONSTRUCTION OF HOMES, FARMS, AND BUSINESS PROPERTY

First. Loans for the purposes stated or for the alteration or improvement of buildings or equipment may be guaranteed not to exceed 50 percent of the loan, the total amount guaranteed as to any one person not exceeding an aggregate of $2,000; (a) loans may be made by an individual or by private or public—State or Federal—lending agencies or institutions; (b) the proceeds of the proposed loan must be used for one or more of the purposes specified and the circumstances must meet the specifications prescribed; (c) interest rate must not exceed 4 percent per annum; (d) the loan must be practicable and suitable to the veterans' circumstances; (e) the loan must be repaid within 20 years; (f) the Government must have the right of subrogation to the extent of any guaranty paid; (g) the liability under the guaranty must decrease or increase with the decrease or increase of the amount of unpaid obligation; (h) the agreement must permit the Government to protect itself in case of default through the right to bid on foreclosure proceedings or to refinance.

Second. In the event a principal loan is made or guaranteed or insured by a Federal agency, a loan for all or part of the balance of the purchase price or cost may be guaranteed (a) if it does not exceed $2,000; (b) if it does not exceed 20 percent of the cost or purchase price; (c) if the interest rate does not exceed by more than 1 percent the interest rate on the principal loan; (d) if the conditions otherwise meet those prescribed under (1) above.

Third. Any veteran eligible under title III shall also be eligible for the benefits of the Bankhead-Jones Farm-Tenant Act, as amended, to the same extent as if he were a farm tenant. Eligibility must be determined (a) by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs; (b) by the Secretary of Agriculture.

TITLE IV. EMPLOYMENT OF VETERANS

First. The right to registration for employment with, and for placement in employment by, the Veterans' Employment Service through (a) the United States Employment Service, (b) any State employment agency cooperating with the United States Employment Service.

Note (a): This right applies to any veteran of any war discharged or released from active service under conditions other than dishonorable.

Note (b): While the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs is made responsible for veterans' employment, this is not a function of the Veterans' Administration, but is retained in the United States Employment Service.

TITLE V. READJUSTMENT ALLOWANCES FOR FORMER MEMBERS OF THE ARMED FORCES WHO ARE UNEMPLOYED

1. Unemployment allowances of $20 per week while unemployed, subject to the following conditions:

First. The week of unemployment must have begun (a) after the first Sunday of the third calendar month after the effective date of the act; (b) not later than 2 years after discharge or release from active service or the termination of the war, whichever be the later date.

Second. The person is not receiving subsistence allowance for education or training under title II of the act, or increased pension for vocational training under Public Law No. 16, Seventy-eighth Congress.

Third. To be eligible, the person must (a) reside in the United States; (b) be completely unemployed—or if partially employed, at wages less than $23 per week; (c) be registered with, and reporting to a public employment office; (d) be able to work and available for suitable work.

Fourth. Any person will be disqualified from receiving an allowance if (a) he leaves suitable work voluntarily without good cause, or is suspended or discharged for misconduct; (b) he, without good cause, fails to apply for suitable work or to accept suitable work offered; (c) he fails, without good cause, to attend an available free training course; (d) he is participating in a strike or labor dispute causing a work stoppage; (e) added penalties apply to successive disqualifying offenses.

Fifth. Within the 52 weeks limit the total eligibility is determined by allowing 8 weeks of allowances for each of the first 3 months of service, and 4 weeks of allowances for each month or major fraction thereof of service thereafter.

Sixth. The allowance of $20 per week will be reduced by any Federal or State unemployment or disability compensation—other than pension, compensation, or retired pay paid by the Veterans' Administration—received by the veteran for the same period of time.

2. Any person self-employed for profit in an independent establishment, trade, business, profession, or other vocation is eligible for readjustment allowances (a) if net earnings are less than $100 for the previous calendar month; (b) the amount of allowance to be the difference between the net earnings and $100 per month; (c) the conditions as to eligibility otherwise as provided in title V, except the qualifications and disqualifications.

The Facts About Guayule—Guayule Rubber Project

REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN Z. ANDERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. ANDERSON of California. Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday when the conference report on the agricultural appropriation bill was before the House and we were considering the item in the conference report to extend the guayule emergency rubber project, certain statements were made in the heat of the debate, largely based; I think, on opinion and exasperation rather than on fact. For instance, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the gentleman from Missouri, said in substance, that practically every dollar we have put into it has been lost or wasted, and that every dollar we will put into it from now on will be wasted.

The hearings before the committees on appropriations, in both the Senate and the House, do not bear out this statement. In the course of my remarks, I intend to call the attention of the Members to the facts in connection with this entire program. If the statement of the gentleman from Missouri is correct, any Member of the House would have been justified in voting against continuing this program. It seems to me that those who voted for the bill should be able not only to justify their vote but also to vindicate their consciences by having available to them in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD all the facts in connection with the program, and I shall see that those facts are made available to every Member of the House.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON of California. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. I agree with the gentleman that the facts he has presented are correct. Any gentleman who has ever been to California will thoroughly agree with the gentleman's stand.

Mr. ANDERSON of California. I will say for the benefit of the gentleman from Oklahoma and other Members that every statement contained in my remarks will be taken directly from the hearings before either the appropriations committees of the House or the Senate or the Poage committee, and they will be entirely factual.

Mr. OUTLAND. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON of California. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. OUTLAND. There is another point that I hope the gentleman will include in his statement concerning the implication made here on the floor of the House that perhaps this particular project is of benefit only to a very small part of the Nation. I hope he will bring out the beneficial effect of the guayule program not only on that particular part of the country, but on the United States as a whole.

Mr. ANDERSON of California. May I say to the gentleman from California, in whose district this project originated, that it is entirely national in scope, and that our concern should not be for any particular district of the country but for the benefit of the United States. I cannot share the evident optimism of those who think the war will end soon and that we will have all the crude rubber we need in the near future.

Mr. Speaker, when I first addressed the House on the subject of guayule, back in April 1941, 8 months before Pearl Harbor, I made the following statement:

Frankly, I do not see how any of us can look into the future and feel confident of an uninterrupted supply of rubber from the Dutch East Indies or British Malaya, in view of present world conditions.

A year later our supply of crude rubber was in the hands of the Japs.

How then can the gentleman from Missouri justify the statement—page 6288:

We are nearing the closing days of the war. We are going to have all the crude rubber we will need by next year.

That appears to me to be simply wishful thinking. I hope and pray that the gentleman is correct, but in the meantime I do not want to gamble and it is very evident that Congress does not intend to gamble either.

In support of immediate liquidation of the guayule project, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] expressed the opinion—page 6288—that "every dollar beyond liquidation being put into it from now on will be utterly wasted." Perhaps he is unaware that we are now paying not less than 60 cents a pound for crude rubber from South America. This price is in addition to the sums which previously have been invested in the procurement of rubber from that region. Testimony by representatives of the Department of Agriculture before the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations for the Department of Agriculture on the agriculture appropriation bill for 1945—page 574—indicates that the estimated cost in the future after July 1, 1944, for producing rubber from presently growing guayule over the optimum period of approximately 7 years is 37 cents per pound. Furthermore the Department has estimated that had it been necessary to process all plantations as soon as practicable based on milling irrigated shrub at the age of 2 years and dry-land shrub at the age of 3 years, the estimated cost after fiscal year 1944 for rubber so produced would be approximately 52 cents a pound. Surely it cannot be contended that the production of crude rubber in the United States from now on would, at a smaller cost per pound than we now are paying for crude rubber imports from South America, be a waste of public funds.

In speaking of the expenditures made by the Emergency Rubber Project it is stated by the chairman of the subcommittee that the aggregate expenditures are $45,000,000—page 6368. The testimony shows this to be incorrect. It would appear that had the chairman carefully read the statements presented to the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate as printed on page 14 of the Senate committee hearings on the 1945 Agricultural Appropriation bill, he would have known that the estimated total investment as of June 30, 1944, of the Emergency Rubber project is $35,196,245, and of this sum $33,049,331 is estimated as the expenditure for the guayule project. Is not the subcommittee chairman aware that total appropriations for the Emergency Rubber project are approximately $45,000,000; that the funds in amount of $5,420,000 approved by Congress for expenditure in fiscal year 1945 are a part of the $45,000,000 previously appropriated?

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TARVER] further states—page 6288—that the most optimistic prediction he has heard by the experts is that for a future expenditure of $5,000,000 annually for 7 years, with good luck, 10,000 tons of rubber could be obtained over the 7-year period. I find nothing of record to support any of these assertions. I refer the gentleman to page 14 of the recent Senate subcommittee hearings. I refer the gentleman to page 14 of the recent Senate subcommittee hearings. I refer to the testimony before the subcommittee of which the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TARVER] is chairman in February 1944 in which Mr. Granger, of the Forest Service, stated—page 573:

We figure that counting all expenditures already made and those that will be necessary to be made and giving credit to the residual value or the wrecking value of the permanent improvements and credit to the sale of rubber at 27 cents a pound, we would get the net cost of the rubber—that is, the actual out-of-pocket expense to the Government—down to a little over 50 cents.

He added that the program was based on processing the rubber over a period which would give the Government the greatest amount of rubber at the least possible cost. If it had to be done more quickly, then the cost per pound would be higher.

The program about which Mr. Granger was talking was a 7-year program of closing out the guayule project to produce an estimated 24,000 to 29,000 tons of rubber. The subject is further discussed in the hearings before the Senate subcommittee—page 222. I am at a loss to know the basis used by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TARVER] in estimating a total expenditure of $80,000,000 to produce 10,000 tons of rubber at $1.75 per pound. Testimony before the Senate subcommittee does indicate that if the project were liquidated in fiscal year 1945 a potential supply of 10,000 tons of rubber which could have been made available by processing the guayule shrub in 2 years, if the emergency demanded it, would be lost. However, even such an emergency program would not bring the total expenditures to $80,000,000.

It would appear from the statement—page 6288—of the chairman of the subcommittee that Mr. Jeffers, who was then Rubber Director, was of the opinion that the emergency rubber project should be abandoned for the time being, that is, in the winter of 1942–43; that land should be returned to the farmers from whom it had been taken by purchase or lease; that there was no excuse for labor that was being used in the guayule production project and the machinery which was being used being diverted from other uses more essential to the war.

In the winter of 1942–43 Mr. Jeffers, Rubber Director, did indicate that he thought it desirable to reduce budget estimates for fiscal year 1944 below the sum required for maximum possible expansion in that year for which plans were being formulated in response to the impetus provided the guayule project by the September 1942 report of the President's Rubber Survey Committee. This was done to permit further investigation of the rubber situation by the Rubber Director to determine more accurately what part the guayule program should play in the rubber program of the United States. However, to my knowledge the Rubber Director has never indicated that he believed there was no excuse for the labor that was being used on the guayule project and that the machinery being used on the project could be more profitably used in the production of other crops essential to the war effort.

I will draw the attention of the chairman of the subcommittee to the hearings of March 1943 of his committee. On page 604 of the record of the hearings there is incorporated a letter from the Director of the Bureau of the Budget to the President with reference to a downward revision of the financial estimate for the emergency rubber project for fiscal year 1944. In part, that letter reads:

Certain important changes in the Department—

Department of Agriculture—

emergency rubber program for fiscal year 1944 have been suggested by the Rubber Director, as a result of which it is now recommended that a completely new estimate in the amount of $14,271,000 be substituted for the original estimate of $56,000,000 included in the Budget for that year. In considering this revision the Rubber Director has indicated that he believes the new estimate should cover (1) nursery and field operations at about the present level, pending his determination, at a later date, regarding the future scope of the entire project; and (2) continuance at an accelerated rate of research into improved extraction methods, with particular attention to deresinating.

Several months later, on March 19, 1943, the Rubber Director wrote the Secretary of Agriculture, stating:

The present outlook of the rubber situation does not justify the use of manpower for nor the condemnation or use of further lands now needed for the raising of foodstuffs. We trust that this supplies you with my views and that you will carry out the program to secure the maximum yield from such reduced acreage.

The emergency rubber project had under lease for planting at that time some 60,000 acres. As a result of the Rubber Director's request to halt further expansion, all unplanted acreage which would accepted by the farmer-owners was returned to them as promptly as possible, and unplanted acreage which could not be returned but could be leased for food production was leased for that purpose. Only the remainder, which could not be returned to the farmers or which could not be subleased for food production was planted to guayule.

As a result of further consideration of the rubber program in the United States, in the summer of 1943, the Rubber Director requested that the Department of Agriculture institute a program of guayule production which would produce up to 20,000 tons of guayule rubber per year. The Department of Agriculture subsequently submitted a deficiency estimate to the Congress in the latter part of calendar year of 1943, asking for funds to carry out the request of the Rubber Director. This request for funds was denied by the House, approved by the Senate, but the House conferees refused to yield and the appropriation was lost.

It is perfectly clear to me that at no time has there been evidence that the Rubber Director wished the guayule program to be abandoned or that the guayule operations were not suitable excuse for the employment of labor or machinery.

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TARVER] states that it is significant that after the guayule program had been virtually abandoned last year, the officials decided to engage in a different sort of activity; that is, the purchase and operation of 200 experimental plots in California, Texas, Arizona, and New Mexico. This statement would appear to indicate that prior to the late winter of 1942–43, a program of experimental plots had not been instituted in the several States within the range in which it was thought guayule could be successfully grown. The facts of the matter are that such a program was instituted almost immediately upon the initiation of the emergency rubber project in the spring of 1942 and that the establishment of experimental plots throughout the probable guayule range extending from Texas to California, was a regular part of the program from the very inception of the guayule operation, in order that the project might be prepared in the event it were necessary to expand field plantations over a wide geographical area. In the testimony before the committee of which the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TARVER] is chairman, in February 1944, it was stated to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TARVER] that experimental plots were established in the several States of the Southwest prior to the time that the Rubber Director asked for a curtailment of the expansion of guayule plantings—page 577.

> For every annual capacity production of 350 tons of rubber you will have to provide an additional mill at the cost of $500,000.

This statement is not in accord with the facts. It is true that the construction of one new mill in fiscal year 1945 probably will not in that year produce more than 350 long tons of rubber. The reason for such limited production is twofold. First, the mill can be operated only a portion of the year due to the fact that it must be constructed in that year. Second, the shrub which will be processed in fiscal year 1945 is very young shrub of relatively small rubber content, the youngest shrub it is possible to mill. Two-year-old shrub contains approximately 8 percent rubber. As guayule shrub grows older the rubber content increases rapidly and the output of a mill per unit of time varies with the percentage of rubber contained in the shrub which the mill processes. Utilizing shrub 4 or 5 years old, twice as much rubber can be produced per day in a mill, in comparison with the amount which 2-year-old shrub will produce. The assertion that a new mill is necessary for every 350 tons of annual capacity in terms of rubber, obviously is erroneous. Such would be the case if only 2-year-old shrub were processed. The capacity of a mill unit is approximately 30 tons of shrub per day. The production of rubber per day would vary from about 2½ tons to more than 5 tons depending upon the rubber content of the shrub being processed.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] mentions that the subcommittee on deficiencies, of which he is chairman, has devoted long study to the matter of appropriations for the guayule project over a period of 2 years—page 6288. The subcommittee has held several hearings in Washington. In contrast a study of the guayule project in detail has been made on the ground by an investigating subcommittee of the Committee on Agriculture appointed pursuant to a resolution introduced by me last winter. This committee saw the field operations, the research programs, the improvements that have been constructed. It held public hearings at which California farmers, members of the California State Guayule Committee, scientists not connected with the project, and others testified. The members of this bipartisan committee appeared before the Subcommittee on Appropriations of the Senate and their testimony may be found in the report of the hearings. These gentlemen were favorably impressed with the project, with the accomplishments they observed, with the efficiency of operations, with the progress and application of research. These gentlemen approve continuation of the present guayule program. However, the chairmen of both the Appropriations Committee and of the Subcommittee on Agriculture Appropriations disagreed with the findings and opinions of their colleagues from both sides of the House who have investigated and seen the guayule project on the ground.

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TARVER] says everything that can be learned about making rubber from guayule has been learned. I would refer him to the members of the special investigating committee whom I have just mentioned. These gentlemen know otherwise. They have seen experiments now under way pointing to the possibility of direct sowing of guayule seed in the field, an experiment conducted with a view toward eliminating expensive guayule nurseries. They have seen examples of plant breeding in the process of developing more vigorous and hardy plants, the success of which would greatly increase the climatic range within which guayule might be grown. They have seen experimental production of guayule latex from which a superior grade of guayule rubber can be produced. They know of pollarding experiments from which it may prove possible to mow the tops from guayule shrub one or more times for processing before eventually it becomes necessary to dig the shrub in the final harvest. They have seen experiments to recover by-products of potential commercial value, the recovery of which may prove profitable, and reduce thereby the cost of rubber production. Rather are the possibilities from further guayule research considerable than at an end.

The chairman of the Agricultural Appropriation Subcommittee claims that the farmers of my State of California have not been interested in the program as at present it is carried on. Again I refer the gentleman to the members of the special guayule investigating committee for a more enlightened opinion. Some farmers are not interested. Many other farmers are interested in seeing that the guayule project be carried on to determine whether and under what circumstances guayule may profitably be produced, and California farmers from the guayule areas have expressed themselves as not in favor of eliminating guayule as a source of crude rubber that may aid in meeting the emergency needs of this country. Even those uninterested in guayule as a normal farm crop hold to this view.

I wish to draw also to the attention of the chairman of the Agricultural Appropriation Subcommittee the report of January 14, 1944, of the California State Guayule Committee, a group of farmers appointed by the Governor of that State. Four recommendations were made. They are:

1. That as early as is practical the activities of Government in this project be limited to determining methods for the production and processing of rubber from guayule on a practical and economic basis; and to the conducting of such research and experimental work as is necessary in the present emergency for future emergencies and for aiding in establishing a new peacetime agricultural industry of this nature, if such proves to be economically necessary or feasible.

2. That the Government continue to carry on the present project in as economical and orderly manner as possible and that during such continuation, as rapidly as is practical the growing of shrub be turned over to individual farmers; and the processing be turned over to private or cooperative enterprise.

As it is now estimated that by the fall of 1944 there will be more acreage of matured guayule ready for harvesting than present facilities can process, it is the committee's recommendation that the emergency rubber project immediately establish contact with one or more of the leading rubber users in an endeavor to contract with them for the processing of shrub now being grown. This contract to be entered into with the understanding that such company will use every effort to develop and maintain the domestic production of guayule rubber in the future. Such contract not to be entered into with any corporation not domestically owned and controlled.

3. That since all land leases now held by the Department of Agriculture for the growing of guayule were negotiated under conditions and economic circumstances very different than exist at the present time, or may exist in the future, it is recommended by the committee that owners of such land be given option to renegotiate such leases at the date of harvest of the guayule shrub now growing on land covered by said leases.

4. That in order to obtain more definite and practical information on cultural practices and costs of growing guayule by individual farmers the Congress of the United States appropriate or earmark sufficient funds for the establishment of not less than 15 50-acre farms scattered properly over the guayule-growing area of the State, on which farmers shall be encouraged to grow guayule at a stated, guaranteed payment for their efforts, based on ultimate rubber produced. It is estimated that the amount of rubber produced on these experimental farms, if paid for at the present price being paid by the Government for Mexican guayule rubber delivered at the border, would require a sum of approximately $500,000. The committee desires to point out in this connection that this is not a request for the Government to give the farmers any money, but is primarily a request that funds be earmarked in such a manner as to enable the Government to contract for the purchase of rubber when and if it is produced. The committee feels that if the Government is willing to pay Mexican producers 54 cents per pound, it certainly should be more than willing to purchase rubber from American producers at the same price. The committee believes experience to date has definitely proved that California climatic and soil conditions are extremely favorable to the culture of the guayule shrub.

The report of this committee was approved by the California State Director of Agriculture and by the Governor in March 1944. There are differences of opinion concerning the guayule project among California farmers even as between Members of the Congress. But the assertion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TARVER] that California farmers are not interested is an all-inclusive sweeping statement which is not a correct portrayal of the facts.

The entire guayule project is another one of those subjects that needs more light and less heat. Let there be light!

Short Summary of Veterans' Rights and Benefits Under the G. I. Bill of Rights

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN C. KUNKEL

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 19, 1944

Mr. KUNKEL. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks, I include herewith a radio talk made by me over station WHP, Harrisburg, Pa., on June 18, 1944. It describes the important basic legislation just passed by the Congress known as the G. I. bill of rights. I feel confident that it will be most valuable to keep for reference. The speech follows:

The conference report on the G. I. bill of rights passed the House unanimously and is now on the President's desk. It will undoubtedly be signed. Even if not, it will be passed over his veto. I am going to give you a short summary of just what the bill does. Obviously, time does not permit me to go into too great detail; also, rules and regulations to be set forth in the future by the Veterans' Administration as authorized by the act will develop more accurately and more specifically these rights and also the procedure which the veteran must follow. However, I do believe that anyone who reads this closely will know, in general, what benefits accrue to him or her under this bill.

ELIGIBILITY

In order to be eligible the general rule is that a man or woman must have served in the active forces of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, or any of their component parts, during the period beginning September 16, 1940, and lasting up to the end of the present war. Such person must have served for a period of at least 90 days, or have been sooner discharged for disability incurred in line of duty. In addition, he or she must have been released from active service under conditions other than dishonorable. No distinction is made between enlistment and induction.

HOSPITALIZATION AND CLAIMS

1. The Veterans' Administration is declared an essential war agency, and entitled, second only to the War and Navy Departments, to priorities on personnel, equipment, supplies, and materials. Priorities for materials are also given to any State institution built or to be built for the care or hospitalization of veterans. These provisions are extremely important. In practical effect they mean that the minute the war ends, at which time the Army and Navy will have no further pressing need for supplies, then the veterans' hospitals will have first call on the goods on hand. Until that time they will have second call.

2. The bill orders the Veterans' Administration and the Federal Board of Hospitalization to provide additional necessary hospital facilities and authorizes arrangements for the mutual use of hospitals, etc., with the Army and the Navy. For this purpose it authorizes the appropriation of $500,000,000. These hospitals will care for diseases and disabilities nonservice connected as well as those incurred in service.

3. Personnel of the Veterans' Administration may be placed in Army and Navy discharge centers, etc., to adjudicate disability claims and to give advice as to their rights and benefits to all servicemen about to be discharged. It forbids the discharge of servicemen and servicewomen until a substantial part of their pay is ready or, if disabled, until adequate arrangements have been made for filing claims for benefits provided.

These two requirements are extremely helpful. At one time a great deal of needless trouble and grief was caused by hasty releases, leaving the veteran more or less stranded. To some degree this has all been remedied by the cumulative efforts of individual Congressmen, including myself, through the exertion of pressure on the War and Navy Departments, thereby securing this action from those departments of their own accord.

4. A further clause states that recognized veterans' associations shall place representatives at the various discharge centers to aid servicemen about to be released. The American Legion, the V. F. W., the D. A. V., and other similar patriotic organizations are admirably equipped to do this. They are eager and anxious so to do. They have been doing this job. They can now be of even greater help in the future than in the past to the veterans about to leave the service and reenter civilian life.

5. It gives the veteran safeguards in respect to various statements against his own interest, and with respect to review of irregular discharges.

EDUCATION

1. It extends the right of vocational education for service-incurred disabilities to those who served during the period of September 16, 1940, to December 6, 1941.

2. All veterans whose education was interrupted or interfered with by reason of their entrance into the service will be eligible for 1 year's education at any school or institution of his own choice and in any subject or subjects desired for which he or she is fitted. He must start the course not later than 2 years after either the date of his discharge or the termination of the war, whichever is later.

In order to make these opportunities widely available, it is stipulated that anyone who is under 25 years of age at the time he or she entered the service "shall be deemed to have had his education or training impeded or delayed." This means that if the veteran was under 25 when inducted, then the solid presumption will be that this did cut into his education, whether or not he was in fact going to school or to college at the time. If he is over 25 then he or she must show that his education actually was interrupted. However, without such showing any person who served is entitled to a refresher or retraining course not in excess of 1 year.

3. The veteran may select any approved educational institution in any State in the Union whether he resides there or not. An educational or training institution is defined to include all public or private, elementary or secondary schools, business schools and colleges, scientific and technical institutions, vocational schools, junior colleges, teachers' colleges, etc., and also technical training-on-the-job schools. It amounts to complete freedom of choice.

Also, an employed veteran may take part-time study under certain rules.

4. The training shall be for a period of not to exceed 1 year, but it may be extended for another 3 years, except in respect to refresher or retraining courses. In brief, the requirement for getting the additional years is that the student fulfill satisfactorily the educational standards of the college or school at which he is studying. However, the greatest length of time which anyone can spend in college will be the length of his or her service after September 16, 1940, and before the termination of the war, excluding the time spent in completed courses in the Army and Navy college and school training programs, as modified by the following paragraph:

Anyone who has spent 90 days in the Army (excluding time spent in completed Army and Navy college training programs) is entitled to 1 year's education. Then at least for all the time over and above this 3 months he is entitled to the equivalent amount of time in Government-provided education. For example, Private John Doe has spent 1 year in the Army. He is entitled to 1 year's education in return for his first 3 months' service. Assuming he has satisfactorily passed his course, then he is entitled to at least 9 months' more training to match the 9 months' service over and above the year secured to him by virtue of the first 90 days' service. In discussing this matter with the Veterans' Administration, I find that it may be that Private John Doe under this illustration may get the full 12 months in addition to the 12 months given him by virtue of his first 90 days' service, or a total of 2 years' education in return for 1 year's service. There is a question of legal construction involved here that has not as yet been decided. If John Doe has spent 3 years in the service, then he can get the maximum amount, i. e., 4 years of education.

5. The Administrator pays the institution the tuition and also the laboratory, library, health, infirmary, and similar fees. The Administrator may pay for books, supplies, and equipment. However, the total of such payments shall not exceed $500 for an ordinary school year.

While pursuing a course of education or training the veteran will also be paid a subsistence allowance of $50 per month if without a dependent, or $75 per month if he has a dependent. Any sums paid to the veteran in apprentice schools, etc., for work done will be proportionately deducted.

LOANS

Any eligible veteran within 2 years after separation from the service or 2 years after termination of the war, whichever is later, may apply for a guarantee by the Administrator of not to exceed 50 percent of the loan or loans for specified purposes, provided that the aggregate amount guaranteed shall not exceed $2,000. For example, if the veteran borrows $5,000 or $10,000 he will get only $2,000 guaranteed. If he borrows $3,000, then he will have only $1,500 guaranteed (50 percent of $3,000).

Interest on the guaranteed part of the loan for the first year shall be paid by the Veterans' Administration. This gives the veteran more chance to get started. The loans shall run for not more than 20 years at not to exceed 4 percent interest. The loans to be guaranteed may be made by private persons, firms, or corporations, or by governmental agencies and governmental corporations. In connection with governmental loans, there are certain other liberalizing features.

2. The specified purposes for which loans can be made are: (a) The purchase or construction of homes, or repairs to them, or to pay delinquent taxes on a home. (b) The purchase of a farm, farm equipment, livestock, and for repairs on farms. (c) The purchase of a business, business property, business equipment, to be used in a gainful occupation. I hope that this will start many veterans on the road to becoming successful small businessmen and to a revival of small business in this country.

The loans must be approved and the act sets out the broad standards to govern the Veterans' Administrator in his decisions as to whether or not to approve. In general, they are the same that any lending institution would apply: (a) that the proceeds be used for the purpose requested; (b) that the property will be useful and necessary; (c) that the ability and experience of the veteran and the conditions under which he proposes to pursue such occupation are such that there is a reasonable likelihood that he will succeed, and (d) that the price paid does not exceed a reasonable normal value as determined by proper appraisal.

In the case of homes, the amount and terms of the payments must bear a proper relation to the veteran's present and anticipated income and expenses.

EMPLOYMENT

The reemployment provisions are substantially the same as those now in effect. A veterans' employment representative, who shall be a veteran, is attached to the United States Employment Service in each State. He will help to get jobs, give information, etc. This is substantially what Bill Ilgenfritz is now doing so well in Pennsylvania at present. It should be noted that the veteran has other employment rights under the Selective Service Act and other laws passed by the Congress.

READJUSTMENT ALLOWANCES

1. Eligible veterans who are unemployed are entitled to receive under certain conditions unemployment compensation at the rate of $20 per week for a maximum of 52 weeks within a 5-year period immediately following the termination of hostilities. The unemployment must begin within 2 years after discharge or the end of the war, whichever is later. A proportionate amount may be paid to the partially employed who receive less than $20 allowance per week given by the act plus $3—$23.

The allowance for a week will be $20 less that part of the wages payable to the partially unemployed for such week which is in excess of $3 (figured to the nearest highest multiple of $1 where it does not come out even). Thus, if the veteran is earning $10, you subtract $3 from the $10, leaving $7. You then subtract the $7 from the $20, and his weekly payment for readjustment would be $13. Stated conversely, it is $23 per week less the amount earned in partial employment during the week.

2. A claimant will be disqualified if he leaves suitable work voluntarily or is discharged for misconduct; if he fails to accept suitable work when offered to him or refuses to attend an available free training course; and also in certain cases where work stoppages are caused by labor disputes, but only if he is participating therein.

3. Provision is made for self-employed veterans engaged in a trade, business, profession, etc. If his net earnings have been less than $100 in the previous calendar month, he can receive the difference between $100 and his net earnings for such month. This provision is not in our social-security law and, so far as I know, is an innovation in our law. It should enable enterprising veterans to become self-employed.

4. Where a claimant receives other Federal or State benefit, a proportionate adjustment is made in his allowance. Also, veterans who have rights under two or more different sections of this act can only receive the fair and proportionate amount.

PENALTIES

Anyone receiving any money under this title with intent to defraud shall be punished by a fine of $1,000 or imprisonment of not more than 1 year or both. The same penalty applies to anyone making a false statement or misrepresentation. Anyone knowingly accepting an allowance to which he is not entitled shall be ineligible to receive any further allowances of any kind under this title. As to other fraudulent claims under this act the general penal statutes will be applicable.

Many veterans, or their families, will want additional information on various parts of this program. The Veterans' Administration is the source of all authoritative rulings on this and similar veterans' laws. If anyone feels that it would be helpful to have me get in touch with the Veterans' Administration in behalf of himself or others, just write your Congressman, JOHN C. KUNKEL, at either 459 Old House Office Building, Washington 25, D. C., or to 20 South River Street, Harrisburg, Pa. If you prefer, telephone me at 4-3356 on the Harrisburg exchange. If I am not there, my secretary, Mrs. Richings, will take your message and forward it on to me or arrange an appointment. She may very probably be able to help you, herself. Both Mrs. Richings in Harrisburg and Miss Garney in Washington have had much experience in this work. All three of us find it a real and great pleasure to do anything possible for the boys and girls in the services and for their loved ones back home.

American League for a Free Palestine

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RICHARD P. GALE

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. GALE. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the June 15, 1944, issue of Answer magazine:

AMERICAN LEAGUE FOR A FREE PALESTINE

At its first formal meeting May 24, the sponsoring committee of the American League for a Free Palestine, representing a cross section of influential Americans, established itself as an organization to support the principles and objectives of the Hebrew Committee of National Liberation which seeks a seat on the council of the United Nations, an independent army on the battlefield, and the creation of a free Palestine.

Meeting at the home of Maj. and Mrs. Harvey L. Schwamm, 1046 Fifth Avenue, New York City, the American League pledged to mobilize American public opinion behind the liberation movement and to enroll millions of members to support the program of its organization. The newly-formed league, with headquarters at 11 West Forty-second Street, New York City, has a general sponsoring committee of 479 members.

An interim executive committee was elected by the sponsoring committee yesterday. Permanent officers will be chosen at a congress to be convened by the American League in September, the exact date to be set later.

Serving on the executive committee are: Senator James M. Tunnell; Representatives Will Rogers, Jr., and Andrew L. Somers; Assemblyman Robert J. Crews; Konrad Bercovici, Louis Bromfield, Lester Cohen, Frances Gunther, May Lewis, Curt Riess, Russell Gordon Carter, Lion Feuchtwanger, Emil Lengyel, Lawrence Lipton, and Lyon Mearson, authors; Jo Davidson, sculptor; William Auerbach-Levy, painter; Stella Adler, actress; Eric Godal and Arthur Szyk, artists; Sterling North, literary critic; Dr. Manfred Sakel, psychiatrist; Harry Louis Selden, editor; Maj. Harvey L. Schwamm, Nathan George Horwitt, Irving Taitel, Rabbi Baruch Rabinowitz, Betty Keane, Albert A. Bauer, Mrs. Rose Cohen, Alex Wilf, and Frieda Zimmerman.

THE VOICE OF AMERICA ACCLAIMS THE LEAGUE

Reproduced here are some of the messages sent by leading Americans in response to the invitation to attend the meeting of the sponsoring committee:

REPRESENTATIVE WILL ROGERS, JR.

I think that the formation of the Hebrew Committee of National Liberation is one of the most wholesome signs that has yet appeared on the horizon of post-war solutions of age-old problems. I believe its claims are just, its philosophy sound. It is the sensible, rational answer both to the Palestine problem and the problem of anti-Semitism.

Peter H. Bergson, with whom I have worked for a long time, is a man of unquestioned integrity, tireless energy, and dynamic leadership. It is men of this type who will, I hope, be leading figures in the post-war world.

The American League for a Free Palestine is formed in the finest traditions of our Nation. I trust millions of Americans of all national descents and creeds will give it their whole-hearted support. Good luck.

Representative WILL ROGERS, Jr.

BEN HECHT

PETER BERGSON,

Hebrew Committee National Liberation:

Zionism as a political force is as dead as the projects of Montezuma. The Hebrew Committee of National Liberation would have been welcomed by Messrs. Herzl and Nordau as an exhuberant step forward. The Jewish cause has been too long under the domination of people by Stephen Wise and his fellow Jewish fossils. What the Jews need most is a high wind to blow these ossified politicos out of their places. They are the dust that has gathered over a lost cause. I hope that out of the storm you raise will come the young and noble leadership that the Hebrews of Europe deserve. If you are in need of a constituent here is my vote.

BEN HECHT.

REPRESENTATIVE RICHARD P. GALE

Retel: Regret inability to attend press conference, statement as follows: "After the Balfour Declaration, after years of hope, toil, struggle and irrepressible spirit the Jewish homeland must not be lost in the post-war era. Palestine must flourish under Jewish direction and Jewish control."

RICHARD P. GALE,
Member of Congress.

REPRESENTATIVE GEORGE G. SADOWSKI

A free and democratic Jewish commonwealth must be our goal and an accomplished fact when this war is over. The Jewish people have furnished no Quislings or traitors to the cause of the United Nations. Much Jewish blood has been shed all over the world to fight Nazis and tyranny. The democratic cause, the preservation of liberty and freedom requires the reestablishment of the Jews as a nation in their ancient homeland. Palestine should now have representation in the councils of the United Nations and be given the opportunity to form its own division on the battlefields.

GEORGE G. SADOWSKI,
Member of Congress.

GEORGE S. GIS

Am heartily in favor of free Palestine as should be a nation and home for Jewish people as I expressed in my article in Jewish Forum late last year. Many war veterans of all societies are heartily in favor of the same.

GEO. S. GIS,
Past National President and Past National Historian Philippine and China Veterans Eighth Army Corps National Association.

MAJ. GEN. GEORGE B. DUNCAN

During recorded history different civilization and creeds have obtained leadership in the world as of Egypt, Persia, Crete, and Rome only to pass into oblivion. Jewish race is the only one to survive in language, history, and religion. Their religion has furnished the background of Christianity and so-called civilization of today. Now the Jews are scattered over the world and are again the subject of persecution. They ask but little from our dominant nations. A free Palestine and opportunity to build again as a nation. The United Nations and Christianity should give them this.

GEORGE B. DUNCAN,
Major General, Retired.

BISHOP F. A. M'ELWAIN

Support aims of league for free Palestine, including representation both in councils of United Nations and on battlefields.

Bishop F. A. MCELWAIN.

RUSSELL GORDON CARTER

Please list me as an enthusiastic supporter of the aims of the American League for a Free Palestine. The Hebrew Council of National Liberation should take its place now as a sovereign nation among the United Nations. Her people deserve the privilege of maintaining an army on the battlefield against the common enemy. We don't want further promises, we want fulfillment.

RUSSELL GORDON CARTER.

LION FEUCHTWANGER

If there is one demand self evident within this scope of the war aims of the United Nations and of the Atlantic Charter, it is a free Palestine and the representation of such a free Palestine in the councils and on the battlefields of the United Nations. Not only would the foundation of such a free Palestine be the obvious solution of the Jewish problem all over the world it would also be a symptom showing that the war aims of the United Nations as far as these have been given shape in the declaration of responsible statesmen are more than words. The foundation of a free Palestine would thus fortify the confidence of the friends of the United Nations in the honesty of their intentions it would disperse the suspicions of the doubters and that shorten the war.

LION FEUCHTWANGER.

ERWIN PISCATOR

Impossible to attend 24th. As I understand it, all United Nations will be made up of free people therefore why should not the free people of Palestine have a free nation. A free Palestine to participate in a post-war council of free nations.

ERWIN PISCATOR.

GRACE MOORE

Deeply regret cannot be present today but I extend every good wish for every success that this league desires for I as an artist who appreciate the contribution to art that has been made through the generations by the Jewish people feel so deeply the need for world wide understanding and appreciation of all your present and future objectives and offer my cooperation in any way needed.

GRACE MOORE.

STERLING NORTH

Am in complete sympathy with your desire to have the Jews of this stricken planet represented both at the peace table and in the battlefield.

STERLING NORTH.

EDDIE DOWLING

I pray the American League for a Free Palestine will be successful and that through its efforts those governments responsible for the present deplorable situation in Palestine will awaken and cease using Palestine as a political football. Of course Palestine should sit with the allied councils and Palestine should be allowed to have its own army and anything else that will help and strengthen a sorely abused people. Sincerely yours.

EDDIE DOWLING.

PEGGY WOOD

In reply to your telegram would say am sure an American league for a free Palestine is close to the heart of many thoughtful people while I feel sure there is good in such a league I myself am not well enough informed to make a public statement for press release on so controversial a question. However you have my best wishes.

PEGGY WOOD.

JULIAN STREET

Whether in present state of world affairs it is feasible or wise to press for free Palestine representation in councils of United Nations and on battlefield, I am not qualified to judge. I do, however, feel strongly that if any people have rightful and ancient claim to any territory whatever, the Jewish people have such claim to Palestine and that this claim should be recognized at earliest practicable moment.

JULIAN STREET.

JAMES KEARNEY, JR.

Proposal for the formation of a free Palestine demands immediate attention to take the greatest advantage of the military and economic contribution towards speeding victory and stabilizing the post-war peace which can be made by the Jews from all the world who have settled in Palestine.

JAMES KEARNEY, Jr.,
The Times Newspapers.

R. J. VIRTUE

Regret not being able to be with you on the 24th but you know I want to do everything possible to further the ends of the league. I think you should be granted representation in council of United Nations and the league should be accorded the privilege of representation on the battlefield. I want you to feel that I want to do everything possible to further the interests of the league in every direction so that its purposes and objectives will be known. If there is any way I can help don't hesitate to call on me.

R. J. VIRTUE,
Publisher, Erie Dispatch-Herald.

FRED A. SEATON

Every reason common decency, fair international dealings, sound statesmanship dictate support of aims of league to gain for Free Palestine representation in councils of United Nations and on battlefield. All Americans regardless of race, color, or creed should back that objective to the limit. Any lack of fairness with the persecuted Jews of the world would be shameful and a practically irredeemable blot on history, and body blow to hopes of fair practical settlement of the peace after the war.

FRED A. SEATON,
Publisher, the Tribune,
Hastings, Nebr.

Medical Care for Wives and Children of Servicemen

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN C. KUNKEL

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 20, 1944

Mr. KUNKEL. Mr. Speaker, during 1943 Congress appropriated large sums for grants to the several States to aid those States in using their facilities to carry out the emergency maternity and infant care program known as E. M. I. C. Just recently, in 1944, an additional large sum was provided. This program and these appropriations have had my consistent strong support. I know that this is a service which must be given to the wives and children of the men in our armed forces and that they are entitled to receive it.

In Pennsylvania the administration is under the Bureau of Maternal and Child Health, Pennsylvania Department of Health, Harrisburg, Pa. I include herein extracts from an article by Dr. Paul Dodds, the director, giving an outline of its operation:

1. WHO IS ELIGIBLE FOR CARE?

Any woman living in this State, regardless of legal residence or financial status, whose husband (living, deceased, or missing in action) at the time of application is an enlisted man of the fourth, fifth, sixth, or seventh pay grades of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, or Coast Guard. Similarly any sick infant under 1 year of age whose father is an enlisted man as described above.

2. WHAT SERVICES ARE OFFERED?

a. Maternity care by physicians.

b. Hospitalization of maternity patients, if recommended by the physician.

c. Care of sick infants by physicians.

d. Hospitalization of sick infants, if recommended by physicians.

As the program develops, and if funds are available, it is expected that the following additional services can be authorized; consultation, nursing, ambulance, expensive drugs, major obstetric operations and transfusions.

3. HOW IS APPLICATION MADE?

The wife fills in an application form and takes it to the physician of her choice; the physician completes the form, requesting authorization of services. The patient then mails the form to the Pennsylvania Department of Health, Bureau of Maternal and Child Health, Harrisburg.

4. GENERAL INFORMATION

A plan for this program was approved by the United States Children's Bureau, on September 20, 1943, and payment cannot be made for services rendered prior to that date.

The program provides for hospital ward service only and payment made by the Pennsylvania Department of Health may not be used as part payment for semiprivate or private room service.

Hospital insurance may be used, in which case the physician only will receive payment from the Pennsylvania Department of Health.

Initial hospital authorization for a maternity patient is 10 days and for a sick infant it is 21 days. If further hospitalization is necessary, it may be requested.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAMILTON FISH

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolution adopted by the general executive board of the Junior Order United American Mechanics, expressing regret on the decision of the Honorable MARTIN DIES to decline to run for reelection to Congress.

The resolution follows:

Whereas the intended retirement of the Honorable MARTIN DIES from public life in January next, the House of Representatives and the truly American people will lose their most vigorous crusader for American ideals; and

Whereas thousands of American citizens, regardless of political affiliation, look with admiration upon his indefatigable zeal in hunting down the enemies of our country: Therefore be it

Resolved, That this general executive board with its affiliated States of the Junior Order United American Mechanics, Inc., and the fraternal patriotic Americans consisting of upward of 265,000 members, in thirty-fourth annual session, met and expressed regret at his decision to return to private life; and be it further

Resolved, That the Secretary be, and is hereby, instructed to convey to Congressman MARTIN DIES in behalf of the membership of our various organizations the best wishes for a speedy recovery to health, success in all of his undertakings and an early return to public life; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the Honorable MARTIN DIES and be released to the public press.

Benefits for War Veterans Granted Under Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE A. DONDERO

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I desire to present a condensed summary of the benefits granted to veterans of World War No. 2 under the provisions of the Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944.

Title I of the law authorizes the establishment of adequate hospital facilities for the care and treatment of veterans for nonservice disabilities or diseases, as well as for disabilities or diseases incurred in the service.

The rights of veterans are protected by two specific sections of the act, and these read as follows:

No person shall be discharged or released from active duty in the armed forces until his certificate of discharge or release from active duty and final pay, or a substantial portion thereof, are ready for delivery to him or to his next of kin or legal representative; and no person shall be discharged or released from active service on account of disability until and unless he has executed a claim for compensation, pension, or hospitalization, to be filed with the Veterans' Administration, or has signed a statement that he has had explained to him the right to file such claim: Provided, That this section shall not preclude immediate transfer to a veterans' facility for necessary hospital care, nor preclude the discharge of any person who refuses to sign such claim or statement: And provided further, That refusal or failure to file a claim shall be without prejudice to any right the veteran may subsequently assert.

And—

No person in the armed forces shall be required to sign a statement of any nature relating to the origin, incurrence, or aggravation of any disease or injury he may have, and any such statement against his own interest signed at any time shall be null and void and of no force and effect.

Veterans are further protected by the right of review in cases of irregular discharge or release from active service:

First. There may be review by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to determine whether a person at the time of committing an offense was insane, in event of which determination benefits to which such person would otherwise be entitled shall not be forfeited.

Second. Except in cases of separation by sentence of general court martial, any enlisted man or officer may have a review by an authorized board to determine the correctness of his discharge or dismissal.

Third. Any officer retired or released to inactive status without pay may likewise have a review by an authorized board to determine his retirement rights.

Under first and third, above, the application for review must be filed within 15 years after discharge or dismissal from service or within 15 years after the effective date of the act, whichever is later.

Title II of the act provides for educational benefits; title III, for loans for the purchase or construction of homes, farms, and business property; title IV, for employment service; and title V for readjustment allowances for veterans who are unemployed.

ELIGIBILITY FOR BENEFITS

In general, to be eligible for the benefits provided under the act:

First. The veteran must have served in the armed forces for at least 90 days, unless sooner discharged for a disability incurred in the line of duty.

Second. His service must have been during the period beginning September 16, 1940, and ending with the termination of the war.

Third. His discharge from active service must have been under conditions other than dishonorable.

While benefits are provided immediately for those who have been discharged from service, the general purpose of the act is to afford readjustment benefits during the post-war period. The benefits provided may be claimed and secured within 2 years after discharge or the end of the war, whichever is later, with an over-all limitation which will permit one term of enlistment after the termination of the war.

EDUCATION OF VETERANS

Title II, which embraces the educational features of the law, provides for:

First. One year or its equivalent in continuous part-time study of education or training at any school or institution of the veteran's own choice, in any subject or subjects desired for which he is fitted.

Second. Not to exceed 3 additional years of education or training, dependent upon—

(a) Length of service;

(b) Satisfactory progress in study or training; and

(c) The condition that the person was not over 25 years of age at the time of entrance into the service, or, if over that age, his education was impeded, delayed, interrupted, or interfered with by reason of service.

Third. Payment of all tuition and other fees, cost of books, supplies, equipment, and other necessary expenses, not to exceed $500 per school year.

Fourth. Subsistence allowance while pursuing his education or training at the rate of $50 a month if without dependents or $75 a month with dependent or dependents.

Fifth. Part-time attendance in a course of education or training at a reduced subsistence allowance or without allowance, but with payment of tuition and other expenses.

Sixth. The right to retain possession of the books and equipment furnished if he satisfactorily complete his course of education or training.

The right to vocational education for service-connected disabilities is extended to include those who served during the period from September 16, 1940, to December 6, 1941.

LOANS TO VETERANS

Title III provides for the guaranty of loans to veterans, such guaranty not to exceed 50 percent of the loan, with a maximum of $2,000. The loans may be made by an individual or by private or public lending agencies and may be made for the following purposes:

First. The purchase or construction of a home;

Second. The making of repairs, alterations, or improvements to a home owned by the veteran;

Third. The purchase of farms and farm equipment; and Fourth. The purchase of business property.

These loans must conform to the following requirements: The interest rate must not exceed 4 percent; the loan must be practicable and suitable to the veteran's circumstances; the Government must have the right of subrogation to the extent of any guaranty paid; the liability under the guaranty must decrease or increase with the decrease or increase of the amount of the unpaid obligation; and the agreement must permit the Government to protect itself in case of default through the right to bid on foreclosure proceedings or to refinance.

In the event that a principal loan is made or guaranteed or insured by a Federal agency, a loan for all or part of the balance of the purchase price or cost may be guaranteed if it does not exceed $2,000 or 20 percent of the cost or purchase price and other specified conditions are met.

EMPLOYMENT SERVICE

Title IV provides the right to registration for employment with, and for placement in employment by, the Veterans' Employment Service through the United States Employment Service and any State employment agency cooperating with the U. S. E. S. This right applies to any veteran of any war discharged from active service under conditions other than dishonorable.

READJUSTMENT ALLOWANCES

Title V provides unemployment allowances of $20 a week while unemployed, subject to the following conditions:

First. The week of unemployment must have begun after the first Sunday of the third calendar month after the effective date of the act and not later than 2 years after discharge from active service or the termination of the war, whichever is later.

Second. The veteran is not receiving subsistence allowance for education or training under title II of the act, or increased pension for vocational education under Public Law No. 16, Seventy-eighth Congress.

Third. To be eligible, the veteran must reside in the United States; must be completely unemployed, or, if partially employed, has wages under $23 a week; must be registered with, and reporting to, a public employment office; and must be able to work and available for suitable work.

Fourth. Any person will be disqualified from receiving such an allowance if: (a) he leaves suitable work voluntarily without good cause, or is suspended or discharged for misconduct; or (b) he fails to apply for suitable work or fails to accept suitable work offered; or (c) he, without good cause, fails to attend an available free training course; or (d) he is participating in a strike or labor dispute causing a work stoppage.

Fifth. Within a limitation of 52 weeks, the total eligibility is determined by allowing 8 weeks of allowances for each of the first 3 months of service, and 4 weeks of allowances for each month or major fraction thereof of service thereafter.

Sixth. The allowance of $20 a week will be reduced by any Federal or State unemployment or disability compensation—other than pension, compensation or retired pay paid by the Veterans' Administration—received by the veteran for the same period of time.

Seventh. Any person self-employed for profit in an independent establishment, trade, business, profession, or other vocation, is eligible for readjustment allowance if his net earnings are less than $100 for the previous calendar month, with the amount of allowance being the difference between net earnings and $100 a month.

Memorial Day Address of Hon. John C. Kunkel, of Pennsylvania

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN C. KUNKEL

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. KUNKEL. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks I include herewith an address which I made at the seventy-seventh annual Memorial Day services at Harrisburg Cemetery, May 30, 1944, Decoration Day of this year. This was under the auspices of the Sons of Union Veterans of the Civil War whose present commander is Lt. John H. Runkle. It was a great honor to me to join in tribute to these gallant men, so few of whom now remain with us. Today only one survivor remains in the whole of Dauphin County, Henry Maurer, of Wiconisco, now 98 years old. Mr. Maurer served in the first regiment to meet General Lee at Gettysburg, was in the battles of Macon and Cripple Creek, and with Sherman on his march to the sea. To those who have gone before, we pay tribute through him. The address follows:

"Lord God of Hosts, be with us yet
Lest we forget, lest we forget."

I salute you who by your presence here today reconsecrate this annual Decoration Day so sacred to all of us; you who thus give honor and recognition to those who by their deeds of valor bequeathed to us the freedom, liberty, and union which your own flesh and blood are today fighting with equal courage and bravery to preserve; you who avail yourselves of this day of memory to dedicate yourselves anew to the solemn task that the tribulation and sacrifice by which these departed heroes upheld our integrity and our ideals shall not have been in vain.

By the sword others before them had first won these priceless heritages by great daring; then had molded with certain knowledge and uncanny skill the checks and balances to guard them. Those who rest beneath these small green tents surrounding us here and throughout the land and across the seas have done their utmost to give them to us intact—whole and undivided.

As the great Lincoln said at Gettysburg, "The world will little note nor long remember what we say here, and it can never forget what they did here." That is all too true. Yet I believe that the spirits of those great Americans now in the Great Beyond hover over us watchfully in our hour of stress and need, guiding our hands and strengthening our minds and hearts. By associations such as this we will draw an inspiration—something that cannot be seen nor heard—but something that will spur us on to greater efforts in this present tragic era—efforts which will aid each of us to do his extra bit to hasten victory in this world-wide irrepressible conflict now engulfing us.

History tells us that this custom of setting aside May 30 as Memorial Day, or Decoration Day, for the soldiers of the war between the North and the South originated in the South. Below the Mason-Dixon line were most of the battlefields of the war. Near these battlefields were the last resting places of the mortal remains of so many of the brave soldiers of both sides. A young Virginia girl, Cassanda Oliver Moncure, 1 month after the founding of the Grand Army of the Republic, is reputed to have originated the idea in May 1866. Flowers were placed on the graves of the brave men of both armies. Gen. John A. Logan, of the Grand Army of the Republic, witnessed these services of love. It was he who, 2 years later on May 5, 1868, issued an order appointing May 30 of that year as Decoration Day for the Grand Army of the Republic. That day was chosen because it was the date of the discharge of the last Union volunteers of the war. One by one the States have adopted it as a holiday. All the States now observe the day. Although the eight Southern States hold their ceremony on June 3, thereby paying honor also to Jefferson Davis, the President of the Confederacy, upon the anniversary of his birth. There is no national law on the subject, however.

Instituting the great custom of Memorial Day, General Logan said, "It is our purpose to inaugurate this observance in the hope that it will be kept from year to year while a survivor of the war remains to honor the memory of the departed." General Logan's hope will be fulfilled. The thinning ranks of the veterans of the Civil War have ever honored this request and all patriotic Americans have proudly claimed the privilege of joining with them in so doing. And when the last of the old comrades muster out and fall in with the ranks of that vast silent army, when the last bugle call has blown, free Americans throughout the land will continue to place the flowers of spring in tribute and devotion upon these shrines of green. Now, and for many years past we pay homage to those who have passed on "to that bourn from which no traveler returns" after using freely and gladly their strength and their energy to build this Nation into a bulwark of civilization and their blood to cement our Union into a unit indivisable and indestructible. When we do so, we also vow to have and to hold the rights and ideals for which they died.

We know that the youth of today have that high courage, great daring, and steadfast endurance that marked the men of 1861 to 1865. While this day is their day, just as Armistice Day belongs primarily to the veterans of World War No. 1, we would be less than mortal did we not glory in our own. At Bataan, Corregidor, north Africa, Sicily, Salerno, China, Burma, the four corners of the globe, on the earth below, and in the heavens above, and on and underneath the waters, the exploits of your boys and girls have been unequaled in the long annals of recorded history—ours or that of any other nation present or past.

These are your sons, daughters, husbands, relatives, and friends. Ours is not an army or navy drawn from a warrior caste skilled and practiced through the years in the art of war. It is a citizens' army: farm boys, workmen, tradesmen, and others from every walk of life engaged in similar pursuits, earning their living peacefully by the sweat of their brows, living their lives quietly and simply. From thence, overnight as it were, sprang our heroes of today. From the same roots came just as quickly the heroes of those former wars that rocked the Nation.

It is fourscore years since the war when brother fought brother. It is a cheering thought that Father Time has brushed away with soothing hand much of the heartache and sadness caused by the departure of those brave men and women. May Father Time do the same for you and yours. Yet each year adds to their stature and luster. Their place in the hearts of 135,000,000 Americans is secure. To many, that knowledge is a present help. Today throughout the length and breadth of the land there is more heartache and suffering as the casualty lists arrive. This is so close and so immediate that little can be said by way of consolation. Except perhaps this one thought, that no matter how long his or her span of life had been, he or she could never have attained a higher pinnacle of human achievement than this supreme sacrifice for God and country. To no one is ever given the power to do more. No future deed could equal this.

Thomas Gray, the great English poet, in his Elegy in a Country Church Yard said, "The paths of glory lead but to the grave." On Easter and here today we are giving testimony to the inescapable fact that the paths of true glory lead beyond the grave.

This is an appropriate place to pay this tribute. In that time of turmoil troops were moving to and fro to the south and west of here. Many neighboring towns and villages still bear the scars and marks of cannon and gunfire. Just across the river fortifications were being hastily constructed to defend Harrisburg. And across the river and beyond those hills—just 37 miles away—was fought the decisive battle, the battle that made inevitable the final result. The Union preserved—entirely free.

The Americans of the epoch knew by instinct that the Battle of Gettysburg was one of the decisive battles of the world. Historians of other nations agree with them and with us after long study. As time marches on the far-reaching significance of that colossal combat and thence the preservation of this Union have year by year become more crystal clear. The quick and brilliant success of our arms in two later wars prior to this one rested upon that fact. In the precarious, brittle world that confronts us today think what it would mean to us if this country had been divided into groups of smaller states or nations instead of being one powerful and closely welded whole, able to mobilize all its resources with sudden speed, ready to defend its security, safety, and integrity with them and to aid our friends and allies, the United Nations. Think how gigantic this fact looms up to the peoples of the world. We can hold aloft the torch of freedom and liberty much higher as we are today. In union there is strength. We can make the light of liberty burn more brightly amid the storm clouds of a war-torn world. We can insure the world that the torch will be lighted again and quickly in places where the forces of evil and oppression have extinguished it. We could not have fought for freedom if our forefathers had not made all men free.

For if the principle of secession had once been established, it is only logical to assume that it would have been carried further and further and that both a separate North and a separate South would have broken up into yet smaller units by further use of that same principle. This knowledge is shared by our brothers in the South just as much as by those of us in the North.

A Southern Representative in Congress, Mr. COLMER, of Mississippi, expressed this view in a Memorial Day speech sometime ago, when he said: "I shudder to think what might have happened had the South prevailed." Today the North and South are one. There is no North, no South, no East, no West. The ill feeling and bitterness certain to be created by such a war and its emotional aftermath have almost entirely vanished. The common purpose with which all sections of the United States of America joined strictly together to further our ideals in avenging the Maine and defeating Spain, when the heroes of 1898 banded together for their spectacular campaigns—San Juan Hill, Manila Bay—when the troops dashed to the Mexican border, and in the World War, provided the melting pots in which were washed away by blood and sacrifice the few antagonisms still existing. The final crucible is this World War.

Never did so many go so far to fight for so so little of material value, as did those boys of 1917 and 1918, who with shining eyes marched forth on that great crusade to make the world safe for democracy and to end all wars and who asked nothing for themselves. Never, until December 7, 1941, were the fruits of their victory and their achievements largely dissipated, but by hands other than their own. Their idealism remains today—as it always will—one of the great moral and regenerative forces of the world. Their work and experience during the past quarter century will be a keystone and a beacon light in avoiding past errors and in building a world order of lasing peace. When we look at the totalitarian governments of today and when we see the Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse again riding roughshod over more than one-half of the world, we know that their high objectives were well worth fighting for. If those boys had had their way, the world would have had throughout that peace we still pursue so steadfastly, and countless thousands on whom grinds the tyrant heel would enjoy the blessings of freedom.

Today North, South, East, and West mingle in our armed forces to bring the day of victory quickly and to safeguard and distribute throughout the seven seas to all mankind the opportunity for these same rights and principles which those to whom we pay honor and homage today paid for so willingly but so dearly many years ago.

It was just a little more than four score years after the founding of our Republic until the time the first shot was fired. The critical eras in the history of the United States recur at intervals of approximaely 80 years. Again today we are called upon to make fateful decisions, to expend our blood and sweat to hasten victory and thus save life—the most precious thing on earth. Fortunately victory is clear. But the cost has been great and will be greater. When I speak of cost, I mean cost in human life and suffering. Irreplaceable life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness of a great people are worth defending at any cost.

We have always had these privileges and perhaps had become accustomed to regard them as part of our natural environment, like the trees and the birds and the air and the sun. Perhaps it is not humanly possible to really know the true value of such gifts unless one has had the bitter experience of living without them. We are proud to be citizens of this Nation. We look back on our glorious past and, perhaps, we have a tendency to think that this glorious past insures of itself an equally glorious future. But empires have risen and empires have fallen. Many of these nations also had their periods of amazing success and prosperity. Our own Nation has had its periods of true greatness and it has had periods when it has not been so great. Today we are America. What we do and what we are will determine what this country is and will be. Millions have proven what they can do and will do by making the supreme sacrifice. Well over 35,000 have already died. These whom we honor today have given us most favorable opportunity. The strength of any government is no greater than the composite strength of all its people. It rests upon the aggregate of the aggregate of the persons who form its citizenry. This is truer today in our world narrowed as it is in time and space than ever before.

Americanism is glorious and we should glory in it but is not something inherent—not something which is just here with us of itself because we possess the peculiar good fortune of being American citizens—it is something we must create by our daily lives.

So we must on this solemn occasion keep our eyes fixed on the shining light which glows on the heroes past and present whom we honor today. We must remember them and what they did and what they died for, that their mantle has fallen on us.

"Lord God of Hosts be with us yet,
Lest we forget, lest we forget."

Address of Hon. Joseph W. Martin, Jr., of Massachusetts

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RICHARD B. WIGGLESWORTH

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the inspiring address delivered as permanent chairman of the Republican National Convention in Chicago by the distinguished minority leader, Mr. MARTIN:

I deeply appreciate the great honor you have bestowed on me by making me the permanent chairman of the 1944 National Convention of the Republican Party.

This convention meets in a solemn moment of our history. As we gather here, our sons are locked in a deadly struggle not merely to crush a cruel foe, but to determine whether or not the ideals upon which our free society is founded may have a decent world in which to continue its growth and progress. Never for a moment do we doubt the issue of this world battle. Seeking no territory to exploit, with no ambition to impose our will upon other peoples, giving the strength and the blood of our brave men and the heroic women who march beside them, pouring out our treasure in such a flood as the world has never known, we ask only that other men may have the right to live in a world where they may enjoy the blessing of that independence which through the favor of Almighty God we have been permitted to have in such abundance. To such a struggle there can be but one issue. And in a sense this convention is not just a meeting of the members of a political party. It is a meeting of Americans who have a job to do which is only a part of that larger job for which our boys are dying upon so many remote battlefields and in so many distant seas. Here, therefore, in all humility, knowing our limitations, let us offer up in our hearts a prayer for our soldiers and for ourselves to that Allwise Providence who, as Lincoln said, "can go with them, yet remain with us and be everywhere for good." Let us implore Him to speed the day of victory so that they may come home to their mothers, and wives, and sisters, and their young sweethearts, and into our hearts where they will be enshrined forever for the selfless sacrifices they have made.

We will owe these men and women a duty far greater than merely caring for their individual wants when they return. When they went out from these shores they left behind them a form of society dedicated to certain great principles of human freedom and conduct, a society in which every man would have the chance to make his way, to speak his mind and make his own decisions.

They left a Constitution—somewhat battered, perhaps—and those traditions of freedom seriously impaired. But we owe it to them that when they return that Constitution and the heritage of individual freedom which it guarantees shall be restored in all its vigor. I hear it said frequently by our bureaucratic mentors in Washington that we will never go back to the old ways. What old ways are they talking about? We are here to tell them that we shall, as we have always done, forever go forward on all those roads which may lead to a better, safer, and happier life. But there are certain roads we have traveled which we have found to be good. The way of the American Constitution is one of them. And when the Republican Party comes again into control of the Government, the first thing it will do will be to go back to the Constitution.

We are in more than one war. In one of those wars our sons and daughters fight against German and Jap. But there is another war here at home. It is a war between two eternally hostile ideologies. One idea is that of the free society—the society of free men creating their wealth with the instrumentalities of free enterprise under the protection of a representative republic. The other is the conception of the regimented and planned society, living upon vast streams of Government debt and taking its shape and destiny from the directives of a bureaucratic elite under the command of a self-inspired leader. You may call that anything you wish. In Europe they call it fascism. Here we call it the New Deal. And in this war here at home let there be no question where the Republican Party stands. We are for the American system of government. We are for our way. We stand for our ideal of the free society—free enterprise and a free Republic. We are for government under the Constitution by a constitutional President and a Congress acting in the open under law and not by government in secret and without law by an army of irresponsible bureaucrats under a permanent leader.

We will win this internal struggle because the people of America will not tolerate winning the military conflict and then losing at home the precious ideals for which we went to war.

The gravity of conditions both at home and abroad places a heavy responsibility upon the delegates to this convention. We will nominate a man who will lead us in cooperating with other nations to get the world back to a sound, prosperous peacetime basis. We will name a man who will restore to the American people their government, and to all the opportunities for improvement in life which have all but vanished in the last 12 years.

In addition to the selection of capable men for President and Vice President we have the further responsibility of adopting a progressive, forward-looking platform which will meet realistically the problems of today, and which will give to the American people real hope for the future. We will keep any covenant we make with the people.

In this platform we must sound the call for all Americans, regardless of past party affiliations, to rally to the battle to preserve constitutional government, and our American way of life. This must be a government of laws and not a government by men. The courts must not bow meekly to the will of any President.

I know it is difficult to believe that anyone would want to substitute for our American way of life and our American form of government, other forms which have been tried and always found wanting in the past. Yet we cannot be blind to what has been attempted. We cannot ignore the boasts and predictions of men high in the ranks of the New Deal. The signs are very plain. There is a deliberate intention on the part of some to remake America in a way which would destroy opportunity and initiative. They would put an end to private industry. They would regiment all men and all women, and put all our people in shackles of bondage to an autocratic, power-lustful bureaucracy. Those who advocate the rigid permanent regimentation of the American people do not dare to declare openly their purpose. They scheme with stealth, and under the cloak of war activities, to achieve their purpose. They slyly plant the propaganda that the war controls must continue long after the war is over. What they want is permanent control of all industry, and to dominate all phases of our life.

Compare the attitudes and actions of this administration with World War No. 1 Democratic President, Woodrow Wilson. Said Woodrow Wilson: "Liberty has never come from the Government. The history of liberty is a history of resistance. The history of liberty is a history of limitation of Governmental power, not the increase of it."

We Republicans are determined to keep American citizens from being chained like vassals to a New Deal bureaucratic machine.

In the Congress we have fought this battle with the assistance of patriotic Jeffersonian Democrats, who put their country before party, we have been able to hold in check this movement, and we have prevented the consummation of many dangerous objectives. We have now reached a crucial point. We must have reserves in this battle to hold the lines of Constitutional Government. Give us a Republican President, and a Republican Congress, and we can all go to sleep at night secure in the knowledge that we shall continue to enjoy the blessings of the free government and liberty bestowed upon us by the brave, hardy pioneers who blazed the way for our Republic.

The New Deal bureaucrats can be expected in this campaign to picture new and more alluring rainbows. As usual they will be long on glowing promises. But as Lincoln well said, "You can fool all of the people some of the time; some of the peope all of the time, but you can't fool all the people all of the time." The people have lost faith in New Deal promises. Their performances have never measured up to their promises. Now the day of reckoning is at hand.

The people are tired of bungling and fumbling; waste and extravagance; arrogance and bureaucratic dictatorship. They know that unless there is a change from the direction in which we are now traveling national bankruptcy, confiscatory taxes and complete governmental regimentation and control of all our activities is dead ahead. The sure way to avert what would be a major transformation of our political and social ideals is to put a new governmental policy in effect in Washington.

The new dealers assert, when their failures are revealed, that their critics have no policy, no program. That is just as false as are some of the doctrines of the New Deal.

The Republican Party has had, and has now, both a policy and a program. Our policy and our program have been set forth on many occasions; in conferences of Republicans in Congress; and at meetings of the National Committee. At Mackinac we outlined our creed.

Our policy is a positive policy. This policy is to protect, to defend, and to perpetuate our free constitutional form of government, our free-enterprise system of economy, our system of free society. This is a real American policy, and it is broad enough to be embraced by men and women of every party who want to see individual freedom and individual opportunity continued in America. We extend a warm welcome to every American to join us in the historic struggle. We want the participation of everybody in putting our Nation back on a firm foundation.

The Democratic Party which we have known and with which we have honorably struggled on so many fields, but which was a party of Americans who believed in the American system, has lost its power over its own destiny. The Democratic Party has been captured by a minority whose philosophy it despises. It has become a prisoner of the New Deal. Thank God some of its leaders realize this and have had the courage to revolt. This election, curiously, is not merely a fight to put the Republicans into office but, by a strange twist of fate, it is also a fight to emancipate the Democrats.

Back in September 1942 the Republican Members in Congress set forth their policy and their program. These declarations in substance were:

1. The Nation's war effort must continue unabated until complete, decisive victory is achieved for the United States and our allies. We shall continue to demand efficient and unrelenting prosecution of the war on the battle fronts of the world and in the home fields production and delivery of machines, munitions, and supplies and war. We must unfailingly provide our own armed forces and those of our allies with all necessary implements, munitions, and supplies, in ample quantities, in time, where needed. We will uncompromisingly put aside every influence, interest, consideration, and activity which in any way interferes with these objectives.

2. We oppose any attempts to negotiate peace or the consideration of any peace terms until our arms have won such a decisive victory that we, together with our allies, are able to dictate the peace terms. Freedom is at stake. It permits no compromise or appeasement. The Axis dictators must be vanquished.

3. We recognize that the United States has a responsibility to work with other nations, to bring about a world understanding and cooperative spirit which will have for its supreme objective the continued maintenance of peace. In so doing, we must not endanger our own independence, weaken our American way of life, or our system of government.

4. Victory and security transcend all other considerations. We demand full and immediate utilization by the President of the most capable and efficient military and civilian leadership. Mistakes, blunders, and incompetence fall upon all alike. Added tears and unnecessary taxes are the wages of waste and inefficiency. The patriotism and sacrifices of the people must be matched by the selection of the most capable and best-trained leaders in America, regardless of party, group, class, or section. We pledge as the people's Representatives in Congress a constant vigilance to eliminate waste and inefficiency.

5. Standing unreservedly for every effort to make this Nation strong, vigilant, and vigorous against all its enemies both foreign and domestic, the Republican Party has given and will continue to give to the President loyal, wholehearted, and patriotic support in the war. The gravity of the war situation requires the undivided effort of everyone. The President should not permit himself to be deterred from the responsibility which is his by those forces and influences which persist in continuing so-called social and governmental reforms at the expense of our war effort.

6. National unity depends upon an informed public opinion based upon free speech and free press. The right and duty to criticize and suggest must be fully exercised and discharged. We demand that the people be given all information concerning the war effort consistent with military requirements, but the withholding of information of the failures of the military and civilian officers of the Government cannot be hidden or justified behind the sham of military necessity. There must be no unnecessary censorship. There must be an end to conflicting statements and to an inconsistency of conduct on the part of the Government. There are no privations which our people will not willingly endure, no sacrifices which will not be unflinchingly faced, as long as they are truthfully informed as to the reasons for making such demands upon them. The people grow in strength and determination through truth.

7. There can be no vested interests in this war. No party, class, or section has a corner on patriotism or ability. Whatever our interests, we shall survive or perish together. Our Nation's peril must not be exploited by any individual or group for special gains or advancement. We shall neither support nor uphold any proposal or action on the basis of the interest of any particular group and we shall denounce any others whose action is dictated by such motives. We oppose excessive war profits. We demand the prompt investigation and prosecution of war profiteers. There must be a fair distribution of the war burdens among all the people. War demands a common partnership in both effort and sacrifice.

8. Individual freedom as symbolized and expressed in our American way of life and our Republican form of government with its three independent, coordinated branches must be preserved. This freedom must not be permanently surrendered in the name of the war emergency. There must be a prompt resumption after the war of complete and orderly functioning of constitutional government and free enterprise. Government by consent of the governed is still the best system ever devised for the continued progress of mankind.

9. The Nation faces grave and stupendous financial problems, due in large part to the loose fiscal policies of the last decade. War has added its cost to pre-war extravagance. Grim burdens are being imposed upon all of the people. From the frugality of yesterday and the sweat of today they buy bonds and pay taxes, confronted at all times by the menace of inflation and the threat of repudiation. We shall do all within our power to meet the demand of the people that Government lighten the burden by insisting that nondefense spending be reduced to essentials. Activities by the Government which have lost their emergency characters must be elimnated. Such taxes as are levied upon the people must be based upon the ability to pay and designed to conserve and not destroy.

10. American free enterprise is the last hope of an embattled and bewildered world. It is the last hope of our economic salvation when conflict ends. We stand militantly opposed to any use of the war effort as an excuse for unwarranted encroachments or restrictions upon free enterprise. The economic problems of the Nation must be solved on a basis which is sound and fair to all. National character based on a regard for moral standards and spiritual values must be restored, but this cannot be hoped for unless there is a complete return of intellectual honesty and absolute frankness on the part of those who are charged with the functioning of the Government, both in carrying out their duties and in their relationship with the people of this Nation. The principles which have made America great must not be overthrown by the war. In winning the war, we must not lose the peace.

That is a sound, constructive policy for any party. It is a good platform for any American.

The Republican Representatives in the Congress have never deviated a hair's breadth from those pledges since they were made, and they stand today as the declared policy of the Republicans in Congress. A party which stands for these principles certainly cannot be said to have no policy.

The people of America know that if those policies had been put into effect by the New Deal administration, we would be nearer to the day when we shall welcome back home our boys and girls from their great struggle. There would be a greater unity and a stronger spirit of cooperation, both of which are so vital if we are to win an enduring victory.

The Republican Party is the Bill-of-Rights party. We have witnessed in the recent past attempts by the Administration to set aside, or ignore, the Constitution. It is the contention of the Republican Party that the Constitution is not set aside by the advent of war; it ought not to be ignored because of war. Our system of government is the same; our Constitution is the same; and the importance of observing its provisions and limitations in wartime is the same as when the Supreme Court declared in the famous Milligan case in 1866 that—

"The Constitution of the United States is a law for rulers and people, equally in war and in peace, and covers with the shield of its protection all classes of men, at all times, and under all circumstances. No doctrine, involving more pernicious consequences, was ever invented by the wit of man than that any of its provisions can be suspended during any of the great exigencies of government. Such a doctrine leads directly to anarchy and despotism, but the theory of necessity on which it is based is false, for the Government within the Constitution has all the powers granted to it which are necessary to preserve its existence, as has been happily proved by the result of the great effort to throw off its just authority."

Whenever any criticism, no matter how just or how constructive, is leveled at policies of the New Deal administration, at its contradictions, inconsistencies, broken promises, and mistakes of administration, the Administration's spokesmen always say: "All right, what would you do?" I am going to indicate a few things we will do.

The first thing the Republican Party will do when it comes into power will be to restore to Congress its responsibility and function as the people's special instrument of control over their Government and their public officials.

We will restore responsibility in matters of local concern to the State and local governmental subdivisions. The further Government is removed from the control of the people, the more inefficient and unsatisfactory it becomes.

We will have genuine economy in Government. To achieve that we will eliminate administrative nonessentials. No one can pretend that under the New Deal there will ever be retrenchment in governmental costs. The new dealers just don't believe in it. They preach the doctrine of deficit spending and an unlimited Federal debt.

Our whole taxing system will be made not only as simple as possible, but equitable as well. Taxation must be on a revenue basis and not for punitive purposes. We need a post-war tax policy which will stimulate industry and create jobs for the people. Without genuine tax reform, we will have millions of unemployed.

Under a Republican administration labor will retain all the essential rights and just privileges it has gained. The interests of labor and capital are mutual; working in harmony, each respectful of the rights of others, they can save private enterprise and give prosperity to all our people. When either side is unfair both suffer. Let us through justice to all prevent class warfare between two great groups of our own people. Only through justice to all can we achieve the industrial peace so essential for our full employment and the complete achievement of our fullest measure of prosperity.

Agriculture will be allowed to be self-sustaining and prosperous, which means that it will be assured a commensurate return on investment and labor. It cannot achieve its proper place in our national life when chained and regulated by theorists. A program of plenty is a program of wealth and happiness. The farmer should be given his rightful share of the national prosperity.

Private capital will be permitted and encouraged to venture, in the post-war period, into renewed and expanded production.

Enlarged job opportunities will be assured through a constantly expanding economy. Such an economy can be achieved only by increased production of goods and services at decreased prices, without a reduction in wages, attained through our genius for efficient mass production.

The hobbles of governmental restrictions will be taken off of business and only essential Government regulations retained.

We will continue humane and beneficial economic and social advantages. Old age shall not be a period of anxiety and suffering for the worthy men and women who have contributed to the upbuilding of America. There is no more meritorious appeal than full security for our aged citizens.

We will provide adequate benefits for the men and women of our military services and make certain they are promptly available. And we all know what they must have above everything else when they return is jobs at American wages and unemployment insurance until these jobs are attained.

These are some of our specifications.

The people in November will elect a President. The people know that while the President, under the Constitution, is Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, he cannot be the directing genius of our military and naval forces. The people know he must rely on the trained military leadership to conceive and direct the military movements, and all parties should give unhesitatingly their full support to this military leadership. If this were not the case, we would be even more fearful for the safety of the millions of our brave sons and daughters who are in the military service.

We Republicans have constantly acted in that spirit, and we will continue to do so.

In recent weeks we have witnessed unusual and startling innovations in our political life. We have seen the head of the Communist political party in this country, Earl Browder, merge his party with Sidney Hillman's C. I. O. Political Action Committee in a drive for a fourth term for President Roosevelt and the election of a Congress which will be subservient to the will of those organizations. In endorsing Mr. Roosevelt there was no effort by Browder to conceal his objective. "We remain," said Browder, "an organization of Communists who hold the principles of scientific socialism, of Marxism."

Mr. Browder is not being fooled. He knows what he wants and he is taking the road he is sure will bring him to his goal. The American people will not be fooled, either.

This challenge has been insolently and boldly issued to the people of America. It presents a vital issue of this campaign. Do the people want these radical organizations, with their avowed purpose to remake America, to control the Presidency, to secure a rubber-stamp Congress, and to dominate absolutely and completely our Government? Of course they don't.

Since the American people made the decision that this country should be forever dedicated to the cause of free government and free labor, no greater issue has ever been presented.

In this fateful hour the good, sound-thinking people of America will respond to the call to save the country for our American way of life.

Men and women of all political affiliations will join in this fight.

Here is something worth fighting for. Here is an issue which rises above the narrow bonds of partisanship. Here is a real appeal to every red-blooded American, regardless of race, of color, or of creed.

There can be no question as to the decision of the American people. The people of the North, together with the people of the South and West and the East, will join in this call of country to save our liberties. To all of us is presented a glorious opportunity for service. We will not fail to be true to our fighting forces, to the children of today, and posterity of tomorrow.

We will keep faith with the fighting forces over there and their loved ones at home. We will save constitutional government at home and on the firm foundation of freedom and individual opportunity we will build an enduring peace. As a solvent, sound, forward-looking Nation we will be true to our obligations to other nations and we will be equally true to our own people. We will aid other nations to achieve security and rehabilitate themselves. We never shrink from duty, nor do we ever fail to aid afflicted people everywhere in the world. We can and will do it without lowering our own standards of living or sacrificing our own independence.

We go forward to victory, a victory for the American way, a victory for right and justice, a square deal for all people. And upon our efforts let us invoke the blessing of Almighty God.

St. Louis First City of Its Size To Go Over Top in Bond Drive

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. COCHRAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, my home city, St. Louis, and St. Louis County, is the first city of its size in the country to subscribe its quota of $180,863,050 in the fifth war loan drive. This is nothing new, as it is not the first time St. Louis and the county has reached its goal in bond drives; not only did they subscribe the quota but with 8 days to go the total exceeded the quota $802,555. Volunteer workers deserve great credit for the success of the drive. The sale of bonds to individuals and corporations will continue even though the goal has been reached.

Services of Vice Admiral Russell R. Waesche, Commandant, United States Coast Guard

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SCHUYLER OTIS BLAND

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, the committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries which has jurisdiction of Coast Guard, is especially proud of the splendid service which has been rendered by that organization under the direction of Admiral Waesche, and the committee is in hearty accord with the views expressed in an editorial on Admiral Waesche and the Coast Guard which appeared in the Washington Post June 14, 1944, and which was placed in the RECORD by Congressman CANFIELD, of New Jersey—see page A3004.

It has always been a pleasure to have Admiral Waesche before the committee because of his clear, comprehensive, and complete statement of all matters of legislation presented by him, and because of the complete confidence which the committee has in Admiral Waesche and his official staff.

My personal acquaintance with Admiral Waesche began at the Yorktown Sesquicentennial Celebration in 1931. At the request of the United States, Yorktown Sesquicentennial Commission, the then commandant of the United States Coast Guard designated Commander Russell R. Waesche as harbor master at Yorktown during the celebration and with authority to make the necessary preliminary arrangements for accommodating the large number of vessels which were expected to attend. Thereafter he met the various committees interested in the marine features of the celebration and took active charge of all preliminary arrangements in the harbor and along the water front. Informative bulletins were issued from time to time and distributed to those interested, including steamship companies and yacht owners, as to berths and anchorages, fresh-water supply for vessels attending the celebration, schedules for steamers using the commercial wharf, rules regarding the use of small-boat landings and the transportation of persons by small craft in the harbor, and other pertinent matters. Along with these bulletins were furnished blue prints of wharves and small-boat landings in the harbor and of berthing and anchorage plans.

In the annual report of the United States Yorktown Sesquicentennial Commission, the splendid services of Commander Waesche, and of the Coast Guard, were recognized. The Coast Guard vessels engaged in the patrol of the harbor were busily occupied with various duties. Besides being constantly on the alert to guard against any accident to the thousands of persons being transported in the harbor by small boats, each commercial vessel that entered the harbor was met by a patrol boat and conducted to its anchorage; transportation was furnished frequently for the several governors of States and their parties in the harbors; landing forces and liberty parties were carried between the shore and ships in the harbor to assist the ship's boats; thousands of visitors were transported to and from the Constitution. During the reception on board the French cruisers, as well as at other official functions in the harbor, the lanes of travel between ships and shore were closely patrolled.

In addition, a Coast Guard officer and detail were placed in charge of the commercial wharf to supervise the docking and unloading of commercial vessels and to safeguard the lives of the thousands of passengers embarking and disembarking at this pier.

The work was performed without accident and with the commendation of all. The services then rendered were but another evidence of the truth of the motto of the Coast Guard that it is "Always Ready." The work done at the Yorktown Sesquicentennial celebration impressed me with the high degree of efficiency of Admiral Waesche and since that time I have been closely in touch with his work. At that time the jurisdiction over the Coast Guard was not in the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, but when the opportunity arose for the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries to acquire jurisdiction of the Coast Guard every member of the committee welcomed the opportunity. They have never regretted the change, and every member of the committee feels a personal pride in its magnificent achievements in war and in peace.

I have no hesitancy in saying that Admiral Waesche is one of the most efficient, capable, conscientious, painstaking, informed officials in the United States Government today. I wish for him a long continuance in his present office where he is so efficiently serving.

On June 14, 1944, in the presence of high-ranking Navy and Coast Guard officers, Vice Admiral Russell Randolph Waesche, United States Coast Guard, was sworn in as commandant of the United States Coast Guard for a third term of 4 years by Secretary of the Navy James Forrestal in ceremonies in the Secretary's office.

Vice Admiral Waesche was born January 6, 1886, in Thurmont, Frederick County, Md., and received his early education in the public schools of Maryland and at Purdue University. He was appointed a cadet in the Coast Guard Academy on May 19, 1904, and received a commission as ensign on October 27, 1906. Until 1928 he was a line officer on cutters and destroyers in Alaskan and Arctic waters and the Pacific and Atlantic. He came to Coast Guard Headquarters in 1928 as Chief Ordnance Officer. In 1932, he became liaison officer in the War Plans Division, Office of the Chief of Naval Operations, Navy Department. With the termination of this duty 4 months later, he became aide to the commandant of the Coast Guard and later, chief of the finance division.

He was appointed commandant of the Coast Guard, with the rank of rear admiral, by the President of the United States on June 14, 1936. Upon termination of this appointment in 1940, he was reappointed for a second 4-year period. In March 1942, he was raised to the rank of vice admiral, and in May 1944, was reappointed commandant for a third 4-year term.

Vice Admiral Waesche originated the Coast Guard Institute and correspondence school for warrant officers and enlisted men; and reorganized Coast Guard field forces in 1931.

During his first term as commandant, the lighthouse service was transferred to and integrated with the Coast Guard and the dual organization of a shore station branch and a seagoing branch was eliminated with one compact organization being set up.

Early in 1942 an Executive order by the President transferred to the Coast Guard certain function of the Bureau of Marine Inspection, United States Department of Commerce. Responsibility for the security of United States ports was also centralized in the Coast Guard.

Under wartime conditions, Vice Admiral Waesche has presided over the greatest expansion of the Service in history. In personnel it has multiplied 15 times, now totalling over 175,000 officers and men. He has organized a merchant marine council to serve as an advisory body on the administration of Coast Guard functions that relate to the merchant marine. He has seen the Coast Guard's peacetime fleet expand roughly three times, and the Service man over 200 Navy vessels.

Vice Admiral Waesche received an honorary degree as Doctor of Engineering in February 1944 from Purdue University. In May 1944, he was elected president of the Society of American Military Engineers.

He has three sons in service: Russell Randolph, Jr., a lieutenant commander in the United States Coast Guard; Harry Lee, a lieutenant colonel in the United States Army Air Forces; and James C., a chief motor machinist's mate in the Coast Guard. Vice Admiral and Mrs. Waesche, the former Agnes R. Cronin, reside at 7005 Rolling Road, Chevy Chase, Md.

Wartime Life Insurance

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALBEN W. BARKLEY

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the radio address of Kenneth C. Bradley, national insurance officer, Disabled American Veterans, over Station WINX, Washington, D. C., June 12, 1944.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Life insurance, a subject concerning which most Americans are quite familiar, in time of war assumes entirely different aspects than is the case under normal conditions of life. This is particularly true with respect to the members of our armed forces and their dependents. Private insurance companies, by reason of the greatly increased risks to reserves which participation in the grim tasks of war-making entails, are unable to assume such risks when policyholders enter the armed forces to do battle with the enemy. As a result, most insurance policies contain a so-called "war clause" which, in effect, precludes the payment of death or disability benefits where the death or disability is brought about by the hazards of military service.

To offset this inability on the part of private insurers the United States Government has, from time to time, provided insurance protection to members of its armed forces. At the present time all enlisted and commissioned personnel are permitted to carry from $1,000 to $10,000 of this protection. There are two types, namely: United States Government life insurance and National Service life insurance.

Only those persons who were members of the active military forces prior to October 8, 1940, are eligible, under the law, to the former, whereas all who were in such service on that date or may have since entered such service are, or were eligible to carry the latter provided certain time and health requirements are met. To date, upwards of 12,000,000 policies have been issued by the Veterans' Administration.

All policies provide for payment of benefits to a designated beneficiary in the event of the death of the insured, provided, of course, premiums were timely paid. Premiums may be, and in most instances are, paid by deduction from the pay of the insured while he or she is in the active military service. Upon discharge therefrom, however, other arrangements must be made by the insured either by direct remittance or by deduction from disability pension, compensation or retirement pay, if any. Provisions for payment of benefits, permitted beneficiaries, and types of permitted plans, as between Government life insurance and National service life insurance, differ materially.

Military personnel engaged in the prosecution of World War No. 1 were issued Government life insurance on a yearly renewable term plan, in amounts of from $1,000 to $10,000, payable, in the event of the death of the insured, to his designated beneficiary or beneficiaries. Such beneficiaries were limited to certain specified relatives of the insured. In addition, the policy provided for the payment of monthly benefits to the insured on account of permanent and total disability. Subsequently, provisions were made for the conversion of this term insurance to other plans comparable with the commonly known plans of private insurance agencies. In all policies issued, whatever the plan, there was contained a permanent and total disability clause, together with the provision, on payment of additional premiums, for payment of monthly benefits on account of total disability (not necessarily permanent) which continues for at least 4 consecutive months. Limitations on the class of permitted beneficiaries was practically eliminated.

Until October 8, 1940, on which date the National Service Life Insurance Act became law, eligibility to Government Life Insurance included members of the regular military forces during peacetime. Thereafter the privilege of securing original policies of United States Government Life Insurance was canceled except as to those applications then pending.

The National Service Life Insurance Act, under which the great majority of present members of the armed forces are now covered, falls far short of its predecessor with respect to the benefits it provides. The outstanding difference is the lack of a provision for payment of benefits to the insured on account of permanent and total disability. The nearest approach to this is a provision for waiver of payment of premiums during the continuous total disability of the insured, which commenced subsequent to the effective date of the insurance and which has existed for 6 or more consecutive months. Persons whom the insured may name as beneficiaries are limited to the widow, widower, child, parent, brother, or sister of the insured. The term parent includes those who may have stood in loco parentis to the insured for at least 1 year prior to the insured's entry into active service. All National Service Life Insurance is originally issued under the 5-year level premium term plan, and may be converted after 1 year to ordinary life, 20- or 30-payment life. No other plan is provided.

Time does not permit discussion of the many phases of these insurance plans, but the foregoing outline indicates that there is need for amending legislation to equalize the benefits afforded our fighting men and women.

The Disabled American Veterans in concert with other major veteran organizations has sponsored legislation, now pending before the respective committees of the United States Senate and House of Representatives, which is designed to correct the manifest inequalities existing between the two types of insurance authorized by existing law. The legislation when adopted would, we believe, provide for the men and women, and their dependents a protection which, by and large, is comparable to that afforded the veteran of World War I and the peacetime soldier, sailor, and marine. Meanwhile, we are continuing our activities designed to assist the service man and woman and their dependents in securing all such benefits to which they may now be lawfully entitled and to advise all who may wish such service through our Nation-wide service department. We have experienced paid representatives in all or most of the regional facilities of the Veterans' Administration, any one of whom is ready and willing, without fee, to assist in this work. The Washington staff is located at room 543 Munsey Building and room 156 Veterans' Administration. Your speaker specializes on the subject of insurance and, like the other members of the staff, will be pleased to assist anyone desiring such aid on insurance problems.

At this time next Monday, Capt. John W. Egense will address you on the subject of veterans' appeals.

Wage and Hour Division Attempts To Extend Its Jurisdiction Over Laundries

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRED A. HARTLEY, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. HARTLEY. Mr. Speaker, on March 4, 1943, I called to the attention of the Congress a glaring example of bureaucracy rampant. I pointed out in detail the efforts of the Wage and Hour Division of the United States Department of Labor to extend its jurisdiction over laundries, linen-supply companies, and similar establishments despite a specific exemption provided in the act for service establishments doing a majority of their business within State lines. In connection with my statement, I placed in the RECORD various letters exchanged between Mr. Walling, Administrator of the Fair Labor Standards Act, and myself.

The United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit in the fall of 1943 vigorously repudiated the efforts of Mr. Walling's division to disregard the clear and unambiguous language which this Congress had written into the statute. Sometime later, the United States Supreme Court refused to disturb that decision.

Despite the clear Congressional mandate in the act and its subsequent affirmation by the judicial branch of the Government, Mr. Walling failed to revise a certain publication—Interpretative Bulletin No. 6—which took the position that laundries doing even a small quantity of wholesale work were to be treated differently than other types of laundries. This bulletin, which is widely circulated, is used by unscrupulous individuals to encourage suits against such laundries.

I called this situation to the attention of Mr. Walling on December 15, 1943, reminding him of his assurance to me in February that this Bulletin No. 6 would immediately be clarified "if the circuit court of appeals sustained the district court." I reminded him that he wrote me on August 12 that he would immediately revise the bulletin if the Supreme Court refused to review the case. Thereafter, despite the decision of the circuit court of appeals and the refusal of the United States Supreme Court to review the case, Mr. Walling failed to revise Interpretative Bulletin No. 6.

Mr. Walling replied evasively on January 7, 1944, and on January 21 I asked him categorically to let me know unequivocally whether the bulletin would be revised to reflect the decision of the Lonas case.

On January 29, Mr. Walling replied stating that he considered a certain press release issued on November 25, 1943 to be "a clear revision of the bulletin." The fact remains, however, that this misleading bulletin is still distributed by the Wage and Hour Division and employees in various parts of the country are still bringing unfounded suits as a result of their lack of knowledge.

The courts have repudiated this interpretation and Mr. Walling himself in his correspondence to me agrees that it no longer represents the interpretation of the Wage and Hour Division. As a consequence, employers in these essential-service industries which today represent a vital bulwark against the spread of disease in their communities are forced by employees' suits to waste time and energy in court which might better be devoted to the continuation of their businesses.

I believe that this correspondence to which I refer should be spread upon the public records as further evidence of the reluctance with which certain agencies confine themselves to the area delimited for them in their congressional grant authority:

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR,
WAGE AND HOUR DIVISION,
Washington, January 29, 1944.

The Honorable FRED A. HARTLEY, Jr.,
United States House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN HARTLEY: I am sorry that I was not able to talk with you about the Lonas situation because I was surprised that you had changed your views on the adequacy of what I had done since talking with me on the telephone 2 or 3 weeks ago.

I consider that the statement of our present position on laundries and linen-supply establishments of November 25, 1943, which is attached to every copy of Interpretative Bulletin No. 6 which goes out was a clear revision of the bulletin as you request. I do not see how it is possible to construe it in any other way. Would it make it more clear if a stamped notice was placed in the margin of every copy of the bulletin on page 8 opposite paragraph 25 something to this effect: "But as to laundries and linen-supply establishments see the attached statement dated November 25, 1943"? It would seem to me that no one could possibly misconstrue that we had modified our position on laundries and linen-supply establishments.

As I have already told you, I do not intend to take part in any laundry or linen-supply litigation under the Lonas decision which I am accepting as final in the field which it covered—laundries and linen-supply establishments. I do have to recognize, however, that as to certain other activities which are alleged to be service and which are dealt with in Interpretative Bulletin No. 6 the courts have taken a different view. Insofar as the courts have laid down the law on service establishments it would now appear that our views as expressed in Interpretative Bulletin No. 6, with the exception of laundries and linen-supply establishments, are a correct interpretation of the law. Having changed our policy as to laundries and linen-supply establishments, I cannot see that these industries have any grievance that some other industries which have not been ruled out of coverage of the law by court interpretation but which in some cases have been specifically ruled in, are not ruled out by an administrative interpretation which would be contrary to court decisions.

I am sure that on further reflection you will agree with me in this.

Sincerely yours,
L. METCALFE WALLING,
Administrator.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., January 21, 1944.

Hon. L. METCALFE WALLING,
Wage and Hour Division,
United States Department of Labor,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. WALLING: This is the first opportunity I have had to reply to your letter of January 7 following our conversation of the previous day, both of which were directed to my letter of December 15. If you will return to my letter once more, you will find that you have failed to answer my principal question: "Will you let me know, at your earliest convenience, unequivocally, whether Interpretive Bulletin No. 6 will be revised to reflect the decision of the Lonas case? If the bulletin is to be revised, when do you expect the revision to be completed?" I appreciate your assurance that your Division will undertake no further enforcement activities contrary to the decision in the Lonas case. However, the laundry industry is disturbed by the continued threat of employee suits which may arise as a result of the language in paragraph 25 of Bulletin No. 6, which states in unqualified language that laundries and linen supply companies serving industrial or business customers are subject to the Fair Labor Standards Act. Despite the fact that your press release of November 25, 1943, now accompanies each copy of Bulletin No. 6, the invitation to litigation is not thereby removed. I am informed that some union organizers are using Bulletin No. 6 to stir up unrest and dissatisfaction among employees of these service establishments and the employers' explanations of the Lonas case are futile in the face of the language of your official bulletin.

In view of your own opinion, expressed to me both orally and in letters on numerous occasions, that you recognize the clear intent of Congress to exempt all types of laundries, is this not the appropriate time to make such a revision? Furthermore, you have given me written assurance on at least three occasions that the bulletin would be revised after the district court decision, after the circuit court of appeals decision, and after the Supreme Court refused to review the case. I am forced to the opinion that some of your staff still nurture the hope that if the bulletin remains in its present form there may some day be further litigation which will once more raise the question before the Supreme Court. I believe it is your duty as administrator of the act, in simple justice to employers in this field to immediately revise the bulletin in accordance with your own opinion and the opinion now of five courts. There is a report that the employer in the Lonas case was forced to spend more than $35,000 in legal fees defending this unjustified case through various steps in litigation. If the next victim of such litigation should be a small laundry as are most plants in the industry, it might be forced to yield its legal rights because it could not afford similar expense.

I understand that complaint has already been presented to the Smith committee outlining the history of this case and the part played in it by your Division. Certainly your failure to make the necessary revision in Bulletin No. 6 required by court decision and your own recognition of congressional intent is the type of administrative action which the Smith committee was directed to investigate. I sincerely hope that you will take immediate steps to eliminate any further protest in this matter.

Awaiting your early reply, I am,
Very sincerely yours,
FRED A. HARTLEY, Jr.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR, WAGE AND HOUR AND PUBLIC CONTRACTS DIVISION,
Washington, January 7, 1944.

The Honorable FRED A. HARTLEY, Jr.,
United States House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN HARTLEY: As I explained to you yesterday, I think the misunderstanding on the part of some people in the laundry industry arose out of a statement made by our regional attorney in Boston to a laundry in Vermont, which is doubtless the one Mr. Skinner referred to in his telephone call to you.

Our regional attorney advised the Vermont laundry that up to that time there had been no change in the position of the Division with regard to laundries. This was correct at that time as the Supreme Court action in refusing to review the circuit court's decision in the Lonas case had not been taken and consequently my press release of November 25, which I am enclosing, had not been issued. As you will see from this release, the Divisions are not taking any enforcement action whatsoever with regard to laundries and linen-supply establishments the greater part of whose servicing is in intrastate commerce and will not except in the unlikely eventuality that the Supreme Court might review some other laundry or linen-supply case. The Divisions, of course, will not participate in one in any way.

A copy of this statement which modifies Interpretive Bulletin No. 6 as to laundries is included with every copy of the bulletin that is sent out so that employees as well as employers who inquire know exactly what our position is.

If the Supreme Court later should decide that the exemption is inapplicable to such establishments, you inquire what my position would be. Of course, any company which has relied upon our press release will not be proceeded against by us and if the Supreme Court made a statement as to the law which is binding on us we would naturally apply it prospectively only in view of our statement that we will not take enforcement action unless the Supreme Court rules in substance in another case that the circuit court holding in the Lonas case was wrong.

As you know, there is always the possibility of employee suits and the Administrator's position is not binding on employees. I should think, however, that the possibility of an employee suit is remote.

Sincerely yours,

L. METCALFE WALLING,
Administrator.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., December 15, 1943.

Hon. L. METCALFE WALLING,
Wage-Hour Division,
United States Department of Labor,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. WALLING: Several weeks ago Mr. Winslow of your office sent me a copy of a press release which you issued after the Supreme Court refused to review the decision of the circuit court of appeals in the Lonas case. I was somewhat surprised that your statement said nothing about revising interpretative bulletin No. 6. This bulletin remains as a constant invitation to other laundry employees, who can hardly be expected to know about the decisions of the United States Supreme Court, to institute suits against their employers because of your expressed interpretation that wholesale laundry work is covered by the Fair Labor Standards Act. I was confident that you intended to fulfill your assurance given me last August that the bulletin would be revised as soon as the Supreme Court disposed of the matter one way or another.

Yesterday, I received a telephone call from Mr. Skinner informing me that a laundryman in one of the New England States recently discussed with your regional attorney, or someone in his office, the present status of wholesale laundry work under the act. Your attorney stated, in substance, that the Wage-Hour Division was not bound by the Lonas case and, in fact, was currently looking for another test case.

Of course, I don't know how accurately the conversation was reported and I presume your attorneys will deny that any such statement was made. Notwithstanding, I am now convinced that there is a deliberate policy on the part of your legal advisers behind the refusal to incorporate in interpretative bulletin No. 6 the congressional intent which you state to me you recognize, agree with, and which five courts have now affirmed.

You wrote me on February 22 that you would immediately clarify the bulletin "if the circuit court of appeals sustains the district court." The circuit court did affirm the district court decision. Thereafter, you wrote me on August 12 that you could not make a public announcement of a reversal of position because of the possibility that the Supreme Court might reverse the circuit court of appeals. Later in August, at a conference in my office, you assured me that you would immediately revise the bulletin if the Supreme Court refused to hear the case. I so advised Mr. Skinner in my letter of September 7, a copy of which I sent to you. You wrote me thereafter confirming the substance of that letter.

Certainly your statement of November 25, which may or may not have appeared in the newspapers throughout the country, does not constitute a revision of interpretative bulletin No. 6. That bulletin continues to be issued from your offices stating unequivocally that wholesale laundry work is not within the exemption of section 13 (a) (2). Your own staff must view the failure to revise the bulletin as an indication that the interpretation is still correct and that your present enforcement policy is merely a temporary marking of time until "the Supreme Court later should decide that the exemption is inapplicable to establishments serving commercial and industrial establishments."

Will you let me know, at your earliest convenience, unequivocally whether interpretative bulletin No. 6 will be revised to reflect the decisions of the Lonas case? If the bulletin is to be revised, when do you expect the revision to be completed? Will you also inform me what action is being taken at present to prevent the bulletin, in its present form, from misleading workers who may secure copies from your offices? Do you intend to attach some statement to these bulletins pointing out that certain sections are in error and that wholesale laundry work is not covered by the wage-and-hour provisions? What is the status of a wholesale laundry which relies upon your press release as indicating that laundry and linen supply companies are within section 13 (a) (2) if "the Supreme Court later should decide that the exemption is inapplicable to such establishments"?

Awaiting your early reply, I am,

Very sincerely yours,

FRED A. HARTLEY, Jr.

Loans to Veterans

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JED JOHNSON

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, one of the outstanding achievements of this Congress is the G. I. bill of rights, but unless supplemented and implemented it will not do the job that all of us want done for the man returning home from military service.

Let me illustrate by discussing the problem of the returning soldier who wants to acquire and operate a family-size farm. Many of these veterans must start from scratch. Under the G. I. Act the Government will guarantee up to half of a loan for purchase of a farm, livestock, or machinery, provided the guarantee shall not exceed $2,000.

In many parts of the country a family-size farm cannot be acquired without using all a veteran's G. I. credit. In very few sections is the amount sufficient to both buy a farm and equip it. If the veteran uses his G. I. credit for land, he may need a rehabilitation, or operating, loan for equipment and livestock.

You will remember that the G. I. Act makes veterans eligible for loans for the purchase of farms under the Bankhead-Jones Farm-Tenant Act, but it does not provide veterans' preference for rehabilitation loans which many will find necessary. In fact hundreds of men already discharged from military service have known that the Congress had made funds available through the Farm Security Administration for that type of credit.

And many are finding that the available funds are inadequate.

That was why I sought, unsuccessfully, to offer an amendment to the Agriculture appropriation bill when the House conferees reported their recommendations. I wanted to have additional credit provided and earmarked for World War No. 2 veterans. Parliamentary complications prevented consideration of an amendment, however; and I now ask your help in enactment of a measure that will be supplementary to the G. I. Act.

The bill which I have prepared and plan to introduce shortly after the Congress reconvenes following the summer recess is not long. It follows:

A bill to provide for the making of loans to veterans and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc., That for the purpose of making the loans required by section 505 (b) of the Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944 to any person eligible to receive the benefits of title III of said act, and similar loans to the family of such person prior to discharge or after his death in service, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and directed to loan to the Secretary of Agriculture or the War Food Administrator, upon the request of either, $15,000,000 upon the terms and conditions specified in the item "Farm tenancy" of the Department of Agriculture Appropriation Act, 1945: Provided, That notwithstanding any other provision of law, the sums made available hereunder may be distributed among the States, Territories, and counties in such amounts as are necessary to make loans to such eligible persons and their families.

SEC. 2. In order to provide funds for the making of rural rehabilitation or operating loans to any needy person eligible to receive the benefits of title III of the Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944, and to the family of such person prior to his discharge or after his death in service, who is unable to obtain credit elsewhere at comparable rates for the area where the loan is proposed to be made, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and directed to make advances to the Secretary of Agriculture or the War Food Administrator, upon the request of either, of not to exceed $25,000,000. Such advances shall be made upon the terms and conditions specified in the item "Loans, Grants, and Rural Rehabilitation" in the Department of Agriculture Appropriation Act, 1945.

SEC. 3. The amounts herein authorized shall be in addition to any other sums now authorized to be loaned or advanced and the amount of notes, debentures, bonds, or other obligations which the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and empowered to issue and to have outstanding at any one time under the provisions of law in force on the date this act takes effect, is hereby increased by an amount sufficient to carry out the provisions of this act.

SEC. 4. There is hereby appropriated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1945, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated $2,500,000 to enable the Secretary of Agriculture through the War Food Administration to carry into effect the provisions of this act and for necessary expenses, which funds may be expended in accordance with the authorities contained in section 41 (b) (1) of the Bankhead-Jones Farm Tenant Act (7 U. S. C. 1015), in connection with the making and servicing of loans made hereunder and collection of money due the United States on account of loans made pursuant to the provisions of this act.

Summarized, this bill will:

First. Provide $15,000,000 for loans to World War No. 2 veterans who choose to buy family-sized farms in accordance with the G. I. Act and the Bankhead-Jones Act. You may ask: Why not use the present Farm Security Administration appropriation? That, you will remember, is $15,000,000 for farm-purchase loans just enough—even if veterans got it all—for an average of one loan per county. Moreover, the general appropriation does not accord veterans' preference.

Second. Provide $25,000,000 for farm-operating loans either to returning veterans of World War No. 2 or to families of men now in uniform or families of those who give their lives in their country's service. Again you may say, Why not use the present Farm Security Administration appropriation for rehabilitation loans? That is $67,500,000, exactly what it was last year when many, many more farm families sought loans than could be accommodated with the reduced appropriation. I understand that the F. S. A. was able to aid 25,000 additional rehabilitation borrowers in the past year. I honestly believe that the coming year will see more than that number of World War No. 2 veterans seeking this type of credit.

Third. Utilize the existing facilities of the Farm Security Administration, including the committees of three of your fellow citizens in every county, for administering this assistance. Thus, the costs will be held to a minimum.

With the additional funds which the bill would give, the Farm Security Administration will be able to aid veterans in acquiring farms, even beyond the G. I. Act's limitations where that is necessary, and will be in position, too, to furnish operating credit not covered by the G. I. Act. The farm-purchase loan of F. S. A. are for 40 years at 3 percent; the rehabilitation, or operating loans, for 5 years at 5 percent. This money, bear in mind, will be loaned, not given, and I submit to you that there is every reason to believe that virtually all will be repaid.

Do you doubt that today there are thousands of men in military service who are expecting to borrow from the F. S. A. when they come home from the war? Fairly typical, I believe, is the attitude of the soldier who wrote the Memphis Commercial Appeal a letter which it published recently, and which I quote:

To the COMMERCIAL APPEAL:

I have only returned from 18 months overseas long enough to find out a few things that have been going on since we left. Spending a few hours in a U. S. O. in Memphis between trains, I chanced to see in your paper an attack on the Farm Security Administration by your Washington correspondent, and an uncomplimentary reference to this agency in the columns of another Memphis newspaper.

I find it hard to understand this. I don't know what F. S. A. has been doing the past 2 years except what my folks, who are farmers in Texas, write me. F. S. A. financing has helped them to raise all kinds of food that they didn't raise in such quantity before the war: beef, pork, eggs, vegetables.

I have saved up almost enough money since the war began to buy the team and tools for a farm of my own and am counting on F. S. A. to help me buy a farm after the war is over.

I am a farm boy and want to go back and settle down in East Texas—the sooner the better.

Staff Sgt. G. S. FOSTER, Jr.
FORT SHERIDAN, ILL.

Here is a communication from Mr. E. M. Stannard, of Columbia, Conn.

Brought up on a farm, I later went to sea and was an officer in the Merchant Marine. When the depression hit that career, I took an opportunity to do newspaper work. While so engaged I bought a run-down, 130-acre farm. As I was about to start small-time farming along with newspaper work, events so shaped up that I felt it my duty to volunteer for naval service. This I did, and was commissioned a lieutenant just prior to Pearl Harbor. I lasted only a short while due to heavy duty and loss of weight. Ordered home, I found I could not do newspaper work. I had the "jitters"—nervous reaction or some such thing. But I found I did have the strength and desire to go ahead with my farm.

The first winter back home I got "calmed down" and made a fair living chopping and selling firewood. But this provided no capital for farm development or improvement.

Then came the very encouraging response of F. S. A. to my inquiry as to aid. Mr. Silas Weeks, then local supervisor, assisted me in every way with his advice and aid in drafting a program and in securing the necessary funds.

Conditions of the market made it seem advisable to alter some of the program Mr. Weeks had suggested, but the general outline was followed.

Our garden last summer gave us all necessary vegetables and my wife canned over 500 quarts of food. I purchased some cows, and from the sale of some small lots of land, was able to modernize and reequip the barn. For a while my entire income, except living necessities, went for additional animals and equipment.

With an improving income, and a developing farm, I feel that in another year I will be fairly independent financially, with a valuable farm plant to provide a living. This will have been achieved in a bit over 2 years.

When I started my farm was only an unworkable white elephant. No bank or private party would finance me. The Federal Land Bank to whom I originally applied for a loan could see no hope in this farm.

But I found F. S. A. treated the problem more generously and, it must be added, more sensibly. My experience shows that, except for F. S. A., I would never have been able to maintain the farm, or bring it to a point where it now is as a going business and a help in the production of needed dairy products.

Mr. Barnard, the present supervisor, has been very helpful in extending my program to adjust to developing needs. I now have 21 head of cattle, other animals, tractor, and much equipment.

No one wants charity, but often financing is needed on a basis no private source will consider. F. S. A. is the only agency of help in such cases. I have only the highest praise for its program and its usefulness, particularly in this wartime.

Do you not agree that this is a testimonial of which the Congress may well be proud—for it was the Congress that appropriated the funds that aided this former Navy man.

The need is growing daily. The Office of War Information has told us that, through February of this year, 1,300,000 men had been discharged from our military services since we entered the war and the current rate of discharge was placed at approximately 55,000 monthly.

For those who are eager to get back on farms in the communities that mean "home" to them, adequate credit should be readily available. To accomplish that is the purpose of my proposal.

Veterans' Appeals

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. ALBEN W. BARKLEY

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I request unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a radio address by Capt. John N. Egense, national appeals officer, Disabled American Veterans, over Station WINX, Washington, D. C., June 19, 1944.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

When a veteran files a claim on Form 526 with a Veterans' Administration regional office for compensation, pension, or any other benefits to which he believes he is entitled, he should consult a representative of the Disabled American Veterans or a representative of some other recognized service organization. A power of attorney, Form P–22, is used for the purpose to permit the representative to appear in the veterans' behalf when such form is signed by the veteran or claimant.

As long as this power of attorney is in force, no one else may have access to the file. This power of attorney may be revoked by the veteran at any time and another filed with some other veterans' organization if so desired.

When a claim is filed, the Veterans' Administration calls on the War or Navy Departments for the A. G. O. report and all clinical records. When all of these records have been received the case is then considered by the regional board, at which time the veteran may appear himself or he may be represented by the organization holding his power of attorney.

If the board denies the claim the veteran is notified by the Veterans' Administration of such denial and informed of his right to appeal from any adverse decision. He has 1 year from the date of denial in which to file such appeal, and should make this appeal on what is known as Form P–9. This form should be completely filled out by the veteran or claimant, and it should be stated that he is appealing from the decision of the regional office which denied his claim.

If on the appeal form you state that you will submit additional evidence relating to your claim, you will be expected to submit such evidence within 6 months from the date your form P–9 was received in the regional office. In the event you fail to submit such evidence within this 6-month period, your appeal will be considered canceled.

If you state that all evidence obtainable and relating to your claim has been presented to the Veterans' Administration, then the claim will be certified to the chairman of the Board of Veterans' Appeals.

In the course of time the Board of Veterans' Appeals will request that the complete file be forwarded to Washington for consideration by the appellate group. When the file arrives in the central office your representative is notified by the Chairman of the Board of Veterans' Appeals. The file is then called by your representative, who makes a thorough investigative review of the case.

Your representative notes the question at issue on which your appeal was based. If, after his review, he feels that the appeal should be more fully developed, he requests that the file be held in abeyance until he has corresponded with the veteran and asked him to secure, if possible, further evidence or affidavits.

If the representative feels that the appeal should be withdrawn, he so advises the claimant, stating his reason for suggesting withdrawal and requesting the claimant to write a letter to the Chairman of the Board of Veterans' Appeals asking that his appeal be withdrawn and returned to the regional office without any action being taken on the appeal.

Bear in mind that, although you have given power of attorney to any representative organization, your representative is not permitted to withdraw this appeal for you. If, on the other hand, your representative feels that all the evidence is complete, he then calls for a board to hear the case.

When this board is assembled the representative presents the question at issue, stating the facts in the case, submitting all outside evidence, and pointing out why he believes that the claim should be allowed and should have been allowed by the regional office.

It is permissible for the veteran to appear with or without a representative. He may also have his Senator or Congressman appear for him with or without a representative of a service organization, or he may secure the services of a contact representative from the Veterans' Administration.

The Board of Veterans' Appeals has the right to remand the case after the hearing for further medical examination, social service report, or investigation. In this event the case is remanded back to the regional office. After the request of the Board of Veterans' Appeals has been complied with, the regional office reviews the claim again and may then decide that the new evidence warrants the allowal of the claim.

If the regional board holds that the new evidence does not alter the former decision of denial, they must return the claim to the Board of Veterans' Appeals for decision on the original appeal.

If the Board of Veterans' Appeals denies the appeal, both the veteran and his representative are notified. The appeal may not then be reopened unless the veteran or his representative can show that the Board made a clear and unmistakable error, or the claimant may reopen the appeal by submitting new and material evidence.

It takes from 30 to 90 days for a decision to be released by the Board of Veterans' Appeals after a hearing, depending, of course, on whether the appeal load is heavy or light. If light, decision can be expected in a shorter period.

I have tried to give you a clear picture of the proper procedure in filing a claim, and the requirements for filing an appeal in the event of an adverse decision by a local rating agency. There are a number of ways your case can come to Washington; appeal by the veteran, administrative appeal on a dissenting opinion, or the appeal may be merged with the administrative appeal.

The Disabled American Veterans maintain a service officer in nearly every veterans' administration regional office in every State. A full-time staff is located in Room 543, Munsey Building, Washington, D. C., and national service officers are also in Room 156, Veterans' Administration Building, Washington. Contact should be made with either of these two places.

Sound Money

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. COMPTON I. WHITE
OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, the greatest need of the world today is a sound, workable, adequate money system. What every nation needs most is a monetary unit stable in value and interchangeable with the money of all other countries—a monetary unit with a value that is independent and separate from the quality of national credit.

This monetary problem was met and solved by the First Congress, when our monetary system was established by simply providing that a given weight of gold of standard fineness and a given weight of standard silver was a dollar, which was made legal tender for all payments. This simple plan provided a money supply that automatically increased to keep pace with growing population and commerce. The Government did not peg the price of either metal; it simply made the dollar the standard of value and the price of all other things adjusted themselves to the value of this monetary unit. The production and minting of gold and silver furnished money in sufficient and ever-increasing quantity to stabilize prices once they became adjusted to the money volume.

This plan made our money independent of the value of Government credit and provided a money media with an international value.

In later years, France, Belgium, Italy, and Switzerland, in a monetary convention, perfected the bimetallic monetary system which was similar to the system in use in this country, by standardizing their coinage of both gold and silver on a 15½ to 1 ratio, thereby making their money interchangeable in the countries subscribing to the monetary convention. The plant worked so well that this country was invited to join the convention and standardize our coinage with theirs by reducing our ratio from 16 to 1 to the standard of 15½ to 1. No extra expense was involved. All we had to do was to reduce the contents of our silver dollar from 412½ grains of standard silver to 400 grains. For some unexplained reason, this country refused to join in accepting the plan and thereby this Nation lost the greatest opportunity our Government has ever had to join with the other countries to perfect and give to the world a sound international monetary system—a plan that was wrecked by the avarice of Germany after the war of 1870, and the demonetization of silver and, finally, gold. The time for correcting these monetary mistakes is long overdue.

Experience demonstrates the futility of pegging the price of either gold or silver on a commodity basis. What the world needs is a sound, adequate, workable monetary system, a subject ably presented by Mr. F. H. Brownell in his treatise entitled, "Hard Money," and discussed in some detail with Mr. E. S. Pillsbury in correspondence, which is inserted herewith for the consideration of the Members of Congress:

CENTURY ELECTRIC CO.,
St. Louis, Mo., February 9, 1944.

Hon. COMPTON I. WHITE,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. WHITE: Your very interesting letter of January 15 at hand. I have just returned from Florida so hasten to reply.

Thank you for having my letter to the Wall Street Journal published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. As a matter of fact, the Wall Street Journal published only about the first half of this letter, but I guess there was no very good reason for blue penciling the rest. Anyway, it is all in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, regular or not.

I am afraid you do not see the monetary problem as I do; otherwise you would not make the statements you make.

For example, you say the true yardstick of value in our country is the dollar. As I see it, we used to have, we ought to have, and perhaps we soon shall have, a true yardstick of value; but to say that our current dollar is, or during the last 30 years has been, a true yardstick of value seems to me nonsense. When we authorized the Federal Reserve Board to expand the currency as trade demands, and to contract it when no longer needed, we substituted money management by a group of officials in lieu of supply-and-demand control of operations through a monetary unit. Of course, we contact supply-and-demand prices in foreign markets where gold is the only money recognized, but for 30 years we have had no money that may be depended upon to generate supply-and-demand prices; and even if we did have such money, there is no reason to consider that our money managers would let it function.

I have been studying the article to which you call attention in the National City Bank's Bulletin of January 1944. The writer of it puts up so conclusive an argument against deficit financing that I am constrained to reproduce here a portion of what he has to say. The fact is that compensatory financing is the kind our Treasury has been doing for 14 years, except that prosperity boomed itself out long ago and deficits only were left for us to deal with. Here is the quotation:

"In this book (Stuart Chase's Where's the Money to Come From?), written in the engaging style for which the author is renowned, Mr. Chase gives full support to the owing-it-to-ourselves argument about internal debt, and plumps unreservedly for the theory of the compensatory economy—that is, where the government takes responsibility for maintaining full employment by spending freely and running into debt in periods of depression, and siphoning off purchasing power and retiring debt by taxes in periods of boom.

"* * * A second, and even more basic, objection to the compensatory budget idea is that it vastly oversimplifies the problem of maintaining economic stability. It would be a fine thing indeed if all that was needed to keep the economic machine hitting on all cylinders at just the right pace would be turning on and off the stream of funds from the public treasury. But it would be well to pause and think a moment of the full implications of this doctrine.

"What it means, first of all, is applying a single specific—government spending—to all the ills to which the economic system may fall victim. No need to bother about the particular cause of the trouble—whether it be some basic disturbance or unbalance in vital parts of the economy. No need to bother whether exorbitant demands of particular groups are blocking the channels of trade; no matter about international trade barriers, or wrong exchange rates, or bad tax laws, or other shortsighted actions and policies of individuals and governments which, in varying degree, may be responsible for interrupting the even flow of economic activity. For all these, the prescription is the same—more government spending.

"What it means, secondly, is attempting to shift to the government responsibilities that in a democratic society must rest primarily with the people. Putting everything up to the government means weakening the responsibility of the individual. Why should individual groups concern themselves with making adjustments, or place restraints upon their actions? The lid is off for pressure groups, whether they be labor, business, agriculture, or any other, if the government is responsible for keeping everyone employed. Why should anyone worry when the government underwrites everything?

"The fact is that society cannot function under a system that encourages irresponsibility and indiscipline, and which protects everyone from the consequences of making mistakes. This is not to suggest 'putting on the hair shirt' deliberately for the sake of punishment, but simply that necessity is the mother not only of invention but of adjustment. Except as there are incentives and pressures to eliminate sources of disorder, sore spots in the economy tend to get sorer and sorer, until finally the treatment breaks down as after the last war when a maladjusted international situation was masked and propped up by a huge volume of international credits."

Some years ago the farmer wanted subsidies. He got what he wanted and now there is nothing in the world the farmer wants less than subsidies.

At a yet earlier date the banker wanted an abundance of money. Most of them still do. He had been caught short on money from time to time all his life and he wanted enough so he would never be short again. He got what he wanted.

This National City Bank Bulletin contains the first condemnation of the system that has come to the writer's attention from one of the leaders responsible for what we have, although there are plenty long overdue. Now that the ice is broken, we expect these protests to rise to a crescendo that will attract attention in quarters where the farmer has gotten no hearing.

The worker, ever since I can remember, has protested against supply and demand wages in free markets, so we have "collective bargaining." The boss doesn't know how much he ought to pay and the workers know no more about how much they are entitled to receive, so they arrange to put their heads together in some sort of a collective bargaining procedure and zero knowledge times zero knowledge gives 0—a perfect circle. The deed is done. The papers are signed, the bargain is closed. The wage agreed upon constitutes our sacred cow and any man who questions the result is an enemy of mankind in general and labor in particular. However, since our dollar is selling for 80 cents in South America, for 50 cents in Asia, and, according to the latest reports, for 5 cents in China, we may look for development here at home at no distant date. Then even our workers may be ready to let supply and demand play its part in fixing wage rates.

Since you and I do not seem to see the price-building problem eye to eye, I have looked around to see what I have written that sets forth the process as I understand it, and have, therefore, clipped the enclosure from the Voice of Liberty for January 1942. This article contains a knock on silver, but that ought not to spoil it for you. In fact, it ought to help, for I am satisfied that if the silver industry was wisely led, it would work for gold for money to enlarge and stabilize its silver market, if for no other reason.

I am very much concerned that Congress shall not neglect the money question until it is too late to save the dollar. The Economists' Monetary Policies Committee, in their last report, say it sells for a nickel in China. If we don't watch our step, its purchasing power here will be little more before it hits bottom.

I hope there is yet a chance to reinstate supply and demand control in lieu of managed money. If you want to use anything I have written, with or without credit, go ahead; or if I can be of any service by spending a week or two in Washington, don't hesitate to call on me for whatever you think I am good for.

Yours very truly

E. S. PILLSBURY.

MR. E. S. PILLSBURY,
Century Electric Co.,
St. Louis, Mo.

DEAR MR. PILLSBURY: Ever since receipt of your letter of February 9 which has been uppermost in my correspondence preference file, I have been endeavoring to find the time to study the plans proposed in the data which accompanied your letter, and make an appropriate reply.

It is reassuring to find that thoughtful people—many with wide business experience—are giving their time and attention to the solution of post-war problems. I still adhere to my original idea that what this country needs is a good sound, workable, adequate monetary system and a system of laws, impartially enforced to protect business and enterprise from the restrictions imposed by unfair competition and unfair business practices. I know that the plan I have proposed raises controversial issues, but my chief interest in the money question is in the kind of currency system which I have described. No matter what its characteristics are, if you can convince me that it will embody the principles enumerated, I shall be pleased to join with you in an effort to secure its adoption.

The matter of protecting competition to bring the law of supply and demand into play by fostering free enterprise, and the elimination of unfair business practices and unfair competition will raise no end of controversial questions; but, after all, the provisions of economic law must be brought into play if we are to have a fair and equitable adjustment of the price structure in this country.

In closing, I wish that I might have been able to find the time to go into the several issues presented in your letter and discuss them in more detail.

With best wishes for your personal success and our country's continual advancement, I am

Sincerely yours,

COMPTON I. WHITE,
Member of Congress.

CENTURY ELECTRIC CO.,

Hon. COMPTON I. WHITE,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am enclosing an article entitled "Free Enterprise," answering Mr. Wallace, which I think covers some ground fairly well. I hope you will find time to study it.

A friend sent me copy of a brochure which Francis H. Brownell is sending out entitled "Hard Money." Doubtless you also have received a copy. Mr. Brownell advocates international bimetallism. He reasons as follows:

"When the price of both silver and gold is pegged, as gold formerly was pegged, fluctuations in the market price of both metals become impossible regardless of increases or decreases of their production."

We all know that a very considerable proportion of both silver and gold produced is used in the arts. I don't know what percentage, and Mr. Brownell, who provides many useful statistics, does not tell us. He does state that somewhat less than half of the world's stock of silver is monetary, so we may assume that something like half of the product goes into use in the arts. Let us suppose that lending governments agree that 1 ounce of silver is to constitute a dollar; also that 1 ounce of gold is to constitute $35. Now let us suppose that after getting into operation with these bimetallic coinages, when things have gotten settled down and business has become active, the silver manufacturers are unable to get, at these prices, enough silver from the silver refiners to meet their requirements. What will they do? Will they not start melting silver coin? After they have melted all of the coin they can get their hands on, w]'l they not raise the price? When the price has been raised, say 50 percent, which is conservative considering that silver has sold at from 25 cents to $1.375 per ounce, a ratio of 1 to 5½, since World War No. 1. Will we not be back on the single gold standard with even our fractional silver gone into the melting pot?

Let us suppose, on the other hand, that as time progresses, in lieu of a shortage of silver, a surplus develops, so that governments find a lively demand for gold but are overstocked with silver. Why should the people pay debts with gold, that is scarce, when silver is abundant, and will do the job just as well. All of the experience of the past shows that the more valuable coinage goes into hiding and domestic business, in general, is done in measurements based on the value of the least valuable coinage available.

In another connection, Mr. Brownwell says: "There can be no doubt that it is just as feasible to peg the price of silver as that of gold." To be sure, a government can peg its currency to either silver or gold, but the same government cannot peg its currency to both silver and gold at the same time. If it does, the Gresham law applies and values will be measured in terms of the least valuable coinage or standard. The better one may continue to function in international trade by weight, or it may go into hiding or hoarding, depending upon conditions.

From our former conversations, I feel sure that you will agree with my conclusions relative to this bimetallic money proposition, so I am sending a copy of this letter to Mr. Brownell. I hope you will also write to him. I feel sure that I am right in my analysis. If I am, it is unfortunate that so good company is not alined up on the right side of this important matter; especially now, when a sound monetary policy was never worse needed.

Yours very truly,

E. S. PILLSBURY.

MAY 23, 1944.

Mr. E. S. PILLSBURY,
Century Electric Co.,
St. Louis, Mo., U. S. A.

DEAR MR. PILLSBURY: I was much interested in your letter of May 15 to Hon. COMPTON I. WHITE, copy of which you were good enough to send me.

If your suggestion, that the arts and silver manufacturers will need so much silver that ultimately they will melt down all the coin and raise the price above anything fixed by the Government should ever eventuate, it is true we would then be back on the single gold standard. So far in the history of the world, the use of silver in the arts has not exceeded one-third of the annual production, on the average. It is conceivable, of course, that the remaining two-thirds would be demanded, but it is so highly improbable as to pass out of the realm of serious consideration.

The same problem can be posed as to gold which, like silver, is used in the arts.

Evidently I failed to get over to you the principle of international bimetallism and pegging the price of both gold and silver. You say, "the same government cannot peg its currency to both silver and gold at the same time." This is exactly what I contend it can and should do. Former bimetallism failed after England pegged—that is, fixed—the price of gold at an unvarying level but did not peg the price of silver, which continued to vary in price and therefore permitted operation of the so-called Gresham law. This drove the world to the single gold standard. The physical quantity of gold having proven to be insufficient and the entire world being off the gold standard at the present time, as well as off the silver standard, it would seem an opportune time to those who believe in hard money to correct the former evils of bimetallism. This can be done by pegging the price of silver as well as the price of gold, just as England stood ready to buy all gold that might be offered at £3 17s. 9d. and to sell all the gold that might be required at the same price plus a little less than 3 cents in United States money.

The price of gold remained between those levels for a period of nearly 100 years.

Similarly, if the United States and Great Britain, or even the United States alone, were to agree to buy all gold offered at $35 and sell all gold required at, say, $35.03 per ounce, and to buy all silver that was offered at, say for example, $1 per ounce and sell all silver desired at not over $1.03 per ounce, there could be no variation in the prices of either gold or silver that would affect their relationship as money.

The object of having a slightly higher selling price is not only to bear the expenses of the transactions, but also to permit the trade demands for both gold and silver to satisfy themselves by paying slightly more than the Government buying price. They would not pay more than the Government selling price, because Government metal would be available at that selling price.

I think if you follow out carefully this thought of pegging the price of both metals, all your fears of operation of the Gresham law and of one metal driving out the other will vanish into thin air.

Yours truly,

F. H. BROWNELL.

Mr. FRANCIS M. BROWNELL,
Chairman of the Board, American Smelting and Refining Co.,
New York, N. Y.

DEAR MR. BROWNELL: Yours of May 23 at hand. Thank you for your views on the use of more than a single metal as a unit of value. Since you have been so gracious, I will reciprocate as I also appreciate an opportunity to have the problem studied from my viewpoint.

For the purposes of this discussion, we will divide currency into two classes, as follows:

A. A coinage having its value based on the intrinsic worth of its metallic content, and certificates nearly enough duplicative to substitute for said coin.

B. Currency then gets its value from Government connection, promise or management, without definite tie-up to a class A or equivalent coinage.

Those who aline up for "hard money" thereby recognize the inferiority of class B money since there is nothing to justify the large expenditure involved in providing class A money if class B money, costing next to nothing, is just as good.

The next question would seem to be: Will we get class A money by pegging the dollar to two coinages of different metals? The answer is: According to Gresham's law, we will, but not in terms of both metals but in terms of the less valuable. The metal of higher value will promptly disappear from money markets and be traded in in the bullion market in terms of the lower priced metal, or shipped abroad to be traded in by the ounce, which will leave the lower priced metal to become the sole medium of exchange and measure of value for domestic trade.

If there is one fact that has been demonstrated more conclusively than any other, it is that no two commodities can be expected to remain at a fixed ratio of value for any considerable period of time. It follows that whatever ratio government selects for such metals, as silver and gold, they will not stay long at government's figure. It follows that people will not sell government both silver and gold at predetermined prices when in the bullion market one has become worth more than the government price. In your brochure you show that since World War No. 1, an ounce of gold has bought, at some dates, up to five and one-half times as much silver as it has bought on other dates.

Forty-eight years ago this month William J. Bryan got the Presidential nomination as a result of his harangue against "crucifying the world on a cross of gold." Much water has run over the dam since, inclusive of the demonetization of gold by all the nations on earth except a few small South African producer states, and yet gold is still the outstanding unit for measuring values all over the world.

If there is one thing that the experience of these 48 years ought to teach, it would seem to be that money metals get their values from their nature and the uses found for them, and not from government fiat or management.

In your letter you state a proposition as follows:

"If the United States and Great Britain, or even the United States alone, were to agree to buy all gold offered at $35 and sell all gold required at, say, $35.03 per ounce, and to buy all silver that was offered at, say, for example, $1 per ounce, and sell all silver desired at not over $1.03 per ounce, there could be no variation in the prices of either gold or silver that would affect their relationship as money."

Uncle Sam did the equivalent of what you propose for many years, except that the ratio between silver and gold was 16 to 1. However, because silver advanced to, say, 15 to 15½ to 1 relative to gold, the public melted up or got away with nearly all silver coin as fast as it was put into circulation.

A quarter is often called "two bits" in the Midwest. That expression has come down to us for decades when fractional silver was hard to get in sufficient volume to make change, so quarters were cut into halves and each half passed as a "bit."

In the above proposal, if, as the years go by, the value of an ounce of silver should come to be less than the value of one thirty-fifth ounce of gold, silver would soon come to be our sole unit of value. No one would sell an ounce of gold to government for money that represented 35 ounces of silver when he could sell his gold for, say, 40 ounces of silver in the open market. Government would thus get only silver, while gold would be bought and sold in open market in terms of silver, and silver would become our sole unit of value.

It follows that the above scheme is not one to bring about the circulation of two monetary metals but to measure in terms of whichever of two metals, for the time being, happens to be in least demand at the predetermined ratio. This conclusion, of course, presupposes adherence to a free economy. If government pressure is to be exerted, the money becomes clas. B, and most anything can be made to circulate.

It is my opinion that if private enterprise is to be saved from the bureaucrats and a free economy reestablished, we shall have to return to the use of class A money, the only kind capable of generating supply and demand prices, especially of correcting the many wage rates and scales that have been badly muddled during the years since we have depended on debt-based currency.

I am enclosing a brochure entitled "Private Enterprise and the Role of Money," from which you will see that I think we are in danger of a monetary crack-up if we continue indefinitely expanding our currency.

Yours very truly,

E. S. PILLSBURY.

DEAR SIR: I sent a copy of my May 15 letter to you to Mr. Brownell and received a very gracious reply. (Copy enclosed.) I am also enclosing a copy of my answer to Mr. Brownell. I am doing this because of the importance of this question and because I am gratified to receive so frank a discussion from him and hope he will try to argue this to a conclusion.

Mr. Brownell is a lawyer and may have gotten his leaning toward silver in studying the case from the viewpoint of his clients' direct interest. However that may be, I am of the opinion that large corporations such as the one he heads, as well as all of us, have more to gain by getting the Nation's monetary and financial problems on a sound basis, than by creating an artificial market for a byproduct like silver, for which there is found to be a pretty good market, anyway, after the world's finances are gotten back on a sound basis.

Some one sent me a Senate document entitled, "'Hard Money' Examined," by Herbert M. Bratter, which discusses Mr. Brownell's arguments for hard money at considerable length. I have not studied it enough to comment except to state that the discussion does not seem to me to be on a broad enough line to get very far.

In addition to a copy of my correspondence with Mr. Brownell, we are including copy of my latest leaflet, Private Enterprise and the Role of Money, a copy of which I am mailing to Members of Congress.

"The next question would seem to be: Will we get class A money by pegging the dollar to two coinages of different metals? The answer is: According to Gresham's law, we will, but not in terms of both metals but in terms of the least valuable. The metal of higher value will promptly disappear from money markets and be traded in in the bullion market in terms of the lower priced metal, or shipped abroad to be traded in by the ounce, which will leave the lower priced metal to become the sole medium of exchange and measure of value for domestic trade."

My pamphlet, Hard Money, evidently did not express its idea clearly enough. It does not propose pegging the dollar to two coinages of different metals.

What it proposes is that the prices of gold and silver each should be pegged in the way it describes. The dollar would be alternatively so many grains of gold and so many grains of silver. The market price of the number of grains of gold and the market price of the number of grains of silver would then always be identical. As a consequence, I said, at the foot of page 17 of Hard Money:

"When the price of both silver and gold is pegged, as gold formerly was pegged, fluctuations in the market price of both metals become impossible, regardless of increases or decreases in their production, just as happened in the case of gold. Gresham's law would have no chance to operate, for the market price of neither one of the two metals would move out of line either with its mintage ratio or the ratio of each to the other."

I suggest you reread the discussion of this subject on pages 13 to 20 of the pamphlet. Am sorry that I did not state it clearly enough for you to get the idea in the first place.

Yours truly,

FRANCIS H. BROWNELL.

DEAR SIR: I enclose copy of Mr. Brownell's reply of the 9th to my letter of earlier date, copy of which I sent to you. I am also enclosing my answer to this last letter of Mr. Brownell's.

Thank you for giving these arguments the careful consideration that I know you will.

Yours very truly,

Mr. F. H. BROWNELL,

New York, N. Y.

Dear Mr. BROWNELL: Yours of the 9th instant at hand. I think I have now gotten your viewpoint. You consider that when Government says that either A grains of gold or X times A grains of silver shall constitute a legal dollar, and where Government backs this up by buying and selling these metals at these figures, with no limitation on the quantity, then the people will accept such Government fiat and practice as the equivalent of a market price for the metals involved, and will proceed to mine, refine, and trade in them at the fixed prices, without other consideration.

I spent more time than I would like to admit trying to frame an answer to that, then I looked for what others had done and find the following from Dr. Walter E. Spahr:

"The bimetallic standard offers little prospect of becoming an important contender to replace gold as an international standard. Although bimetallists have contended, and a few still contend, that if all nations would adopt bimetallism then an international bimetallic standard could exist and function effectively, the contention cannot be supported by evidence. The contention rests upon logic, guessing, and wishful thinking—nothing more.

"The world has never had an international system of bimetallism. During the periods when important nations legally had bimetallic monetary standards, these standards actually became either gold or silver, depending upon the relationship between mint and market ratios. Each metal tended to flow to the country where its purchasing power was greatest, and the metal which entered foreign trade tended to be the international standard at that time for the countries involved. Thus both gold and silver were used together and separately in settling international debts, but not at a fixed legal ratio as such a ratio would exist in a country having a bimetallic system.

"In essence, the world's experiences with bimetallism, and especially the Latin Monetary Union's attempt to employ it, reveal that bimetallism has accomplished little if anything more than to delay progress toward international monetary uniformity—a common international monetary standard."

If it were up to me to add anything to support Dr. Spahr's conclusion with reference to the bimetallism theory which you apparently hold, I would say that the theory attributes too much power to government fiat. To be sure, governments often make their notes circulate when they inspire anything but confidence, but that is because no practical alternative is available. In this theory, we have an alternative in the two metals, yet you assume that the people will forget to look around and find out which of these two kinds of money is procurable with the least effort. Well, as Dr. Spahr says, there is nothing in the record to back up any such conclusion.

Dr. Spahr's last proposition appeals to me—"a common international monetary standard." If the world agrees upon a standard, I have no doubt that our Nation will accept such at home as well as for foreign trade, nor that such a metallic standard would be of incalculable value to us in getting our monetary practices and finances on a sounder basis.

There can be no question that silver provides the best token money the world knows anything about. It is no less true that it provides the best real money available to a large percentage of the world's inhabitants. With two fields like those available, the wonder to me is that those especially interested in silver do not proceed to cultivate them intensively in lieu of scouring around in fields where at least one other metal has an edge on silver, from most any viewpoint.

Yours very truly,

E. S. PILLSBURY.

Mr. E. S. PILLSBURY,
Century Electric Co., St. Louis, Mo.

DEAR MR. PILLSBURY: Your letter discussing the money question and copies of your correspondence with Mr. Francis H. Brownell on the subject have been awaiting an opportunity for me to discuss the issue more fully. No better approach to this subject can be made than the statement found in the historic 6-day speech by Senator John Paul Jones, made in the Senate, when he said, "In all the attempts at fundamental discussion, it is necessary first to clear the ground of such obstacles as tradition or ignorance may have placed in the pathway of progress."

The assumption of both yourself and Mr. Brownell as to pegging (fixing) the price of either gold or silver is beside the issue. What we have under consideration is the money function and not the price of any special commodity, a function that in organized society establishes the price of all commodities or, broader still, of all things.

The money problem was met and solved by the framers of our Government when the Nation was first established, when it was found necessary to provide the people with a monetary system. In order to meet the requirements for the three functions of money, (1) a measure of value, (2) a medium of exchange, and (3) a storage of wealth; a simple plan of coining gold and silver, based on the metric system, was adopted and put into operation. Gold and silver were not pegged in price; on the contrary, the Congress decreed that a given weight of gold and a given weight of silver of standard fineness was the unit of money wherever these metals existed. The mints simply put the Government guaranty on the metal as to its quantity and fineness.

"Congress, by 'an act establishing a mint and regulating the coins of the United States,' approved April 2, 1792, exercised its constitutional power by establishing a mint and authorizing the coinage of gold, silver, and copper coins, and placed gold and silver on a perfect equality, and gave to each unlimited coinage, and to the coins of each full legal tender in all payments, the gold coins to be eagles, half eagles, and quarter eagles of the declared value of ten, five, and two and one-half dollars, respectively 11 parts pure gold to 1 of alloy; and the silver coin to be dollars or units, half dollars, quarter dollars, dimes, and half dimes, and made them all a full legal tender in payment of any and all sums.

"The weight of the gold in one dollar if coined would have been 27 grains standard and 24.75 pure, and the weight of the silver in the dollar or unit was 416 grains standard and 371¼ grains pure."

This plan gave to this new nation a monetary system which provided for the automatic control and gradual increase of the money volume, a principle of economic law which is indispensable to the stability of the value of money. This control was accomplished by limiting the volume of money to the supply of the precious metals—gold and silver—which is estimated to increase in volume at the rate of 3 percent per year and roughly keeps pace with the growth of population and commerce, which also is estimated to increase 3 percent a year. By this plan of opening the mint to the unlimited coinage of both gold and silver, there was automatically provided the necessary increase in the money volume to supply the needs of the Nation's growing population and commerce.

To anyone with a knowledge of history it is unnecessary to call attention to the progress and expansion of our country when this bimetallic system of money was in use or to enumerate the acquisitions of additional territory—Louisiana, Florida, Texas, California, and the Oregon country—during the period of our Nation's greatest development. This monetary system worked well until the country was overtaken by the disaster of the Civil War. In this emergency national-bank currency was invented and the National Bank Act became law. This new monetary plan gave an advantage to the bankers by the use of their paper money, a plan that gave rise to the agitation which resulted in the demonetization of silver, thereby increasing the need and use of bank-note money.

The history of the long controversy and struggle over the national-monetary policy, with the attendant financial depressions and the legislation that placed the price of silver on a commodity basis which has been followed in recent times by demonetizing gold and pegging the price of that metal on a commodity basis, is too well known to be repeated here.

The fluctuating financial and business conditions in recent years have clearly demonstrated the instability of our currency and the unworkability of our present monetary system. It would be difficult to present a more convincing and positive demonstration of the failure of our national monetary system than that which the people of this country have recently experienced.

Speaking of price—the value of money is established by its purchasing power in obtaining goods and services which will vary with the volume of supply and demand of the things to be bought. The principles of economic law which control the operation of the money function are as simple as they are controlling.

In order to have prosperous business conditions, the volume of money must be adequate to the needs of business, and the value of money must be stable. To have a stable value, the volume of money must be regulated to increase evenly with growth of population and commerce. The volume of money can be automatically controlled by accepting and minting gold and silver as money as fast as these metals are produced.

The volume of money must be controlled if the value of currency is to be stable. By discarding silver and demonetizing gold this country has substituted a managed currency system for the time-tested automatically controlled coinage system. Under this managed-currency system the money needs of the country are supplied by banks in making loans of Federal Reserve note paper currency. The limitation on bank loans and the obligation to pay interest for the use of bank money is relied upon to limit the control of the volume of money in circulation and with certain limiting safeguards exercised by the Federal Reserve bank is, under normal conditions, an effective deterrent to inflation. But once the business equilibrium is upset by the disturbance of business confidence, the financial machinery provided under a managed-currency system to supply the money function is thrown out of adjustment and thereby cuts off the supply of money and credit when money is most needed to support and stabilize the national economy—a deflationary condition which causes prices to fall and business to stagnate.

History demonstrates that the most dependable, workable plan to supply and control the money function is obtained by the use of the precious metals, gold and silver.

The use of a currency system based on stored gold as security for the issuance of bank credit and currency as the means of providing the Nation with a stable monetary system is a demonstrated failure. This country has no more to gain by deposit of gold on a commodity basis as security for the issuance of bank credit and currency at interest to supply the Nation's money needs, than it would by the deposit of a quantity of spirituous liquor of equal value as security for the issuance of bank credit and currency. The advantage should be on the side of spirituous liquor since it increases in value with age.

In making a choice between the automatic controlled money system, using gold and silver coinage, and a managed paper currency system, if you find that the control of volume of money must be effected by the collection of interest on the money in circulation, and decide on a managed-currency system, then let us have the money issued by the Government and the interest collected by the Government for the good of all the people, instead of this interest yield going to a group of privileged bankers.

In deciding between these money plans, remember that the gold and silver money of our forefathers, without any commodity value being placed on either metal, except the purchasing power of the dollar in the market place, got for us all the broad land and the abundance of natural resources which we have utilized to make the United States of America the greatest Nation on earth.

Sincerely yours,

COMPTON I. WHITE,
Member of Congress.

Bureau of Reclamation Inventory of Western Projects for Post-war Construction

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. CARL T. CURTIS

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to insert a statement by Harry W. Bashore, Commissioner of the Bureau of Reclamation, United States Department of the Interior, before the subcommittee on Roads and Reclamation of the Senate Committee on Post-war Economic Planning and Policy.

The statement was made in connection with an inventory by the Bureau of Reclamation of western irrigation and multiple-purpose projects for post-war construction. I emphasize this presentation because it represents one of the first direct constructive outlines of an economical method of providing speedy employment for returning servicemen on permanent improvements in the 17 Western States.

As a citizen of Nebraska, which is partly in the twilight zone between the humid and arid areas, I recognize the tremendous value of water conservation for assured agricultural production, and I believe that everyone should recognize that water conservation for irrigation and flood control should be one of the first orders of business for the Nation after the war is won.

Commissioner Bashore's statement is as follows:

Mr. Chairman, the report which I am making to you this morning presents an inventory of irrigation and multiple-purpose projects that are suitable for post-war construction in the 17 Western States.

The construction of many of the projects listed could be scheduled for timely widespread employment of returning servicemen and industrial workers. This work would be at project sites in the West and in the producing centers where the needed equipment and materials are manufactured.

Permanent settlement on new lands would be made possible. Productivity of lands now irrigated with undependable water supplies would be made secure.

The inventory is based upon field investigations and studies that the Bureau of Reclamation has been carrying on under the reclamation law enacted by the Congress in 1902. The national irrigation policy that was adopted in that act has for its purpose the development of the arid and semiarid regions of the country through the conservation of their limited water resources. The Federal reclamation program is the present-day counterpart of the homestead activities of the nineteenth century when the Nation's frontiers were moved westward.

In this area the rainfall is inadequate for agriculture. Water conservation for irrigation is indispensable for the production of crops and for support of a growing population. The people on irrigated farms and the cities and towns that rise on the commerce created by irrigated agriculture, exercise purchasing power that draws the products of the other 31 States in the Middle West, South, and East.

Western markets create national wealth and stimulate employment. It is Reclamation's job to provide the irrigation water that gives stability to western purchasing power. This purchasing power is threatened in many irrigated areas that are faced with water shortages.

Along with irrigation water supplies for new land and existing agricultural areas, Reclamation projects provide hydroelectric energy for industrial expansion, particularly the extraction of western mineral resources and the processing of agricultural products. The projects also provide flood control, stream regulation, municipal water, recreation facilities, and fish and wildlife conservation.

Multiple uses of the project facilities broaden the financial base of the irrigation developments, which must by law repay to the Government their proper share of the construction costs. Power installations increase the revenues that will accrue directly to the United States Treasury and make many projects financially feasible.

The inventory presented today lists by States 236 individual projects and small groups of miscellaneous developments. Thirty-nine of these projects or features of them have been authorized, and limited work on many is going forward under the war-food or war-power programs of the Bureau of Reclamation.

Construction could be accelerated on the authorized projects, and work could be opened up on some of the potential projects within fairly short notice, if advance funds and authority are provided. Under such a schedule, nearly 150,000 men could be employed at the sites of construction in the West within 9 months. Even a greater number could be engaged in the manufacture of equipment and other materials in industries in sections of the country distant from the project areas.

The completion of all of the projects in the inventory would furnish employment equivalent to one and one-fourth million men working for 1 year. Of this total, nearly 56 percent, or 698,000, would be at work principally in the 31 States of the Mississippi Valley and to the eastward. This work would be in mines, mills, and factories, and in transportation. The remaining 44 percent, or 553,000 men, would be engaged in the actual construction work scattered widely over the western half of the country.

A total of 135,000 irrigated farms would be created for settlement by war veterans and others. Security could be afforded 150,000 additional farms where production is threatened by lack of water. A population of 2,500,000 persons, including the families in cities and towns who service the irrigation farmers, would eventually be directly benefited by the developments. These results, charted in the inventory, would flow from the irrigation of 6,705,000 acres of land now unused and 9,264,000 acres now farmed with inadequate water.

The multiple-purpose projects would provide for 1,765,000 kilowatts of power installations in authorized projects and for 2,579,000 kilowatts of firm power in addition to aid in balancing the agricultural development of the West by industrial expansion.

Annual purchasing power of the West for products of the Midwest, East, and South would be increased $1,250,000,000 at pre-war prices by the full development of these new farms and the communities that they would serve. This figure is based on studies of a typical reclamation project west of the Continental Divide, which shows that a large part of the irrigation farmer's crop dollar goes to the manufacturers and agricultural areas east of the Mississippi River for goods not produced in irrigated regions.

The aggregate costs of the projects are estimated at $2,952,393,000, at 1940 price levels. Of this amount, the actual construction would require $2,670,000,000. The pay rolls at the sites would call for approximately $800,000,000. The expenditures for labor "behind the lines," principally in the 31 States outside the irrigation belt, would, be nearly twice the amount to be spent in the actual construction work, according to an analysis of the distribution by the Bureau of Labor Statistics. Most of the remainder would be spent to purchase necessary materials and to defray transportation and other costs.

The difference between the actual construction cost and the over-all expenditures is estimated by the experts of the Bureau of Labor Statistics at $282,393,000. This amount, roughly 9 percent of the over-all figure, would be absorbed by Federal and State taxes, licenses, insurance, and other incidental charges.

The inventory recognizes the projects listed in the initial phase of the comprehensive plan for the development of the Missouri River Basin which is being printed in Senate Document 191. Other projects in the Missouri River Basin are under study and may be used in contemplated revisions of this inventory.

Some projects included in the State lists are parts of comprehensive plans being developed for other river basins including the Colorado in the Pacific Southwest, the Columbia in the Northwest, the Sacramento-San Joaquin in California, and the Rio Grande.

One-fourth of the estimated over-all costs of the projects in the inventory or about $793,000,000 is represented by the construction expenditures which are necessary to complete the developments that the Bureau of Reclamation has been authorized to construct. The greater part of the funds now available for this class of projects will be expended in wartime construction.

Among these authorized projects are such outstanding developments as the Gila in Arizona, the Columbia Basin in Washington to be irrigated from Grand Coulee Dam, the Heart Mountain division of the Shoshone project, and the Riverton project in Wyoming, the Central Valley in California, and the Colorado-Big Thompson in Colorado. In proportion the post-war employment and permanent benefits from the completion of these authorized projects would be as great as is expected from the completion of all developments in the inventory. But the direct employment would not be as widespread through the 17 Western States or in the country at large as from the larger and more comprehensive undertakings that I have outlined.

In my opinion a post-war reclamation program should be an even more substantial step toward the full use of the western water resources for irrigation and multiple purposes than is now possible under the limitations of the authorized projects.

You may ask why irrigation is necessary in this region which represents about one-half of the continental area of the United States.

I point to a map which shows how the United States is divided into two parts by the 20-inch rainfall line which roughly follows the one-hundredth meridian. To the east of this line, running as far as the ninety-seventh meridian, lies what is commonly referred to as the subhumid belt. In this belt rainfall is erratic. Although for many years precipitation was regarded as adequate for crop production, agriculturalists now recognize that frequently insufficient rainfall spells serious losses for those farmers who are not within an irrigation project. To the west of the one-hundredth meridian the rainfall generally is insufficient for crops. In areas where the total annual precipitation might be nearly sufficient, it does not come during the growing season when it is needed.

Except for the high mountains and the strip along the northern Pacific coast, less than 20 inches of rain can be expected in a normal year. The great areas shown on the map as receiving 15 inches or less of rainfall are truly arid. In the Pacific Southwest, including some sections of Arizona and southern California, the rainfall is less than 5 inches annually. These are deserts.

In the 750,000,000 acres of land in the arid and semiarid regions of these States, which are possibly tillable, there is water that can be conserved economically to irrigate about 43,000,000 acres. This latter area is the maximum that could be brought under cultivation and it is about twice the total acreage that is now served by all irrigation systems, both private and Federal.

The development of the 21,000,000 acres now under irrigation has been a gradual process. The transformation of western deserts and sagebrush lands into thriving farms that are now the main support of an area with a population of more than 15,000,000 people began with the settlement of the Mormons in Utah in 1847. As the receding frontier drew the American people westward, they came upon these arid and semiarid regions, trapped the waters for fur, explored the mountains for metals, and cut into the forests, but they passed rapidly over the deserts. They crossed miles upon miles of arid land hoping to find fresh fields. They pressed onward until they realized that it was upon these deserts that the foundation of a permanent civilization in the West must be built. They then began the easy stream diversions and irrigated the valleys and the benches near the smaller rivers. Gradually the irrigation systems became more complicated. Finally, the unregulated flow of the streams became insufficient for the needs of developments relying upon them, and storage works were required.

By the turn of the present century, about 10,000,000 acres of land had been put under irrigation. It was at about this point that the Federal Government became concerned about the need for water conservation in the West and the reclamation law of 1902 was enacted under the sponsorship of the late President Theodore Roosevelt. Its policy was designed to conserve and use the waters of the West for the development of the vast areas of public land to which the Government had title. The increasing population of the West made it necessary to provide for the support of a larger number of people than could be sustained by the meager agricultural resources then existing. These resources rested on the limited irrigation expansion and on the small volume of crops which could be wrested from the dry lands without the artificial application of moisture.

The Federal Government's entry into the field of reclamation stimulated irrigation developments. Since 1900 the total area under irrigation has increased from 10,000,000 to 21,000,000 acres. Since 1930 the irrigation expansion has been almost entirely under the auspices of the Bureau of Reclamation. This is because the complexities of modern water conservation systems are beyond the ability of private capital to finance. These complexities include the necessity for great storage works, as well as the need for multiple-purpose projects to assure maximum use of the water for irrigation, power production, municipal water supplies, and other purposes.

As every storage dam on a western river aids stream regulation, so also does each contribute to flood control. Federal ownership of more than half of the land area of the 11 far Western States, and the interstate characteristics of the water supply of many potential projects are other factors which make water conservation and irrigation in the West subject to legislative action of the Congress.

Bureau of Reclamation projects are now serving more than 4,000,000 acres. Half of this area was carved out of the desert and is now in prosperous farms. The remainder is land that was originally irrigated by private capital but had inadequate water supplies before the Federal systems came to its rescue.

Through the multiple-purpose developments, the Bureau projects have power installations of more than 2,200,000 kilowatts which this year will produce over 13,000,000,000 kilowatt-hours of electric energy largely for war industries that are vital to the Nation. These installations will likewise serve peacetime requirements. Hydroelectric power is the principal source of energy in the West and water conservation for this purpose is vital. Water stored in reclamation reservoirs also serves industries and municipalities.

The wartime contributions of irrigated land to the Nation's food supplies have been fully demonstrated. The War Food Administration has recognized the possibilities on reclamation lands for war-food purposes and 24 projects recommended by the War Food Administration have been cleared by the War Production Board for construction by the Bureau of Reclamation.

Federal reclamation projects alone in 1943 produced potatoes for annual rations of 25,000,000 people, beans for 57,000,000, and enough alfalfa and grain for beef and dairy herds to supply 11,000,000 people with meat and dairy products for 1 year.

Many outstanding examples of western developments which have been stimulated by Federal reclamation could be cited. The Salt River Valley in Arizona is outstanding, as are also the Yakima Valley in Washington, the Boise Valley in Idaho, and the North Platte project area in Nebraska and Wyoming. When the projects under construction, as distinguished from those in the entire inventory, are completed, reclamation service will be extended to a total of 12,000,000 acres. The power installations will be increased to more than 4,000,000 kilowatts.

From a population standpoint, the West has outstripped its agricultural production upon which it is dependent. In the first 30 years of the present century, the West grew more rapidly than the remainder of the country. The rate was three times as fast. From 1930 to 1940, the population growth was twice the national rate. The West under the stress of wartime migrations showed an even greater expansion from 1940 to 1943. It was the only one of the four major regions of the country to show an increase in population. It gains was 8.5 percent, while every other major region lost from 3.4 to 5.7 percent. The post-war era will see the impact of this population growth intensified.

From a long-range standpoint the full development of the unused water resources of the West presents human and economic possibilities of great import to the future of the country. It means not only irrigated farms but the expansion of existing cities and towns and the creation of new communities which will provide markets at home for the products of American factories and farms. It is toward this domestic market that the productive capacity of industry should look for expansion.

Studies indicate that the conservation of the remaining water resources would assure an adequate irrigation supply for the 22,000,000 additional acres. About 11,000,000 acres now under private systems with inadequate supplies could be given security through supplemental water.

The net result that could be anticipated from the full development would be about 428,000 new irrigated farms, under present-day systems of farming. These farms would support a total additional population of more than 6,000,000 persons on the irrigated land and in the towns dependent on them.

Property values of $16,000,000,000 at pre-war levels would be created. A domestic market would be built up for American products from factories and farms outside of the irrigation belt that would maintain pay rolls at a distance, keep transportation systems busy and stabilize the business of the entire country.

The inventory that I present to you might be considered a step toward the initial phase of the ultimate development to which our sights should be raised. Further study is required on many of the potential projects, but investigations have proceeded sufficiently to show that many of them could not be authorized under existing reclamation laws and would require special authorization by the Congress. Nevertheless, the contributions that would be made to post-war reconversions and readjustments would justify consideration of a program of this magnitude. The permanency of the improvements that would be built by the men returning from the field of battle and the fleets on the high seas and in the air would add to their stake in the future of the West and in the country as a whole. In effect they would be building irrigated farm homes on which they could settle, raise their families, and live prosperously.

Report of the Republican Congressional Food Study Committee

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS A. JENKINS

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am herewith submitting a copy of a report made by the Republican Congressional Food Study Committee. This is a brief report of the wide and constructive activities of the committee:

REPUBLICAN CONGRESSIONAL FOOD STUDY COMMITTEE REPORT TO THE HONORABLE JOSEPH W. MARTIN, JR., OF MASSACHUSETTS, REPUBLICAN LEADER, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Food and feed are the most necessary of all commodities and are most essential in the successful prosecution of the war.

Because of the great necessity for food and feed, it was only natural that the New Deal's philosophy of scarcity and its tendency toward bureaucratic control would develop a chaotic condition in the production, processing, and distribution of these most necessary commodities. Confusion and chaos did develop, and the country became thoroughly aroused because of the apparent inability of the New Deal administration to handle the situation properly. The Democratic leadership in Congress closed its eyes to the serious conditions prevailing, and it remained for the Republican leadership to take action. Such action was taken, with the result that the Republican congressional food study committee was set up.

The committee proceeded immediately to its task and divided the work into the following classifications, with subcommittees to give special study to each classification:

1. Production and marketing of field crops.
2. Dairy and poultry products.
3. Livestock and meat products.
4. Distribution and rationing of food.
5. Government food purchases and lend-lease.
6. Farm machinery and farm labor.
7. Fresh and processed fruits and vegetables.
8. Fish and sea foods.

A subcommittee on compilation of reports was also set up.

The full committee consisted of 44 members. The members were selected with the idea in mind of giving fair representatior to the various sections of the country and to the various groups and industries involved.

In order to become thoroughly acquainted with the problems confronting it, the committee at the very outset held public meetings in several sections of the country. To these meetings producers, processors, distributors and consumers of food and feed were invited. The attendance was large, due to the great interest in the subjects involved. The producers presented their problems intelligently and effectively. The processors and distributors appeared through their representatives and gave most interesting and convincing testimony. Consumers were also present in large numbers to present their views. There was universal condemnation of the administration's arrogant and unreasonable enforcement of conflicting and confusing directives and Executive orders in rationing and price ceilings on food, feed, and other commodities.

Meetings were held in Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Minneapolis, Princeton, and other places. Several meetings were held in Washington, which were addressed by men of great prominence and men whose knowledge of the food and feed problem was outstanding. Among these were former President Hoover, Frank Gannett, Chester Bowles, and others.

All of the activities of this committee have been carried on without 1 cent of expense to the Federal Government or to the taxpayers.

With pardonable pride we feel free to state that the work of this committee has been constructive from the beginning and has brought to the people and the industries of the country much relief that they would not otherwise have received. We cannot in this report detail all of the activities of the committee and cannot catalogue all the beneficial results obtained through the committee's efforts. We shall, however, recite a few of these results.

ONE MAN CONTROL

One of the distinguishing characteristics of the New Deal is that it seeks to regiment under Federal and bureaucratic control all of the industrial and human activities of the Nation. This technique was more manifest in the handling of food than in probably any other respect. At least 10 separate Government agencies assumed jurisdiction over some phases of the producing, processing, and distribution of food. These various agencies, functioning under widely different and sometimes contradictory directives and executive orders, duplicated their efforts and thereby harassed the public in many ways. The result was confusion and chaos everywhere. It was evident that the only solution for this chaotic condition was a centralization of authority in a single agency, which would then localize responsibility effectively.

From the hearings held by the committee, and from the testimony of many responsible people appearing before it, there was no question but that the American public was demanding that the control of these commodities be placed in the hands of some responsible person with full authority to act. To this end, the committee instructed me, as its chairman, to introduce a bill, known as the Jenkins bill, designated as H. R. 2739. This bill provides in effect that all food activities should be placed under a War Food Administrator within the Department of Agriculture, and that this official should proceed immediately to correlate all food activities. This would inevitably have redounded to the benefit of the consumer as well as the producer, processor, and distributor.

This bill was given great support by the people of the country, and, as proof of its merit, Representative FULMER, of South Carolina, the chairman of the House Committee on Agriculture, introduced a similar bill, H. R. 2837, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture. This great committee, which is the highest authority on agricultural and food matters in the Congress, recommended the passage of the Fulmer bill. At that time Chester Davis was occupying a high position in food administration. He was well known as a man of integrity and purpose, who was thoroughly acquainted with the food situation and had the full confidence of Congress. The Republican congressional food study committee would have endorsed his appointment. When it became evident that the Fulmer bill could pass the House, and that Chester Davis would logically be in line for appointment as Food Administrator, the President removed Chester Davis from office.

By his action in removing Chester Davis the President clearly indicated that he resented any efforts by Congress or anyone else to bring order out of the chaos in the food situation, and that he evidently intended that all problems of food and feed should be under the direct control of the White House through the numerous inefficient agencies already set up by him. This is another instance of the President's determination to hold all authority in the White House.

The demand for single agency control of the food problem free of domination has not been lessened throughout the country. The Fulmer bill is still pending before the Rules Committee and should be enacted into law. One of the first tasks of the Republicans, should the Republicans gain control of the House, should be to pass some legislation coordinating all food activities under one responsible head. The producer demands it, the processor demands it, the distributor demands it, and the consumer demands it.

BLACK MARKETS

The first hearing which was held by the committee in Boston developed the unmistakable existence of an extensive black market in poultry. At the time of this hearing the great poultry industry in the New England and Middle Atlantic States was prostrate. The activities of the black market became so bad that the United States Army in several instances was compelled to stop trucks loaded with poultry on the highways and commandeer them. The committee found that the black market is a result of the inability of the consumer to secure necessary commodities because of the Administration's actions destroying the normal channels of distribution and forcing these commodities into illegal channels. This false scarcity of poultry spread all over the country. The old Faneuil Hall Market, which has operated in Boston for more than 125 years, was without a single chicken for sale on a Saturday several months ago, and this was the first time in its existence that it had no chickens to sell. This false scarcity spread into all sections of the country, and hundreds of poultry stores were forced to close their doors and go out of business.

This condition with reference to poultry continued for several months, and all at once the country was confronted with a huge surplus of poultry. From that time on poultry has supplied the principal meat diet of the Nation.

The story of the black market in beef and pork, and in onions, fish, and other commodities, is equally as sordid as the story of poultry.

The insidious illegal black markets, with their dangerous and unwholesome influence on legitimate business, are the unmistakable result of inefficiency in administration.

These events are conclusive proof that the Administration's failure has created a great dislocation and uncertainty throughout the whole food industry.

FOOD WASTE

In addition to the information adduced at the public hearings above referred to, individual members of the committee have made exhaustive and extensive surveys which produced facts and figures with reference to tremendous spoilage and wastage of great quantities of potatoes, fresh fruits, and vegetables, eggs, milk, butter, and other important food commodities.

RELIEF TO PROCESSORS

The committee as a whole and individually has closely cooperated with food processors and trade organizations, with the result that they have been relieved of many distresses.

CONSTRUCTIVE SUGGESTIONS TO GOVERNMENT AGENCIES

As a result of constructive suggestions made by your committee to various Government agencies, many changes in policies and practices have been effected, all of which were for the relief and benefit of the producer, processor, distributor, and consumer.

CHANGES IN PRICE CEILINGS EFFECTED

The committee, through its recommendations, secured the modification of price ceilings on some commodities, with a beneficial result to all parties concerned.

DISPOSITION OF SURPLUS FOODS

The committee learned in its studies that one of the most important problems facing producers and processors of food is the distribution of huge Government surpluses. With a view to avoiding a division of responsibility in this matter, the committee prepared and Congressman JOHN PHILLIPS introduced in the House of Representatives H. R. 4275. This bill seeks to create a central agency to take over the whole problem of Government food surpluses, both those purchased by the Government for war purposes and those purchased direct from producers with the view to stabilizing prices at a parity level. This bill is now pending before the Committee on Agriculture of the House of Representatives. It is meritorious and should be enacted.

PRODUCTION PREFERABLE TO SCARCITY

In addition the committee has carried on many other activities related to the administration of the food problem, with a view to stimulating production. We hold that the best antidote to inflation is an adequate production. Surpluses of food and feed, and their adequate distribution, guarantee stability, while scarcity suggests and encourages disaster.

Appended hereto is a more detailed statement of some of the committee's work, which we hope will prove interesting and constructive to the membership of Congress and to the public generally.

Respectfully submitted.

REPUBLICAN CONGRESSIONAL FOOD STUDY COMMITTEE,
By THOMAS A. JENKINS, Chairman,
HARRIS ELLSWORTH, Secretary.

JULY 7, 1944.

The following is a partial statement in more detail of the activities of the Republican Congressional Food Study Committee:

ONE MAN CONTROL

Because of the unanimous testimony given at the public hearings held by the committee as to the chaotic conditions being created throughout the food industry by the methods of administration being applied, the committee made an investigation and study of Executive orders and directives creating some of these agencies. This report chronologically traces the history of food administration under the New Deal. It is entitled "Confusion and Chaos." Unfortunately, requests for this report by New Deal agencies of the Government have exhausted our mimeographed supply of this report, but it may be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of November 8, 1943, page 9294, where it is printed at length.

When the war broke out, the administration had full power and authority to effectively set up a Food Administration along the lines so successfully administered by ex-President Hoover, when he was War Food Administrator during World War No. 1. This authority was contained in the act of Congress dated August 29, 1916, which created the Council of National Defense. This, however, would definitely centralize full responsibility and authority in a single agency of Government, which is directly contrary to the desires of President Roosevelt, notwithstanding the will of the people.

A recommendation to this effect was definitely made by the Agricultural Division of the Advisory Commission of the Council of National Defense in July 1940, 10 months after the outbreak of war in Europe. Immediately after this recommendation was made, the Council of National Defense ceased to function as an integrated unit, for the same reason, i. e., that it centralized authority.

Contrary to these recommendations, the problem of food administration was scattered throughout many agencies, with the consequent delays, confusion, and contradictions such a course of action imposed.

The issues inherent in stimulating food production, processing and distribution, involving as they do related factors of manpower availability, labor management relationships, costs and pricing, are so closely allied to each other that a single unit of government must correlate these problems in order to provide their successful solution. The American manufacturer or businessman, who must collaborate with Government through its domination of every phase of our economic life under the present bureaucratic scheme is forced to go to one agency to asecrtain the wages he may be permitted to pay labor; to another agency to fix prices at which he may sell his product; and sometimes to a third agency to ascertain prices which he may pay for his raw materials. He must contact another division of Government to determine the manner in which he may amortize the indebtedness of his business, while still other and different agencies of Government must be contacted and then cajoled, influenced, or flattered to secure decisions on the basis of which he may operate his business.

The consequent delays caused by such pyramiding of one agency upon another, each in turn being given responsibility without authority, inevitably tends to destroy any useful purpose for which these agencies may have been created, and further complicates the whole food and feed problem to the point where detailed regimentation is an administration necessity.

The one solution of this whole problem—the one thing that will expedite administration and eliminate costly and disorganizing delays—is the centralization of the whole administration of food and feed under a single agency in the Department of Agriculture, with authority to act free from White House domination.

PUBLIC HEARINGS

The complaints against the administration of the laws and regulations with reference to the production, processing and distribution of food were so persistent that the committee deemed it advisable to give the public a chance to express itself with reference to the matter.

The first hearing was held in New York City, and was attended by many producers and their representatives, and by distributors through their representatives. The consumers were also represented by various individuals and groups.

The hearings were very informative, and the reports of the hearings, made through the press, carried all over the country and resulted in a great number of demands for hearings in different parts of the country. The representatives of the various food activities took great encouragement from the New York hearing and intensified their efforts towards relieving the situations against which their specific groups complained. The committee offered its assistance, which was gratefully received by several organizations that were vitally interested in the disordered conditions resulting from the unwise administration of the food regulations.

The hearings in Boston were attended by the State secretaries of agriculture of some of the New England States, and also by high State and city officials, who were tremendously interested in the terrible plight into which the food industry had fallen. They also evidenced a great interest and cordiality toward the activities of the committee.

As a result of the Boston hearings, the spotlight of public opinion over the country was pointed toward the plight of the poultry industry, with the result that through the combined efforts of interested parties and this committee the situation was considerably relieved. At the Boston hearing, representatives of the C. I. O. and other consuming groups were heard. These representatives indicated a desire to cooperate and were naturally interested in any program that would prevent extreme rises in the cost of living.

As a result of the Boston hearings, the representatives of wholesale production and distribution intensified their efforts in an attack on the causes of the depression in the various industries, and consequently some modifications were made that were beneficial to the various parties concerned in the production and distribution of food and feed.

A hearing was held in Philadelphia, which was attended by city officials and by a large number of representatives of various food activities. The fishermen from the New Jersey shores were present and presented a pathetic story illustrating the plight of the fishing industry. These representatives showed conclusively that because of inefficient and unwise regulations millions of pounds of fish were held from the market when meats and similar foods were in great demand.

At the Philadelphia hearing persons appeared who outlined and described the effects of unwise administration of ambiguous regulations as applied to grocery-store operators and retailers of meat products. It was authentically reported that during the week previous to this hearing, hundreds of small grocery and food shops had been forced to close their doors.

Representatives of consumer groups were eager to testify and to show conclusively that all classes of people were terrifically discommoded by unnecessary regulations, which were unwisely and arrogantly administered.

A hearing was held in Minneapolis, with the idea of giving to the dairymen and producers of wheat products an opportunity to present their views. This meeting was widely attended by influential men and women and by organizations with wide connections all through the great food producing areas of the Middle West. The plight in which the hog and cattle producers would find themselves was authentically predicted at that meeting, and likewise the serious corn situation which developed later was accurately prophesied. In spite of the certainty with which these serious dislocations developed, the administration still persisted that there would be no serious dislocations in these respects because the administration claimed they had the situation well in hand. The subsequent experience of the American people shows that the administration failed to heed the unerring signs of the times.

At the Princeton, N. J., hearings, a special effort was made to develop the sentiment with reference to fisheries and with reference to the production from small farms, which produced great quantities of eggs, garden vegetables and dairy products. Representatives of the State Department of Agriculture and of Princeton University indicated a great interest in this meeting, as did representatives of wholesale feed and food producers, and wholesalers of food and groceries of all kinds.

The Princeton meeting demonstrated conclusively that the work of the committee in holding public hearings was greatly appreciated and more than justified. This meeting had the tendency to crystallize sentiment and to sum up the food situation quite generally over the country. The shortage of feed was pathetically illustrated. Facts were produced to show that the wealth of the country had been greatly depleted by reason of the failure properly to administer the food activities of the Nation. It was demonstrated that the regulations were so expansive and so extensive as to include practically every activity of the human family, and that they were written by men who did not understand the problems of the industries involved.

The committee, through its hearings in Washington, which were addressed by the best food experts of the Nation, and by its public hearings, acquainted itself thoroughly with the problems involved and gave the public an opportunity to present their views directly to Members of Congress.

FOOD WASTE

At a time when food is rationed, one of the greatest destroyers of public morale is to find that the Government itself, through poor administration, is wasting huge quantities of food and feed. Every few days the War Food Administration is asking for bids to purchase all manner of "damaged and/or out of condition" commodities in an "as is, where is" condition. One of these invitations to purchase includes "type A enriched wheat flour, rolled oats, canned tomatoes, dried pinto beans, dried black-eyed cow peas, double white runner beans, dried white dutch runner beans," the last three items of which were insect ridden and unfit for human consumption. Another calls for bids to purchase 1,021 damaged cases of canned pears and peaches. Others cover all manner of foods for which the Nation is now rationed.

Congressman GERALD W. LANDIS, chairman of the subcommittee on fresh fruits and vegetables, cooperating with other members of the committee, has continuously carried on a thorough investigation of this growing scandal. On at least a dozen different occasions he has called attention to this situation.

Last year there was a severe shortage of potatoes throughout most of the entire Nation. Suddenly there was an excess of potatoes. The Government bought huge quantities of them and then did not know how to handle them. Thirty-seven carloads of potatoes were permitted to spoil and were dumped at Vincennes, Ind. The New Deal administrators admitted that 1½ carloads were lost. Shortly after issuing a public statement to this effect they finally reported that 22 carloads were lost at Vincennes.

At a time when American housewives were paying as much as 75 cents a peck in some areas for potatoes it was testified before the Banking and Currency Committee that the Government lost 475 carloads of potatoes, while reports were prevalent that an administrative official of the Federal Government privately admitted that more than 25 percent of the 3,200 carloads purchased from the 1943 Virginia and North Carolina crops rotted on the Government's hands.

But potatoes is only one of the many commodities wasted through ineffective and almost tragic administration. In Fresno, Calif., one producer abandoned his 200-acre pea crop and invited the public to help themselves because he could not meet the conditions imposed by the Federal administration. Thousands of cases of canned milk have spoiled in Government warehouses, one radio commentator reporting 17,000,000 cans in a single area. Poor administration was responsible for 1,900,000 pounds of rolled oats becoming infested with insects while standing in railroad cars in New Jersey. It has been reported by the press that 1,400 carloads of eggs have been sold by the Government for $30 a carload, or one-sixth of a cent a dozen, because overcrowded storage facilities made their immediate disposition necessary.

As has already been pointed out, the American farmer and the Victory gardener have both done a tremendously patriotic job, and a benevolent Nature has added to their efforts. In a time like this, however, it is almost criminal to permit such wasteful conditions to exist in a nation at war.

BLACK MARKETS

We have heretofore in our report dealt somewhat extensively with the black market in poultry. It was testified at public hearings that at that time from 75 to 90 percent of all poultry was finding its way into the black market, at prices from 38 to 42 cents a pound, when the ceiling was only 28 cents a pound.

The most flagrant black market activities were those attendant upon the distribution of beef. It is difficult to understand why this condition would prevail in face of the fact that on January 1, 1943, we had 78,000,000 head of cattle, and that on January 1, 1944 we had 82,000,000 head of cattle, which was the largest at any period in our history.

During all that time the stockyards of the nation were overcrowded with hogs and cattle for slaughter. There is no question but that the quantity of beef and pork prepared for the market was in excess of that of any previous year. The amount allocated to the armed services was not begrudged by anyone. It was not a sufficient amount to bring about such disruption as has been experienced in the distribution of beef and pork.

It is to the everlasting credit of the American people that they so patriotically accepted rationing. When they willingly gave up the privilege of purchasing beef in unlimited quantities, as they had been accustomed to do in the past, the Government obligated itself to equalize the distribution of the limited quantities available, so that every American housewife could use the ration stamps in her possession. It was a strange situation that, although the people were supplied with ration stamps which entitled them to purchase beef, there was no beef to be had; and those in charge of its administration apparently did not understand the problem sufficiently to solve it. While they were hesitating, a black market developed, with the result that neither the producer of the livestock, nor the legitimate distributor of meat, nor the consumer was benefited.

It is estimated by competent authority that huge quantities of fish and other sea foods are being diverted to the black market.

Mr. Chester Bowles, Administrator of the Office of Price Administration, publicly admitted that the black market in food amounted to $1,200,000,000 annually.

RELIEF TO PROCESSORS

The committee early found that one of the most difficult problems was caused by the lack of knowledge of those in administrative authority as to trade customs and practices. For example, it has been the custom for food processors, particularly canners, to enter into contracts and agreements with food producers in December and January concerning the price, acreage, and quantity of a given commodity to be purchased by the canners for processing. In many instances the Office of Price Administration failed to reach a conclusion as to the prices that canners would be permitted to pay producers until long after the planting season had started.

The Republican Congressional Food Study Committee actively collaborated with food processors and Government officials, with the result that in many instances governmental action was expedited to the benefit of the farmers and the canners and consequently to the ultimate consumers.

Likewise a serious problem developed from the failure of food processors to secure adequate labor, because of the low wages allowed in the canning industry. Our committee, through its efforts with Government authorities, was able to relieve that situation greatly to the benefit of labor, the processor, and the public.

The committee played a leading part in crystallizing the Republican attitude in the House of Representatives toward consumer subsidies. Its position has been fully justified by a condition which obtains in the milk industry. Subsidies were paid to milk producers, although they were opposed to subsidies, with the result that in some areas the diversion of milk to those branches of the industry resulted in an oversupply. Due to lack of refrigeration space, thousands of gallons of milk had to be dumped into sewers, while at the same time in the large milk-consuming areas there was a seriously threatening shortage of milk for home consumption.

The very important pancake flour industry was practically destroyed by Government regulations. Through the effective cooperation of this committee with the industry immediate relief was secured and the industry was restored to its normal activity.

Many instances could be cited where the committee collectively and through its individual members has brought relief to many serious situations. One further example will suffice:

Sugar is one of the six most important basic foods of this country, the other five being bread, meat, potatoes, milk, and butter. While there are abundant stocks of sugar available, the New Deal administration continues to carry out its philosophy of scarcity by producing a false scarcity of sugar.

At the outset of the war it was definitely necessary to ration sugar, both to home consumers and to commercial users, and the committee believes that it is advisable to continue rationing of sugar for many reasons. However, there is no longer any sensible purpose in requiring commercial users at this time to curtail their use of sugar to 70 percent or 80 percent of their 1941 consumption. The sugar supplies in 1942 and the first half of 1943 undoubtedly were in such jeopardy that it was necessary to curtail commercial use by bakers, confectioners, beverage manufacturers and bottlers, dairy production processors, canners, flavoring extract manufacturers, and others, to only 70 percent of the 1941 consumption, because of the forced reduction in the shipment of sugar from the Philippines, Hawaii, and the Caribbean area.

The normal carry-over of sugar from one season to another is between 1,500,000 and 2,000,000 tons. On January 1, 1944, there was a stock pile of 3,000,000 tons, and it is estimated that production available to the United States in 1944 will amount to approximately 10,000,000 tons after allowing 1,000,000 tons or its equivalent for the production of industrial alcohol.

Officials of the New Deal administration claimed that ships were not available for the importation of sugar in sufficient quantity to increase allocation to commercial users. The committee made an investigation and it found that ships were available if they were properly routed. Congressman BARTEL J. JONKMAN, chairman of the subcommittee on Government food purchases, presented all of these facts to Congress and pointed out that if only 2 10,000-ton ships out of the more than 2,000 Liberty ships now comprising the American merchant marine were assigned to import sugar from the Caribbean area, it would furnish the 20,000 tons of sugar needed each month to increase the allocation to commercial users from 70 to 80 percent of their 1941 consumption.

It was only after the spotlight of publicity was thrown on the whole matter that the administration not only sent 2 ships but diverted 19 ships to import sugar from the Caribbean area. The committee has been informed that as against the 325,000 tons of sugar imported in the month of March 1944, 400,000 tons were to be imported in April, and 350,000 tons in the month of May. Orders were then issued increasing the allocation of sugar to 80 percent for some commercial users. Since that time the requirements of the industrial alcohol program have been completed without utilizing some 800,000 tons of sugar or its equivalent for that purpose. As a matter of fact, during the month of August, industrial alcohol probably will not be manufactured at all.

The committee has recommended to the War Food Administrator that the allocation of sugar for the third quarter of 1944 to commercial users be increased to 90 percent of their 1941 consumption, and there is no logical reason why they cannot be given a full 100 percent.

The whole administration of the allocation of sugar has been subjected to the whims and fancies of administrative officials who simply appear to be carrying out the policy of regimentation and domination of American industry. As pointed out by Congressman JONKMAN on the floor of the House of Representatives: "It is a sad travesty on democratic administration of Government that, in a land where American industrial ingenuity can convert from a peacetime basis to a wartime basis without destroying the standard of living, as America has done, we cannot have in Government offices that caliber of men who can practically meet the problems our wartime economy creates."

VICTORY GARDENS

The committee strongly endorsed the planting of Victory gardens. The success of Victory gardens during the past year, which were planted in back yards, vacant lots, and public parks throughout the country, was marked. The surveys made indicate that home canning from Victory gardens amounted to an equivalent of 165,000,000 to 200,000,000 cases of canned goods, as compared with an annual average commercial pack of about 225,000,000 cases.

This huge supplemental food supply made rationing of several major canned vegetables unnecessary after December 1943, but the administration did not see fit to remove these items from rationing until June 1, 1944. It was effected then only after strong pleas were made to remove them from rationing. Home canning had so reduced the use of ration coupons for canned vegetables that the warehouses of both packers and distributors were clogged with last year's commercial pack at a time when the 1944 crops were beginning to come in.

Representatives in Washington of food processors and distributors deplore the delay of the New Deal administration in removing these canned vegetables from rationing. They advised the committee that it came too late, and that the canned fruits and vegetables have not been moved from warehouses and store shelves because fresh fruits and vegetables of the 1944 crop had already begun to reach the market.

THE O. P. A. AND THE COST OF LIVING

The Republican Party and the Republicans in Congress have loyally supported rationing and price control, especially since they have been already established. The determination of the commodities to be rationed should have called for the most honest and sincere consideration. The New Deal philosophy of scarcity should have been abandoned contemporaneously with rationing. Curtailment of production and rationing are inconsistent programs.

The Republicans have maintained that with the coming on of the war production should have been encouraged, and rationing should have been adopted only when sufficient production failed.

Threats of inflation are always present during wartime activities. The best antidote to inflation is abundance of production.

Price control is an entirely different matter from price fixing. Price control is flexible and encourages production. Price fixing is rigid and destructive of production. Rationing and price fixing as exercised by the administration has been a leveling-down process and has not been a creative or building-up process. The result is that a penalty has been placed on quality and incentive to produce the best, while a premium has been placed upon the lowering of quality and the leveling to the common grades.

There has been a conflict of opinion among economists with reference to the cost of living. There is no question but that the Government figures on the cost of living have been grossly inaccurate.

The inconvenience which the purchaser of food supplies has suffered in making purchases, and the terrific burdens added to the seller of foods have resulted in hampering the heretofore splendid methods of distribution that had been built up, all of which resulted in inferior quality of goods. This cannot be attributed to the producer, nor to the distributor, but is due absolutely to the unreasonable and unnecessary burdens placed upon the people by Government regulations. Chester Bowles testified before a congressional committee that there were 8,000,000 price regulations.

The Price Administrator and officials of his organization repeatedly have called public attention to the greater increase in prices from 1913 or 1914 to 1918 as compared with 1939 to 1943; and they further call attention to the increase in industrial production during these same periods. Examination of their own charts, graphs, and statistics indicates that the great increase in living costs during World War No. 1 were between the years 1914 and 1917. There was no price control under the Democratic administration then in office. The Price Control Act of 1917, the Lever Act, became effective on August 10, 1917, and was in effect only until the Armistice was signed on November 11, 1918, a period of 15 months. Using the year 1926 as an index base of 100, according to Department of Agriculture statistics, wholesale prices of all commodities of the Nation rose from 124.8 in August 1917 to 136.3 in November 1918, under the able administration of Herbert Hoover, with a mere handful of Government employees to administer the Price Control Act. This was an increase of 9.2 percent during the entire period that the Lever Act was in effect. During the first 15 months of the administration of price control under the present Office of Price Administration, from January 1942 to March 1943, the cost of all commodities rose from 96.0 to 102.5, or an increase of 7.7 percent. If proper consideration would be given to the inferior quality of foods, the increase percentage would be much higher.

In other words, after building a Government bureaucracy of hundreds of thousands of employees, the present administration has been able to affect a savings of only 1.5 percent more than that brought about by Mr. Hoover's administration of the same problems in World War No. 1, according to Government statistics. This saving of 1.5 percent has been completely lost in black market operations, which were nonexistent during World War No. 1. Mr. Bowles publicly estimated that between 3 percent and 4 percent of the average cost of food purchased is in black-market operations. He stated, "That means that housewives today are paying $1,200,000,000 to the black market in food alone."

If our total food bill is about $30,000,000,000 annually, this means that there is an increase of 4 percent in the cast of foodstuffs that is not reflected in the official statistics that the Administrator of the Office of Price Administration furnishes to us. Thus in the first 15 months of price regulations during the present war, the cost of living has actually gone up more than it did during the 15 months that the Lever Act was in effect.

Applying these data to wholesale food prices alone, and using 1926 as the basis of our index, wholesale food prices for the month of August 1917 (when the Lever Act went into effect) was 109.4, while in November 1918 it increased to 128.6 or 17.5 percent. During the first 15 months that the present Office of Price Administration was operating, the index of wholesale food prices rose from 93.7 in January 1942 to 107.4 in March 1943, or a net increase of 14.6 percent. Adding to this the estimated 4-percent increase in the cost of foodstuffs in black-market operations, publicly admitted by Mr. Bowles, the net increase in the cost of food under the administration of the Office of Price Administration during the first 15 months of its operation was 18.6 percent, or 1.1 percent more than under the administration of the Lever Act by Mr. Hoover in World War No. 1. This does not take into account the millions of dollars paid out by the Administration in the form of subsidies.

In other testimony presented by the Price Administrator, he has repeatedly referred to the increase in production of foodstuffs by our agrarian population. Every Member of Congress should point with pride at the patriotism of the American farmer in producing the greatest crops in our history during 1942 and 1943, under the severest kind of handicaps. A benevolent Nature has aided the American farmer in producing ever-increasing crops for the past several years. Military and naval demands took hundreds of thousands of trained farm workers from the fields to serve in our armed forces. But the boys and girls and wives of our agricultural areas put forth their effort, and these stupendous crops were produced. When Mr. Bowles refers to them, to compare them with the period immediately preceding and during World War No. 1, he fails to take into account that in 1916 and 1917 the crop failures in this country were due to unseasonable elements of the atmosphere.

The truth of the matter is that from 1913 to 1918 the estimated harvested acreage of the 52 basic crops increased from 324,000,000 acres to 353,000,000 acres, while from 1938 to 1943 the increase was only from 338,000,000 acres to 347,000,000 acres. Actually, in 1943 there was less acreage under cultivation in the United States than there was in the year 1918. This decrease can only be charged against a philosophy of scarcity which has dominated this administration from 1933 right down to and including the present time.

Based on the average yield per acre of the principal field crops from 1923 to 1932 as an index figure of 100, the yield in 1917 was 100.8, and in 1918 it was 98.2; in 1942 it was 136, and in 1943 it was 124. This is an average increase for the 2 years, 1942 and 1943, of 30 percent over the yield per acre in 1917 and 1918. This certainly is a gain that cannot be attributed to the administration. It is an advance that has been brought about by the sweat of the brow, hard labor, and patriotism of the American farmer.

The decrease in the yield per acre from 136 in 1942 to 124 in 1943 can be attributed directly to the short-sighted policy to which I have already referred, which brought about a denial of adequate farm machinery and equipment to the farmer. Today the farmer needs more farm machinery and equipment than ever before to replace the trained farm help that has gone into our armed services. Yet the allocation of steel for the manufacture of farm machinery and equipment in 1944 has not yet equaled that which was produced in 1940.

The following is a list of the members of the Republican Congressional Food Study Committee: THOMAS A. JENKINS, chairman (Ohio); HARRIS ELLSWORTH, secretary (Oregon); AUGUST H. ANDRESEN (Minnesota); JAMES C. AUCHINCLOSS (New Jersey); JOSEPH C. BALDWIN (New York); FRANK A. BARRETT (Wyoming); HOWARD H. BUFFETT (Nebraska); FRED E. Funds for War Activities and Nonwar Activities

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARENCE CANNON

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, supplementing the remarks which I have previously made, found commencing on page 6669 of the RECORD, concerning the amount of appropriations and contract authorizations made at this session of Congress, I desire to present further data with respect to the work of the session on appropriation measures and also data concerning the appropriations made by Congress for the war program commencing in June 1940 and the decrease which has taken place during this period with respect to nonwar funds.

BUDGET ESTIMATES AND APPROPRIATIONS

The following tabulation is a comparison of Budget estimates and new direct appropriations made during the past session as portrayed by each of the appropriation bills considered during the session. The net reduction effected by Congress in the recommendations of the Executive during the session is $1,263,776,319.80. This has been accomplished mainly in the amounts for war purposes and has been effected without any impairment of the war program in any of its vital phases.

Comparison of amounts of direct appropriations carried in appropriation bills, 78th Cong., 2d sess., compared with Budget estimates for such bills

[1] Budget estimate in amount of $35,000,000 submitted to first session of the Seventy-eighth Congress and included in total estimates for that session. The bill passed the House at the first session but was not passed by the Senate and finally enacted into law until the second session.

The total of new appropriations made during the session just closed is $67,189,622,127.64. This is the second year of the war and defense-program period in which new war appropriations have shown a decline. The high point was at the second session of the Seventy-seventh Congress when a total of $147,071,208,961.89 was appropriated. The total for the first session of the Seventy-eighth Congress was $114,564,008,594.62. The comparison of the new appropriations at this session with those of the first session of the present Congress is as follows:

Total appropriations, 78th Cong., 1st sess	$114,564,008,594.62
Total appropriations, 78th Cong., 2d sess	67,189,622,127.64
Decrease 78th Cong., 2d sess., under 78th Cong., 1st sess	47,374,386,466.98

The amount of new direct appropriations, while representing the amount of new funds voted by Congress, is not indicative of the amounts that will be available in the fiscal year 1945 for the incurring of new obligations and the making of expenditures. Due to the changes in the programs of the War Department, very substantial sums remained unobligated from the fiscal year 1944 and have been reappropriated for the fiscal year 1945 instead of providing new appropriations for these purposes. Therefore, while a total of new direct appropriations of $15,434,814,795 is shown on the foregoing table for military (Army) appropriations there is reappropriated an estimated $33,672,971,000, making the amount to be available for obligation for military purposes in the fiscal year 1945 of $49,107,785,795. Likewise, for lend-lease purposes a total of new appropriations of $3,450,570,000 is granted and in addition there is reappropriated from previous balances and special receipts a total of $3,738,323,000, making a total of $7,188,893,000 available to the President for obligation for this purpose. Other small scattering sums of reappropriated funds make the total of such reappropriations at this session $37,533,524,237. Considering the new direct appropriations and the reappropriations made available at the present session and the new direct appropriations and reappropriations at the last session, the following comparison is shown:

1st sess., 78th Cong.
New direct appropriations	$114,564,008,594.62
Reappropriations	19,785,560,502.00
Total made available for new obligations by 78th Cong., 1st sess	134,349,569,096.62
2d sess., 78th Cong.
New direct appropriations	$67,189,622,127.64
Reappropriations	37,533,524,237.00
Total made available for new obligations by 78th Cong., 2d sess	104,723,146,364.64

It will be noted from a comparison of the totals for each session, using both factors of new direct appropriations and reappropriations, that the funds made available for new obligations by the Seventy-eighth Congress, second session, are approximately $30,000,000,000 less than those made available at the first session of the same Congress. This is a more accurate comparison of the responsibility of each session of Congress than that of the comparison of the new direct appropriations in that it gives a clearer indication of the obligations that may be incurred for the expenditure of funds from the Treasury in the fiscal period affected.

CONTRACT AUTHORIZATIONS

The amount of contract authorizations, which will be subject to future appropriations for their liquidation, is likewise reduced from the total of the first session of this Congress. The amounts are as follows:

Total contract authorizations in addition to appropriations, 78th Cong., 1st sess	$13,446,339,945
Total contract authorizations in addition to appropriations, 78th Cong., 2d sess	8,035,665,901
Decrease	5,410,674,044

WAR ACTIVITY PROGRAM

The national-defense program started in June of 1940 and was greatly accelerated on a war basis immediately after the declaration of war in December 1941. For the period from June 1940 to date, covering 5 fiscal years and six sessions of Congress, a total of $359,202,498,506 has been made available in direct appropriations for war activities and $15,911,739,819 in unliquidated contract authorizations, which will require future appropriations, has likewise been granted. These two sums bring the total amount provided for obligation for the war program from the start up to $375,114,238,325. The following table is a general summary of the distribution of these amounts:

Summary of appropriations and contract authorizations for war activities as of June 30, 1944

Particulars	Army	Navy	U. S. Maritime Commission	Executive Office of the President (including Lend-Lease funds appropriated directly to the President)	Other agencies	Total

[1] Includes estimated $1,800,000,000 for 1,000,000 tons of landing craft and district craft authorized in Second Deficiency Appropriation Act, 1944, subject to direction of the President.

NONWAR EXPENDITURES

Our expense of Government during this war period has been divided into three main categories—war expenditures, nonwar expenditures, and interest on the public debt. These are roughly divided in terms of total Federal outlay of 90 percent, 6 percent, and 4 percent, respectively. Annual expenditures for purposes which have been classified during this period as "war activities" have reached a fairly stabilized level. They were approximately $87,000,000,000 for the fiscal year just closed and will be at that approximate figure for the coming fiscal year, assuming continuance of the war in all theaters during the entire year. Interest on the public debt is on the rise. For the fiscal year just closed it totaled $2,609,000,000 and for the fiscal year just starting the estimate is $3,750,000,000.

A very gratifying reduction has taken place in the items classified as "nonwar" expenditures. I shall append to this statement a tabulation of the trend of these expenditures showing the actual amounts for the fiscal years 1939 to 1944, inclusive, and the estimated amounts for the fiscal year 1945. In this table I am using "expenditures" rather than "appropriations" for the reason that in this particular type of appropriation the expenditure figures can be almost as sharply related to a given fiscal period as the appropriations. The classification of items of appropriation as "nonwar" has prevailed since the beginning of the period of preparation for war and the actual war period. The label "nonwar" is to some extent inaccurate since all Federal activities have to a more or less extent been oriented to the war programs. Nevertheless the category has been followed and includes those items which are not obviously made for war purposes, which are not labeled "national defense" in the law, and also excludes the interest on the public debt. The funds of almost every Federal agency are divided on a "war" or "nonwar" basis as closely as it is possible to make a division of its activity. The Committee on Appropriations also has this table available in chart form of reduced size, a more graphic presentation of the data than can be included in the RECORD:

NOTE.—Revision of tabulation presented by chairman of the House Committee on Appropriations. (See Congressional Record of Nov. 4, 1943.)

JULY 7, 1944.

As will be noted from the preceding table, the nonwar expenditures are divided into two main classifications—those for fixed commitments and those for controllable items. The following summary brings out the difference between each of these groups and the grand totals for the fiscal years 1939 and 1945:

	Fiscal year 1939 (actual)	Fiscal year 1945 (estimated)
Relatively fixed commitments	$1,541,500,000	$3,915,600,000
Relatively controllable items	4,974,400,000	1,838,700,000
Total nonwar expenditures	6,515,900,000	5,754,300,000

As this abbreviated table indicates, total "nonwar" expenditures have been cut materially over the period 1939–1945. Relatively fixed commitments have more than doubled, but their increase has been more than offset by sharp reductions in the relatively controllable items.

Until now, annual totals of "nonwar" expenditures have shown a steady decline since the fiscal year 1939. The 1939 total was a peak, exceeded only in 1936, when there were heavy adjusted-compensation payments to war veterans. During the fiscal year 1945, just starting, a sharp increase impends. But this increase is concentrated in the first two fixed commitment classifications discussed below—tax refunds, and veterans' pensions and insurance—both of which are closely related to the war. If we exclude these two classifications, nonwar expenditures show a continued decline to a new low of $3,200,000,000—about half the comparable total of $6,000,000,000 expended in 1939. The total for controllable items continues its rapid downward trend.

RELATIVELY FIXED COMMITMENTS

As the table indicates, reduction in the "nonwar" total has been achieved in spite of a large and growing volume of expenditure for relatively fixed prior commitments. Such fixed items are not subject to substantial reduction through current administrative control or even through congressional action on appropriations because the payments are governed by fixed statutory formulas or contractual arrangements, or their change would otherwise require substantive legislation and revision of moral, if not legal, obligations.

These fixed commitments have risen sharply since 1939, particularly during 1944 and 1945. Whereas in 1939 they made up less than a fourth of all nonwar expenditures, they now comprise two-thirds of a total which itself has been cut drastically.

Tax refunds: Although relatively small heretofore, tax refunds are expected to rise from $67,900,000 in 1939 to above $1,500,000,000 during the fiscal year 1945, including bonds issued now for corporate excess-profits tax refundable after the war. Tax refunds paid from the Treasury are treated as an expenditure item although in measuring over-all trends of Government finance they could perhaps more logically be deducted from revenues. If they were so deducted, total nonwar expenditures in the fiscal year 1945 would be at about the level to which they were cut in 1943.

Veterans' pensions and insurance—excluding administrative costs: At $1,100,000,000 for 1945, fixed commitments for veterans are more than double the average amount for the 3 pre-war fiscal years, 1939–41. Moreover, this estimate for 1945 does not include expenditures which will occur under the newly enacted Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944.

Social-security and highway grants: Of the social-security grants, old-age assistance is the biggest share, with an increase of more than 50 percent above 1939, reflecting increases in the number of beneficiaries and in the average level of payments made by the States. For similar reasons grants for aid to dependent children and for aid to the blind have advanced substantially. These increases are somewhat offset by lower grants for unemployment-compensation administration because of improved employment conditions.

Grants for highways, now much smaller than social-security grants, have declined sharply. During the war such grants are being made only for work necessary to facilitate war transportation.

Other fixed commitments: The rise in the remaining fixed commitments is because of increased appropriations to retirement trust funds and increased expenses of loans.

Two kinds of retirement funds are included—those for railroad employees and those for Government employees. Contributions to the railroad retirement fund have had to be increased steadily and substantially to match growing receipts from special taxes levied for this purpose. This item also might logically be excluded entirely in measuring Government expenditures.

Contributions to the Government employees' retirement fund, on the other hand, are made from general revenues. The recent increase largely represents the gradual payment of a previously accumulated Government obligation to this trust fund, but to some extent it reflects, also, the fact that solely because of the war many employees have continued in service long enough to acquire retirement rights.

Fixed commitments include various permanent appropriations, among which expenses of loans is now the largest. Expenditure under this appropriation for administration and management of the public debt has risen with the amount of borrowing, particularly the wide sale of bonds in small denominations. It is estimated at $91,000,000 in 1945, compared with only $3,000,000 in 1939.

Another permanent appropriation earmarks 30 percent of customs revenue for programs to encourage consumption and exportation of agricultural commodities—programs which during the war emphasize consumption among low-income groups and the leveling off of seasonal or local gluts of the market for various commodities. The amount varies with customs collections.

Other permanent appropriations comprise a variety of items, such as grants to colleges of agriculture and mechanic arts and for vocational education, and various payments to States and counties from public-land revenues.

Also included in fixed commitments are miscellaneous grants and contributions, among which the chief items are payments to sugar producers under the Sugar Act of 1937, payments to reduce interest rates on farm mortgages, and annual contributions of the Federal Public Housing Authority to local housing authorities.

RELATIVELY CONTROLLABLE ITEMS

The distinction between relatively fixed and controllable items brings into clear focus the deep curtailment that has been affected in controllable nonwar expenditures in the past 6 years. In 1939 controllable items amounted to $5,000,000,000. For 1945 they are estimated at $1,800,000,000. They are now at or near bedrock.

Work relief and aids to youth: Reemployment has permitted elemination of work relief and aids to youth, with attendant huge expenditure reductions from just under $3,000,000,000 in 1939 to the small unliquidated obligations of earlier years to be paid in the fiscal year 1945 and estimated at $17,500,000. The estimate for 1945 comprises amounts required to fulfill loan and grant agreements of the Public Works Administration and to make accident compensation payments connected with the former work-relief programs.

Aids to agriculture: Only a few aids to agriculture are included among fixed commitments, most of these aids being shown as controllable items. Such controllable items rose to a peak exceeding $1,000,000,000 in the fiscal year 1940; for the fiscal year 1945 they are cut sharply to an estimated $259,000,000. Parity payments have become unnecessary. Substantial reductions have been made in payments for the conservation and use of agricultural land resources and for miscellaneous aids.

General public works: Expenditures for general public works—other than highway grants already noted—have dropped sharply below their peak of 1942 when the program comprised huge multiple-purpose construction projects at Central Valley, Bonneville, Grand Coulee, and in the Tennessee Valley, as well as flood-control works, river and harbor improvements, and reclamation projects in other places.

Many projects which were suspended early in the war to release critical materials had to be resumed later in order to provide additional hydroelectric power, arable land, and navigable waterways. Nevertheless, the estimated expenditure total for fiscal year 1945 is below that of 1944.

Establishments and agencies: Expenditures of the legislative establishment, the judiciary, the Executive Office of the President, and the independent establishments are grouped under the general heading "Establishments and agencies." The independent establishments account for most of the expenditures.

Legislative establishment: The legislative establishment includes the Government Printing Office, Library of Congress, and Architect of the Capitol, as well as the two Houses of the Congress itself. The wartime increase has been mainly in the legislative printing costs of the Government Printing Office. Expenditures of the legislative branch are classified entirely as nonwar items.

Independent establishments: Expenditure increases among the independent establishments are intimately related to the war effort. Thus, the Veterans' Administration expenditures for relatively controllable items, chiefly hospital and administrative costs, are estimated at $71,000,000 more in 1945 than they were in 1939. The Federal Security Agency expenditures in 1945 will be $34,000,000 above 1939, because of wartime demands upon the Public Health Service and increased payments to the States for vocational rehabilitation of disabled civilians. A rise of $11,000,000 in the Federal Works Agency in the same period reflects increased expenditures for operating Government buildings all over the country. For other independent establishments there is a 6-year increase of $43,000,000, concentrated in the following agencies which have important functions of war administration: The General Accounting Office, National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics, and Civil Service Commission.

Cabinet departments: Total nonwar expenditures of Cabinet departments were lower in the fiscal years 1942–1944 than before the war. Exclusive of items classified under other headings in the table, they are rising in 1945 to a total estimated at $58,000,000 above 1939. This difference is more than accounted for by increased Treasury Department expenditures alone, predominantly in the tax collection and fiscal services.

Thus, the Bureau of Internal Revenue in the Treasury Department, is now collecting eight times as much revenue as in 1939 from a great many more individual taxpayers. Its administrative costs are little more than twice as great in spite of the innumerable complications which the war has added to tax administration—for example, special treatment of servicemen. The cost of the fiscal services has more than doubled since 1939, even omitting most of the expeditures of the Bureau of Public Debt because these are covered by a permanent appropriation included among fixed commitments. Foreign funds control, now costing the Treasury Department $4,000,000 a year, is an example of a totally new "nonwar" activity nonexistent 5 years ago.

The major reduction among Cabinet departments is in the Department of the Interior, where "nonwar" expenditures in fiscal year 1945 are about half the comparable expenditures in 1939. The Post Office deficiency has been eliminated; in fact, during the fiscal year 1944 the Department returned to the general fund some advances previously made to cover deficiencies which proved to be smaller than anticipated, thereby establishing a credit against expenditures.

Agriculture Department expenditures, even excluding the sharply reduced agricultural aids, continue well below the level of 1939. The total of War Department expenditures for nonmilitary functions, exclusive of general public works, is less than in 1939 despite a rise in expenditures connected with the Panama Canal.

The four remaining Cabinet departments—Justice, State, Commerce, and Labor—have shown in each case some increase in nonwar expenditures exclusive of general public works and fixed commitments. Detailed examination reveals direct connections between the increase of spending and the enlarged needs or new conditions created by the war. In the Justice Department most of the increase was for registration of aliens, detention or surveillance of alien enemies, war-connected law-enforcement activities of the F. B. I., and general provision of legal services for a Government greatly expanded to handle the war effort. In the State Department, some savings from closing diplomatic establishments in Axis and Axis-occupied countries were absorbed by great expansion of activities at other posts, doubling of our establishments in other American republics, and the coordination of extensive foreign economic activities. The Commerce Department increase is more than accounted for by the Office of the Administrator of Civil Aeronautics and the Weather Bureau, which have had their work multiplied by the great wartime increase in air traffic. In the Labor Department, the increase is mainly in the Wage and Hour and Public Contracts Divisions, although these divisions, now consolidated, and the Department as a whole have reduced their nonwar spending since 1941.

WAR ASPECTS OF NONWAR EXPENDITURES

The preceding sections cover all categories shown in the table. This section elaborates an earlier statement that more than 2.5 billion dollars of the nonwar expenditures for 1945 are for major items closely and obviously related to the war. Corresponding items totaled about $800,000,000 for fiscal year 1944. The largest items are reviewed here.

All expenditures of the Veterans' Administration are considered nonwar; actually, about $180,000,000 in 1944 and $690,000,000 estimated for 1945 are occasioned directly by the present war. These estimates include the large appropriations to the National Service Life Insurance fund, Army and Navy pensions in cases arising out of the present war, war losses under the older system of Government life insurance, and the increase in hospital and administrative costs. The Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944 will further add to the total for 1945.

Wartime developments have added greatly to Treasury Department expenses—chiefly in the form of tax refunds exceeding $1,500,000,000 in 1945, but also in terms of the costs of collecting taxes, administering debt, and other wartime fiscal operations. These administrative costs for fiscal year 1945 are estimated at nearly $200,000,000 above the pre-war level. The General Accounting Office, with its greatly increased auditing load in connection with war expenditures, likewise shows an increase of operating costs to several times the pre-war level.

Payments to the railroad retirement trust fund have almost trebled.

Costs for rental and operation of building space are classified as nonwar, even when incurred on behalf of war agencies. Expenditures of the Public Buildings Administration for these purposes are more than double the pre-war amount.

The items enumerated, with several smaller ones of the same general character, account for one-fifth of so-called nonwar expenditures in the fiscal year 1944 and nearly one-half in 1945.

These increases or new items are for activities clearly related to the war. The totals do not reflect the more numerous instances in which the nonwar expenditures have been cut below pre-war levels and the remaining services redirected wholly or predominantly to the objective of winning the war. For example, War Department nonmilitary expenditures for rivers and harbors and flood control—classified as nonwar general public works—have not only been reduced; they have been to a considerable extent concentrated on waterways of special importance to the war effort. These improved waterways have made it possible for the United States to build on inland lakes and even on dry land some of the vessels for overseas use. Similarly, the expenditures of the nonwar National Park Service have been reduced sharply and the parks are widely used for military convalescents.

The major conclusions to be derived from this analysis are as follows:

First. The Federal dollar of expenditure contains only 6 cents for so-called nonwar purposes. The remainder is made up of 90 cents for war and 4 cents for interest on the public debt.

Second. Nonwar expenditures were cut heavily from $6,500,000,000 in the fiscal year 1939 to $4,100,000,000 in the fiscal year 1944 just closed. They will rise to $5,800,000,000 in the fiscal year 1945 because of rapidly increasing fixed commitments, notably tax refunds and veterans' pensions and insurance.

Third. Relatively controllable nonwar items have been steadily slashed from $5,000,000,000 in the fiscal year 1939 to a new low of $1,800,000,000 estimated for the fiscal year 1945. They are now at or near bedrock.

Fourth. Relatively fixed commitments cannot be substantially changed without revision of basic legislation. In the fiscal year 1939 they were only 24 percent of nonwar expenditures; during the fiscal year 1945 they will be 68 percent.

Fifth. Controllable items and fixed commitments both contain an increasingly large proportion of expenditures actually for war purposes or occasioned by war activities. Thus, if only the clearest war-related items are excluded from estimated 1945 nonwar expenditures, the total is about cut in half.

Sixth. Activity after activity has been fully reoriented to war.

I feel that every American citizen can take pride in this outstanding record with respect to nonwar expenditures. The percentage reduction which has been made in the controllable items is the largest ever made in the history of the country in any period of time. The increases which have taken place in the fixed commitments are entirely due to the mutations of war. Those activities which had a decidedly nonwar inclination have been converted largely to the performance of war work even though the bulk of their funds are still cataloged as nonwar.

Program Honoring Hon. Schuyler Otis Bland, of Virginia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HERBERT C. BONNER
OF NORTH CAROLINA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. BONNER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following program on the occasion of the unveiling of a portrait of Hon. SCHUYLER OTIS BLAND, the distinguished and beloved chairman of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, House of Representatives, on June 15, 1944:

PROGRAM

Presiding: Representative HERBERT C. BONNER.

Presentation of portrait: Representative EDWARD J. HART.

Introduction of Sandor Klein, artist.

Unveiling of portrait: Mrs. Elsie N. Keefer, clerk of committee.

Address of Vice Admiral Russell R. Waesche, Commandant, United States Coast Guard.

Address of Rear Admiral Emory S. Land, Chairman, United States Maritime Commission.

Address of Representative SAM RAYBURN, Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Address of Representative JOSEPH W. MARTIN, minority leader of the House of Representatives.

Address of Representative JOHN W. MCCORMACK, majority leader of the House of Representatives.

Acceptance of portrait: Representative RICHARD J. WELCH, ranking minority member of committee; Representative ROBERT RAMSPECK, ranking majority member of committee.

Response: Representative SCHUYLER OTIS BLAND.

(Ceremonies honoring the Honorable SCHUYLER OTIS BLAND, a Representative in Congress since July 2, 1918, from the First District of Virginia, member, Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries since April 18, 1921, and chairman since March 14, 1933, were held in the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee hearing room, Old House Office Building, Washington, D. C., on Friday, June 16, 1944, at 10 o'clock a. m., Representative HERBERT C. BONNER presiding.)

Representative BONNER. We are delighted to have so many friends here this morning to join us in paying tribute to a noble son of Virginia and an outstanding American, our chairman.

Primarily our committee deals with the Coast Guard and maritime legislation. We are proud to have on the program Admiral Waesche and Admiral Land. Admiral Waesche has brought the Coast Guard from a peacetime protective force to one of the Nation's outstanding fighting units. He is recognized as the greatest leader the Coast Guard has ever had.

Admiral Land, through his initiative and dynamic energy, has produced a merchant fleet the like of which has never been gathered together before on the high seas. This fleet has kept life and hope in our allies, and is the first factor of our success to date.

We are also happy and proud to have on this program the Speaker of the House, the minority leader, and the majority leader, certainly men who have led the legislative program of this country through the most trying time we have ever experienced.

I present the Honorable EDWARD J. HART, a member of the committee.

Representative EDWARD J. HART. Mr. Bonner, Mr. Bland and Mrs. Bland, distinguished guests, and my colleagues, this is a singularly happy occasion for all of us. For the humblest as well as the most distinguished in this gathering it is an hour invested with pleasure and with pride. To Mr. BONNER, whose generous mind and heart conceived them, and to all those within and without the House of Representatives who have so generously and so willingly cooperated with him, and to the distinguished artist whose presence here this morning we view with a sense of supreme satisfaction, these ceremonies must be especially gratifying.

It will draw no dissent, I believe, to say that the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries is one of the highly important committees of the House of Representatives. Upon the establishment and the proper maintenance of a suitable merchant marine no small measure of our country's interest depends, and to be entrusted with the initial and competent consideration of legislation directed toward those ends is a challenge seen that responsibility eagerly assumed and successfully discharged.

In the 10 years during which it has been my privilege to serve on that committee, I have seen that challenge accepted. I have seen that responsibility eagerly assumed and successfully discharged.

I would not willingly permit any note of criticism, however slight, to mar the concord of these proceedings, and I hope I shall not be suspected of offering it when I state that 10 years ago the United States Merchant Marine was in a very sorry state. It was made up, for the most part, of vessels that were old and inadequate, and relatively few. Qualitatively and quantitatively it was utterly unequal, either to the task of carrying anything like its fair share of our foreign commerce, or serving as a useful and helpful adjunct of our Navy. And, while I know that the committee was composed of patriotic, able, and industrious men prior to 10 years ago, it did appear to a newcomer at that time that little effective thought had been given to any plan for the renascence of the merchant marine. I merely state that as an observation and not as a fact, because if I were to enter into a discussion of that matter I would be merely exploiting my own ignorance. But I do know that at that period the merchant marine was truly in the doldrums.

Under the chairmanship of him in whose honor we are gathered here today that deplorable situation was speedily and completely altered. Under the force of his drive this committee became busily intent upon devising remedies to restore the long-neglected health of the merchant marine. It assumed a constant watchfulness; it maintained a lively interest in all things relating to it. Its deliberations became infused with a spirit of inquiry and marked by an intelligent research out of which came rich accomplishments, first in the form of highly valuable legislation and consequent upon that a merchant marine commensurate with the dignity and the requirements of the Republic.

And, while I would not be fair if I did not freely acknowledge that these laudable results could not have been effected harmoniously and so expeditiously without the always generous, able, and devoted cooperation of Mr. WELCH and his colleagues of the minority, I am sure that he will join with me when I say that the mind that guided us and the hand that directed us to desirable ends, beneficial to our country, were the mind and the heart of the brilliant chairman of our committee, Judge BLAND.

We of his committee are intensely proud of Judge BLAND, and we have every right to be. We contemplate with admiration his exhaustive knowledge of all matters coming within the committee's jurisdiction, whether they relate to the merchant marine, the Coast Guard, or the fisheries. We behold with wonderment, and sometimes with grave concern, his measureless industry and his selfless devotion to the work of this committee, a selflessness which at long last nature itself rebelled against but which it could not conquer. For age cannot wither his zeal, nor has time power to dim his enthusiasm for his country's good.

Mr. Chairman, you have been a genuine inspiration to us all. I am permitted today to speak for Democrat and Republican alike. Your tolerance of our impetuousness, your patience with our ignorance, your helpfulness in an infinite variety of circumstances, your innate gentleness, your sincere modesty, all have buried themselves deep within our hearts and generated there an affection for our chairman which shall never be diminished.

And so, ladies and gentlemen, to commemorate his incomparable leadership in a truly great era in the history of this fine committee, and to give visible evidence of the profound regard in which Judge BLAND is held by its membership, we have caused a very excellent likeness to be done by this noted artist, who graces this gathering here today with his presence. It is our desire that it become the property of the committee, that it be hung in the committee room through future time as a stimulus to us and to those who in future days will be permitted to carry on the important work of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries; and, above all, as an enduring testimony of our chairman's kingship in the empire of our love.

Mr. RAMSPECK and Mr. WELCH, it is my honor and privilege, on behalf of the members of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, to present to the committee, through you, what I am sure all will agree when they have had the pleasure of seeing it is an admirable portrait of our beloved and distinguished chairman, the Honorable SCHUYLER OTIS BLAND.

Representative BONNER. It is a pleasure, and we are proud to present the artist, Specialist First Class of United States Coast Guard, Mr. Sandor Klein. Mr. Klein was born in New York and attended the National Academy of Design in New York City. He was winner of the Pulitzer art prize in '31, and also in '31 he was extended a fellowship in the American Academy in Rome, during which year he toured continental Europe and studied. He attended the Julian Beaux Arts School in Paris and was elected a Fellow in the National Academy of Art. He also received the Tiffany Award in New York.

Mr. Klein joined the Coast Guard in 1942 and participated in the invasion of the Marshall Islands and other landings performed by his service. Mr. Klein, it is a pleasure!

I now present the faithful clerk of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, Mrs. Elsie N. Keefer.

(Mrs. Keefer unveiled the portrait of the Honorable Mr. BLAND.)

Representative BONNER. Mr. Klein, we appreciate your service, and we hope that on our next meeting your rank will be much higher.

It is our pleasure to present Admiral Russell R. Waesche, Commandant, United States Coast Guard.

Vice Admiral RUSSELL R. WAESCHE. Mr. Chairman, Judge BLAND, Mrs. Bland, distinguished guests, ladies, and gentlemen: I am indeed very happy to be here and to participate in these exercises. The Coast Guard has been associated with this committee for many years, and we all love the distinguished chairman.

I, personally, have been closely associated with Judge BLAND since my appointment as Commandant of the Coast Guard and even before that, and we have always found him not only a fair and a just man to deal with, but a lovable man, a man in whom we have faith, a man that we come to with our troubles in the Coast Guard, as well as to get support for legislation.

We are very proud indeed that it was a Coast Guard boy who painted this very fine portrait. I know Judge BLAND would much prefer a man in a bluejacket's uniform to do this work than a man in an officer's uniform or in any distinguished clothing or sphere of activity. He has always been a friend of the underdog. He calls me up many times and writes me many letters, always to find out if there is not something we can do for a seaman. I do not think I have ever had a request from him to do something for an officer or a shipbuilding company or anyone who is well to do.

That is why we have such a deep affection for him. That is why we have faith in him. That is why we will always come to him with our troubles and for sympathy as well as when we want something done.

His interest in the Coast Guard Academy has been outstanding. The last time he went there he probably was too ill to go, but his indomitable will made him go. I only hope that he will remain chairman of this committee as long as I have anything to do with the Coast Guard. I doubt if you can find anyone who would replace him in the hearts of the enlisted men and officers of the Coast Guard, and certainly there is no one who can take his place in the heart of the present Commandant.

I feel that in his activities in this committee and elsewhere, and in his daily life, Judge BLAND owes much credit to his very gracious and lovable wife. Anyone who has met her must realize that there probably lies at least part of the inspiration which has made Judge BLAND such an outstanding, wonderful public servant.

Representative BONNER. It is our pleasure to present Rear Admiral Emory S. Land, Chairman, United States Maritime Commission.

Rear Admiral EMORY S. LAND. Mr. Toastmaster, Mr. Chairman, Lady Mary, members of the committee, distinguished guests: It seems to me that to stand up here and try to say anything is like carrying coals to Newcastle. So much has been said that one might just add "I sign on the dotted line" and let it go at that.

But, as a member of the Maritime Commission and the War Shipping Administration, I would like to say that we recognize in OTIS BLAND the father of the modern merchant marine; this committee we recognize as our board of directors; we yield to none in our admiration for the fairness and justice of the chairman and the whole committee. It is you legislators who are responsible for the merchant marine that exists today; if there is any credit, it goes back quite a few years, because you put on the books and you have helped us carry through this entire shipbuilding, ship-operating, and ship-manning program.

I come up here so often that I am thinking seriously of running for membership on the committee. But, whether I come up here to be spanked, to be helpful, or to be praised, I am always assured of justice, and that is all any of us are looking for—a square deal.

This committee, I feel, is like Russell Waesche spoke of Lady Mary. It is just like your wife. It is your best friend and your most ardent critic, a fine combination.

Looking around, this has some symbols of a college commencement, and I only wish it were my privilege to confer, as well as admiration for a wonderful portrait, some degrees such as M. D., D. D., and LL. D. on Otis. But if I were to do so, those would be "Mairzie dotes and dozie dotes, and little lansie divie." Sometimes I hope we can give you all three of those in one.

I like to think of OTIS BLAND not only as the chairman but also as a shipmate. It has been the pleasure of my wife and myself to have been shipmates with the judge and his wife. I think of him as a judge not because he is a judge but because he deals out justice, fairness, constructive criticism, courtesy, and leadership, and on behalf of the Maritime Commission and the War Shipping Administration it is my great privilege as their representative to say, "Good luck, God bless you, and all honor to a great American."

Representative BONNER. Since the first Congress we have had many distinguished, able leaders in the House of Representatives. We have had many outstanding Speakers. But it can be truthfully said there has never been a Speaker prior to the present incumbent who has the love and the respect of the House of Representatives any stronger, than the present incumbent. He has dealt fairly and justly, and impartially, as he viewed the House with respect to the center aisle. By his conduct in that chair and by his fellowship with the youngest Member and the oldest Member he has ingratiated himself so deeply in the hearts of the membership of the House that no occasion held on Capitol Hill would be fully complete and proper without his presence. It is my delightful pleasure to present the Speaker, the Honorable SAM RAYBURN.

Representative SAM RAYBURN. I just could not let this occasion pass without coming here and saying "Howdy" and greeting the great chairman of this committee.

It has been my privilege to serve in the House of Representatives for a little more than 31 years. In that time I have seen many splendid chairmen come and go, and I think that on the fingers of one hand I could recount the chairmen of great committees who have measured up to the high standard set by OTIS BLAND. He knows his business, and he knows his bills.

This committee, under his leadership, has established such a high and enviable reputation that as a usual thing we do not have to appeal to the Committee on Rules for a rule to make his bills in order. He just gets them up by unanimous consent, and usually without reading. The House has that much faith in him.

I know that for him and his charming wife this is a red letter day. It should be. It is such an honor as comes to few men and to no one more deserving. He has indeed made great, outstanding and lasting contributions as a legislator and as a stateman of the first order, and to you, sir, and to your charming companion, may I say that I hope your years will be long and that throughout the years that are allotted to you your paths may lie through green fields and by still waters. That is the hope and trust of every friend, and they are legion.

Again allow me to congratulate one of the greatest chairmen it has ever been my privilege to know, and say that this tribute today is a just tribute, one that I know is an inspiration to you as it is to us.

Representative BONNER. When I first came to Washington many years ago as an employee on Capitol Hill it was my good fortune and my pleasure to meet early and to learn to love one of the finest characters I have ever known, and so much did I admire him and so much have I continued to admire him that sometimes I have become afraid. He almost persuades me to believe in his faith.

My admiration goes so far that he is the only one of the other party whose picture hangs in my home. It gives me real, sincere pleasure to present the minority leader, the Honorable JOSEPH W. MARTIN.

Representative JOSEPH W. MARTIN, Herbert, Otis, and Mrs. Bland, distinguished guests, and members of the Merchant Marine Committee, it is a privilege for me to come here today. I was delighted when my good friend of 20 years, Herbert, invited me to come. I wanted to come, first that I might pay my personal tribute to a man who has had my personal affection for a good many years. I wanted to come that I might pay tribute to his splendid, patriotic, public service.

It was my privilege to know OTIS BLAND in the early days when I was here. For several years I had an office adjoining his, and I know from that close intimacy with him what high character of public servant he was, always devoted to his work, always on the job, always planning to do something which would promote the welfare of his country.

It is because of these high virtues that, as the Speaker has told you so well, when Otis brings a bill on the floor of the House we have faith in what is included in that bill. We do not ask him quite so many of the searching questions that we might ask some other one who has not endeared himself to us quite as much as Judge BLAND, and so his legislation rolls easily through.

I want to say that I believe that in this trying period he and his committee have done a remarkable job. I had hoped, when I first came into Congress, that I might go on this committee. That was the committee I asked for; but unfortunately they diverted me to other lines of work, so I never came back. But I do know from my predecessor, who was chairman of this committee, what a great value it can be to this country; and I know, too, not only in this war period, but in the period that is to follow the war, how essential the work will be of this committee. I do not know of any committee in these post-war days that will have a greater job to do, a greater responsibility for the prosperity of our country, than this Merchant Marine Committee, and we are fortunate to have men like Judge BLAND, DICK WELCH, and other strong members of the committee.

So I am happy to come here today to pay my tribute to Judge BLAND, to express an appreciation of the fine work he has done for the country. I would fail, also, if I did not say a word of commendation, because I know from my own friendship for Mrs. Bland that she has been an important factor in the stimulating work that he has done. And so, Judge, while we may differ in some of the great political questions, while there may at times be strife, we in the Congress all come to know men as they really are, and we have come to know you as a great legislator, a great American and, as this portrait adorns this room and as the members who have been associated with you continue their membership on the committee, I know we will have faith in the development of the merchant marine and that this committee will be inspired to the highest ideals.

Representative BONNER. New England is rich in many ways. And fortunate is this Nation to have such a State as the Old Bay State to send to the legislative halls two sons who have taken such an outstanding part in national affairs during these trying times.

It gives me pleasure, now, to present the other son of Massachusetts, who has led the majority through these trying times: the Honorable JOHN W. MCCORMACK.

Representative JOHN W. MCCORMACK. Representative BONNER, Judge and Mrs. Bland, members of the committee, friends of the Judge and Mrs. Bland, on an occasion of this kind it is very difficult to adequately and properly express, and I find it so, in words, the thoughts which permeate my mind, and it is difficult to adequately, at least to me, express the deep affection and respect that I have for our distinguished friend.

Real friendship to me is the closest relationship that can exist between two human beings outside of the sacred ties of the family itself. I know no Member of the House of Representatives, in my 16 years of service, that enjoys and possesses the real friendship of his colleagues more than our distinguished friend, whom we not only honor today but who honors us.

In the journey of life there are individuals that we meet who will always remain with us, and SCHUYLER BLAND is one of those rare individuals whose personality, whose noble possessions, whose God-given gifts, developed to the maximum extent possible, impress themselves upon our minds and always remain as a permanent and lasting memory.

The Merchant Marine Committee, as I like to refer to it instead of giving it its long name, is a strong committee. Every member of it is a sincere and conscientious legislator. That is truly due, I think all the members will admit, to the strength and character of the chairman of the committee, to his devotion to duty, to his capacity, and to his tolerance as some of the previous speakers have so ably referred to him.

The Speaker and the minority leader have referred to the confidence that the House has in a bill coming out of this committee. And, while all of the members of the committee are entitled to credit, the real credit rests with the chairman. As a matter of fact, making a little open confession, if Schuyler comes to me and tells me a bill is reported out and asks me about getting a rule, I would say to him, "Schuyler, you are slipping." I cannot remember now when Schuyler ever came to me during the 4 years I have been majority leader and asked about a rule. It is an accepted fact that when a bill comes out of this committee it is going to pass by unanimous consent, and when Schuyler comes to see me, the only question I ask it, "Are the Republican members all right? Have you consulted the Republican members? Have you consulted the Republican leadership?"

He says, "Yes," and I say, "All right, Schuyler."

He says, "Don't you want to read the bill?"

I say, "No. A bill reported out of your committee is one that I know has been well considered, and I do not think it is necessary for me to read or study any bill reported out of your committee." But that is indicative of the confidence we have in him and that we have in the committee under his leadership.

I think the references made to the artist by Representative BONNER are appropriate. This young man has a God-given gift which he has developed. We see here one of the evidences of his great gift which he has developed. It is not only a wonderful portrait but the originality and the conception of the artist are something that impresses me and something that I know impresses each and every one of you.

I was particularly pleased when I heard Representative BONNER say that he hoped that the next time the committee saw this young man that he would hear that the young man had been elevated to a higher rank. On the occasion of that remark I noticed Admiral Waesche applauding very vigorously, and that is some evidence that the admiral was responding affirmatively to the very hopeful expression of Representative BONNER.

I know you were stirred by the remarks of ED HART. No one is more capable of eloquently expressing his thoughts than Representative HART. The remarks of Representative HART touched each and every one of us. At least they represent my views with reference to SCHUYLER BLAND as completely and as comprehensively as anyone can express them through mere words.

I am pleased to be here. I am honored by being able to be here and to participate in this memorable occasion. I am honored in having known SCHUYLER BLAND. I am honored in possessing his friendship. I am honored in being the beneficiary through the years of his guidance, his example, his inspiration. One influences others more by example than by words, and SCHUYLER BLAND is an example of a gentleman of the highest type humanly possible; an example of devotion to duty; an example of courage; an example of kindness, of understanding, and of respect for the other person's views and the other person's right to entertain whatever views his conscience and his judgment prompt him to entertain.

I have benefited from knowing SCHUYLER BLAND, and this day, Schuyler, I am honored. I know that you feel exceedingly pleased with the presence of your friends here. And, in addition to constituting an honor for you, it is also, and properly so, an honor for Mrs. Bland, to whom some of the previous speakers have so touchingly and properly referred. The arms of a mother or a good wife are around all of us throughout the journey of life. As the poet said, "It is in the arms of a woman that we enter life. It is in the arms of a woman that we gain the courage and strength to bear life. It is in the arms of a woman that we invariably leave life." How vacant the life would be, the span between birth and death, if it were not for her, mother and wife.

The references made to Mrs. Bland are deserved, they are touching but truthful. And so whatever honor comes to you is her honor, and we all join with you and with Mrs. Bland in conveying to you both our feelings on this occasion, that we are honored deeply for knowing you, and we extend to you and Mrs. Bland our congratulations and our very best wishes.

As majority leader, if I might conclude, and if I have the authority or exercise the indiscretion to give you an order, the one order I give you is to work a little less and place more responsibility upon the members of your committee.

Representative BONNER. Now we cross the continent to the Golden Gate, and present the ranking member of this committee, who has a golden heart. There is no man on the committee, not excepting the chairman, who knows more about the work of this committee, the matters before it, and who more diligently applies himself to the work of the committee, than this rugged American, the Honorable RICHARD J. WELCH, of California.

Representative RICHARD J. WELCH. Herbert, Judge, and Mrs. Bland, and our guests, it is indeed a pleasure to join with the committee, my committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, in this demonstration of our appreciation and respect for our distinguished chairman, the Honorable SCHUYLER OTIS BLAND, of Virginia.

Judge BLAND, as he is affectively known to us, has worked for years to develop an American merchant marine adequate for national defense and our peacetime economy. He is extremely devoted to the Coast Guard and the Coast Guard Academy, and to the fisheries and to the other branches of our Government which come under the jurisdiction of this committee.

It is particularly appropriate that the portrait of this distinguished American be placed in this committee room, where he has labored for many years. It will prove an inspiration to those who have a sincere interest in the American merchant marine.

Representative BONNER. North, West, and South this committee is represented. And I know of no member of the committee who would give more time to the committee and who is more devoted to the chairman of this committee than the Honorable ROBERT RAMSPECK, ranking majority member of the Committee on the Merchant Marine. Mr. RAMSPECK.

Representative ROBERT RAMSPECK. Mr. BONNER, Judge and Mrs. Bland, our distinguished and honored guests, and friends, men often hesitate to speak in terms of affection for their fellow men, because they seem to think it is sissified. Yet, they do have those feelings, just as others have them, just as men have those feelings toward women and women toward each other.

Those of us who have served with Judge BLAND on this committee do have a sincere and deep affection for him. It goes beyond the usual bounds of friendship. It has been my privilege to serve on this committee under two distinguished chairmen, both of whom are here today, Judge DAVIS, of Tennessee, and Judge BLAND, of Virginia. When I first came to Congress, this committee was what we on the Democratic side called an exclusive committee. Later it was opened to membership without that ban and it was my privilege to become a member of it.

I think perhaps I am the only member on the committee who has no coastline in his district. I live 300 miles from the nearest point where one of these great ships in Admiral Land's fleet can come into port, and, therefore, I have been able to look upon the work of the committee in a somewhat detached manner, not being directly affected by the interests over which it has jurisdiction.

Sitting on the right hand of the chairman, whom we gather here to honor today, it has been my privilege to come to know him most intimately, to understand the devotion with which he approaches the problems facing this committee and to see him work diligently for long hours, tirelessly, in the interest of solving those problems which are so important to this country and to the people whom we represent.

In fact, I think I can speak for the members of the committee when I say that we hope he will follow the advice of the majority leader, because he has oftentimes worked us so hard that we felt he was a little too ambitious and a little bit too hard a taskmaster. Yet we know that every act of his and every meeting he has called have been necessary and in the interest of the welfare of this great Nation.

I think when the history of this great global conflict in which we are engaged is written, notwithstanding the many magnificent achievements in other lines of activity, perhaps the most outstanding, and the one that was certainly as necessary to victory as any other, will be the construction and the putting into operation of the merchant fleet that has been built under the Merchant Marine Act of 1936 and under the splendid direction of Admiral Land, and the father of this legislation, which made possible the quick construction of this great fleet of merchant vessels, is the gentleman whom we honor here today and whose portrait we have hanging on the wall, painted by this splendid artist from the Coast Guard.

On behalf of the committee, I deem it a great privilege to accept this portrait in gratitude, and with a deep feeling that we have, by hanging it on this wall, recorded for those who come after us our affection and our appreciation of one of the finest personal friends I ever had, one of the most lovable men I have ever known, one of the kindliest souls it has ever been my privilege to be associated with, and one of the greatest American citizens and public servants who has ever served in the halls of Congress.

Representative BONNER. You have probably noticed that I from time to time have been confused as between the minority and the majority. That has been brought about by the fairness of the chairman of this committee. Here there is no distinction. The minority play their part and the majority play their part. We fuss, praise, and enjoy each other.

In my opinion, I have never met a character so strong and yet so gentle; I have never met a man before so able and yet so tolerant of others. It is expressed in this picture: Strength, yet gentleness; sweet, yet strong.

As I look on that picture throughout the years I will remember him and be proud that I had the honor to serve under our chairman, SCHUYLER OTIS BLAND.

Representative SCHUYLER OTIS BLAND. Mr. BONNER, distinguished guests, fellow members of the committee, ladies and gentlemen, it is impossible for me adequately to express my present emotions or to convey to you the deep feeling that I have due to the expressions of my friends. One thing that I can say is you have carefully selected my friends to be here today. Possibly you did not invite the others.

I am deeply indebted also to the artist for this splendid work that he has done with possibly a rather poor subject. I do not know; I will leave that to him. I predict for him future honors and greater rewards.

I feel that this is not an honor conferred particularly on me, but that it is conferred on the committee, the men who have served with me and the men with whom I have served, not alone for the last few years but for the past 23 years, I believe it is, that I have been a member of this committee. Through all those years I have never seen more diligent attempts to perform their duties than the efforts of the members of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

The example I have tried to follow has been the example that has been set by those men who have preceded me. Two of my former chairmen I am gratified to note are here today, my immediate predecessor, Judge DAVIS, and my beloved friend, the Senator from Maine, WALLACE WHITE, who was the chairman of this committee immediately preceding Judge DAVIS, and consequently just the second ahead of me.

Such success as our efforts have attained has been due not so much to the chairman as to the committee members and to the constructive work that has been done by the other chairmen. I refer to the gentleman who, I believe, preceded the minority leader of the House, Judge Green, from Massachusetts, Edmonds, of Pennsylvania, Scott, of Michigan, followed by White of Maine and Davis of Tennessee.

We have had a great work to do here. How well we have performed it let posterity tell and let a kind, generous public say. I pray that the remaining years of our work here together may never cause you to regret this honor. Together, by the efforts of my committee rather than by my own, I feel that we have done something worth while for the coast guard, for the fisheries, for the Panama Canal, for our aids to navigation, for our Coast and Geodetic Survey, and for our American merchant marine, which we have helped to build for the national defense. In that work there has been no semblance of party politics.

There go the bells that call the Members of the House to their duties, and I shall bring my remarks to a close. How far we have come in our work for the American merchant marine will be reflected by a comparison of conditions which existed in 1935, when we reported the 1936 Merchant Marine Act to the House. Then the total tonnage under construction in the United States consisted of two tankers aggregating 16,800 tons, and the other tonnage consisted of four vessels averaging 418 tons each. The report then filed will show what our condition was.

We must carry our efforts forward. We are in the midst now of considering post-war legislation, the disposal of the ships we now have. It is a trying job, it is a hard nut to crack. What we are going to do I do not know. We have simply got an awful task ahead of us. But we shall do it, conscious that we work not alone for the national defense, for promotion of trade, for stabilization of world conditions, but above all for the maintenance and preservation of peace in the world. God helping us, we shall do all we can to maintain and preserve that peace. The first essential, in my opinion, is an adequate merchant marine.

I thank you all very much.

Crop Insurance

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARENCE CANNON

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, it is to be regretted that opportunity has not been afforded to take up in the House before the beginning of the recess the bill (H. R. 4911) to continue Federal crop insurance.

The bill should be considered for amendment and would doubtless be modified in some minor respects before enactment, but it affords a basis for consideration of the vital principle of crop insurance and with the 5 years' experience we have had since the enactment of the first crop-insurance law in 1938, could undoubtedly be perfected to provide a practical and workable law.

The importance of insurance in any industry is too well established to permit debate on the subject. That is just as true in agriculture as in any other modern industry. Security against the hazards attending normal agricultural operations should be assured farmers who take the risks involved in crop production and especially at this critical time in the production of wartime food and fiber essentials.

It is an old problem and one which both governmental and private enterprise have long essayed to solve. But we felt that we had reason to believe we were at last approaching a solution of the problem when we enacted the law of February 16, 1938, now chapter 36 of title 7 of the Revised United States Code.

By the direction of the Committee on Appropriations I reported to the House the first bill providing an appropriation to effectuate the new law. We awaited the outcome of the first year's proceedings with great interest, and it was a matter of disappointment to us when at the end of the first year we found we had a heavy deficit. At the hearings for the appropriation for the next year we discussed that phase of it with the representatives of the Department of Agriculture and explained to them that they must readjust their premiums to meet their indemnities, and they assured us that the loss the first year was due to inexperience and that after the first year they felt certain they could make the proposition self-sustaining. But each year of the 5 years in which it has been in operation they have reported a large deficit—the failure of the premiums to pay the indemnities—in addition to the uncompensated administrative expenses. Each year they have agreed that it is necessary to adjust premiums to make it self-sustaining and each year they have failed to do it. Each year there has been increasing protest from the House against a proposition which should be paying its way and each year it became increasingly difficult to get the appropriation through until this last year when the House in Committee of the Whole, rejected further appropriations for that purpose, by the decisive vote of 123 to 52, due to the fact that it felt the law had not been administered to make it self-sustaining when it might have been so administered.

Along with these regular deficits and a deficit averaging recently $7,000,000 to $8,000,000 a year, the administrative expenses averaged about $8,000,000 a year, so that the loss to the Government is approximately sixteen million a year at present.

Strange to say, along with this deficit there has been a declining interest on the part of the farmers. It is difficult to understand that, because there is unquestionably need for agricultural insurance and certainly the proposition has been more than favorable to the farmers. It has been so favorable, in fact, that the Government has been losing $16,000,000 a year and yet, notwithstanding the inadequate premiums, there has been a steady decline in the use of it.

Due to the fact, advertent or inadvertent, that different bases of computation have been used, there has been some uncertainty about the extent of participation on the part of the farmers. At times it has been based on the number of farms; at other times on the number of farmers; and at still other times it has been based upon acreage. Of course the only sound basis for computing participation is on acreage. Where you count by farms or by operators, it is possible to count the same man twice or not count him at all, but when you base your computation upon acreage there cannot be any mistake or inaccuracy, and based upon acreage there has been a steady decline in participation ever since the proposition became thoroughly established.

In view of the fact that there has been some difference of opinion on this score I will give the official acreage as reported to the Committee on Appropriations by the representatives of the Department.

In 1940 the acreage insured was 12,754,834.

In 1941, 11,734,263 acres were insured.

In 1942 there were 9,631,000 insured.

And the Department, at a hearing before the committee last week, estimated that participation in 1943 would be 9,000,000 acres.

So there has been a steady decline in participation. Farmers who at the beginning took insurance, after trying it for a year or two, dispensed with it.

The committee, in considering this bill, will have to take into consideration the fact that in this instance they are legislating for a great many other crops in addition to wheat and cotton.

Originally we started with the wheat farmers by way of experiment and almost immediately there was a demand from all producers for insurance of other farm crops. We added cotton, and there are now applications from practically every other farm product, so that the committee will now have to take into consideration the fact that in legislating on this bill they are not merely legislating for wheat and cotton but for a service which eventually will include all agricultural products. That is only consistent. You cannot refuse other farmers who are asking the same privilege you accord the wheat and cotton farmers. You cannot say, "We are insuring your neighbor's wheat and cotton but we won't insure your crop." So, eventually, whether we plan it that way or not, if we produce a practical and workable plan of insurance, it must be predicated upon the assumption that eventually, if not in the near future, many other agricultural products will be added.

Now, this bill has never been considered as a relief bill. It has always been presented, and the Committee on Appropriations has presented it to the House, on its merits and as a legitimate business proposition.

Of course, if you consider it a relief measure that is another matter, but it has never been considered on that basis and I am certain that the farmers would never desire it to be considered on that basis, and even if they did, it would be merely a question of time before the House would, as it has in the past, refuse to continue gratuitous appropriations and to provide these large amounts of money as relief measures. In short, our only chance to get crop insurance is to submit it on a purely business basis and consider it solely from a business point of view.

If it is to be considered from a business point of view it must be made self sustaining. There is no alternative. On that I think all members of the committee must agree, because you have had intimate association with it, both in committee and in the House and are fully cognizant of its history on the floor.

The House will not indefinitely make appropriations for any measures, for any group, or any industry, which is not self sustaining except in times of disaster or acute need for relief. In other words, the premiums must pay the indemnities.

It is possible that the House would agree to provide the overhead. At least I would advocate that. My proposition, as embodied in H. R. 3785, is that the United States Treasury meet the administrative expenses; in other words, that the Government be willing every year to put up the $8,000,000 necessary to administer the measure, but beyond that it is evident that the House will not be willing to go further and we cannot ask them to go further, and if we do ask them to go further, it will be denied. The income must pay the losses; the premiums must pay the indemnities. It must, to that extent, be self-supporting. The farmers themselves ask nothing more.

Mr. Speaker, it is to be hoped that arrangements can be made to bring the bill up for consideration when the House returns from its recess. Both the Department and the farmers should know at least 6 months in advance in order to plan for participation and administration.

Digest of Federal Legislation Affecting Labor, 1933 to 1944

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN LESINSKI

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. LESINSKI. Mr. Speaker, it is my honor and privilege to represent the largest industrial district in the world, which is in the heart of the "arsenal of democracy," and the greatest number of war plants in that "arsenal of democracy" are in my congressional district—the Sixteenth Congressional District of Michigan—and hundreds of thousands of patriotic men and women are toiling night and day in those plants, mills, factories, and shipyards.

I was first elected to the Seventy-third Congress and have continuously served during what has been called the decade of achievement under the leadership of our great Commander in Chief, President Franklin Delano Roosevelt.

During the years that I have served in Congress it has been one of my distinct pleasures to have served continuously as a member of the very important Committee on Labor of the National House of Representatives and, as a member of that committee, it has been my pleasure to assist in formulating and supporting those great measures which have been so beneficial to labor. I am proud of the fact that I have assisted in this program.

During the entire period of the Roosevelt administrations I have been the only Democrat from the State of Michigan who has served as a member of the Committee on Labor.

I have often been asked as to what legislation has been enacted during the Roosevelt administrations that has been beneficial to labor—many of us know about this law and that law but very few realize the great benefits that have been given labor during the past 11 years.

It would take much time to give a digest of all the laws, but I have compiled the following data as to the outstanding legislation that has been enacted from 1933 to 1944.

I have not included the Smith-Connally Act because I bitterly opposed that legislation and when it was approved by the House and Senate of the United States on June 25, 1943, over the objections of President Roosevelt's veto message, I introduced H. R. 3055, Seventy-eighth Congress, to repeal the provisions of that obnoxious piece of legislation.

The following is a digest of Federal legislation affecting labor from 1933 to 1944:

1933: National Industrial Recovery Act—Employment Agencies—Civil Works Administration—Civilian Conservation Corps.

As a direct result of the period of economic depression, the year 1933 saw the Federal Congress, as well as the State legislatures, enacting more legislation affecting employee relations than in any period in the Nation's history. The Federal Government adopted the National Industrial Recovery Act to rehabilitate trade and industry; enacted legislation—Wagner-Peyser Act—establishing a system of free public employment agencies in cooperation with the States; launched a tremendous program of public works, and created the Civil Works Administration and the Civilian Conservation Corps.

Congress established in the Wagner-Peyser Act a national system of employment agencies in cooperation with the States, under which the States were required to indicate their acceptance of the act's provisions. The Civil Works Administration was created to provide employment and relief to those unemployed and in need. The President was authorized to create an emergency conservation corps, under which a reforestation corps was created to do work in the forests such as the prevention of forest fires, floods, soil erosion, to construct roads in the national parks and forest reserves, and to protect those areas from the attacks of plant pests and diseases. Under part II of the National Recovery Act, calling for public works and construction projects, special labor provisions authorized a 30-hour week, called for the payment of just and reasonable wages, prohibited the use of convict labor, and outlined preferences in employment.

Other laws passed by Congress in 1933, affecting labor, were the Emergency Railroad Transportation Act, the Home Owners' Loan Act, the Emergency Relief Act, the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and the law authorizing the development of the Tennessee Valley and the operation of the Government properties at Muscle Shoals, Ala.

1934: The Seventy-third Congress met in a second session commencing January 3, 1934.

1935: National Labor Relations Act, Railroad Employees' Retirement Act, Motor Carrier Act, Federal Prison Labor Act, Bituminous Coal Conservation Act, Federal Emergency Relief Act, Social Security Act.

The Seventy-fourth Congress enacted some laws of a temporary nature, designed primarily to meet economic conditions resulting from the depression, and passed amendments to overcome constitutional objections to measures of that type already enacted, as well as laws to take the place of those declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court. It also inaugurated a program of permanent legislation, including the Social Security Act and the National Labor Relations Act.

Under the National Labor Relations Act, passed by Congress in 1935, it became the declared policy of the United States Government to encourage the practice and procedure of collective bargaining and to protect the rights of workers to organize for the purpose of negotiating the terms and conditions of their employment. Under this act the National Labor Relations Board, a quasi-judicial body of three members, was created to guarantee the right of collective bargaining, and to make certain that the employer does not engage in unfair labor practices.

Under the Railroad Retirement Act of 1935 a new railroad retirement system was provided. A pension law for railroad employees had been passed by the Seventy-third Congress, but this law had been declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court. Under the 1935 law, covering employees of any express, sleeping-car, or railroad company subject to the Interstate Commerce Act, it was provided that those employees may retire upon reaching 65 years or, regardless of age, after 30 years of service. The amount of the annuity to be paid to retired employees was determined by the average salary received, but not exceeding $120 per month. In addition to the act creating a retirement system, a companion law was passed, providing for an excise tax on employers of 3½ percent of the pay rolls and a similar tax on the wages of employees.

The Motor Carrier Act, which gave the Interstate Commerce Commission jurisdiction over transportation by motor carrier, was of particular interest to labor because it gave the Commission the power to make requirements as to qualifications and hours of service of employees and safety of operation and equipment. Section 222 (2) of this act made it a criminal offense, punishable by a fine of not more than $100 for the first offense and not more than $500 for any subsequent offense, for any person knowingly and willfully violating any provision of the act or any rule, regulation, requirement, or order thereunder.

Important from the viewpoint both of labor and industry was the so-called Ashurst-Sumners Act, designed to aid the States in enforcing statutes regulating or prohibiting the sale in the open market of prison-made goods. Under this law no person could transport prison-made goods into a State which forbids the sale of such products in the open market. It also required that all products produced by prison labor and shipped in interstate or foreign commerce must be marked, showing the name and address of the shipper and the consignee, as well as the contents and the name of the penal institution in which the goods were produced. Any violation of this act was punishable by a fine of $1,000 for each offense, the goods transported in violation of the act to be forfeited to the United States.

Familiarly known as the Guffey Act, the Bituminous Coal Conservation Act had as its aim the stabilization of the bituminous coal industry and the creation of better labor relations in that industry. Under its provisions there was established in the Department of the Interior a Bituminous Coal Commission of five members appointed by the President and authorized to formulate a bituminous coal code as a working agreement for the producers accepting its terms. In order to compel coal producers to accept the code as formulated by the Commission, it was provided that an excise tax of 15 percent of the sale price at the mine be imposed upon the sale or other disposal of all bituminous coal produced in the United States. Any coal producer who complied with the provisions of the code was entitled to a rebate of 90 percent of the amount of the tax. In establishing the code the Commission was required to incorporate in it the following provision:

Employees shall have the right to organize and bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and shall be free from interference, restraint, or coercion of employers, or their agents, in the designation of such representatives or in self-organization or in other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection; and no employee and no one seeking employment shall be required as a condition of employment to join any company union.

Employees shall have the right of peaceable assemblage for the discussion of the principles of collective bargaining, shall be entitled to select their own check-weighman to inspect the weighing or measuring of coal, and shall not be required as a condition of employment to live in company houses or to trade at the store of the employer.

Congress passed the Federal Emergency Relief Act, which was approved on April 8, 1935, in order to increase employment and to provide relief for the unemployed. The act appropriated $4,000,000,000, together with $880,000,000 from unexpended balances of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and Public Works Administration. This money was to be used in the discretion of the President for such projects as highways, grade-crossing elimination, rural rehabilitation and relief, water conservation, reclamation, rural electrification, housing, assistance for educational, professional, and clerical persons, the Civilian Conservation Corps, loans or grants, or both, for projects of States and other political subdivisions, and for self-liquidating projects of public bodies, sanitation, land and flood control, and reforestation.

Special provisions affecting labor were made in the Federal Emergency Relief Act. The President was authorized to fix wages for the various types of work. On permanent construction of Federal buildings the provisions of the Davis-Bacon Act relative to payment of the prevailing wage rate were made to apply, the rates to be determined in advance of any bidding. The President was also required to make certain that the payment of such wages on the projects financed by the Government should "not affect adversely or otherwise tend to decrease the going rates of wages paid for work of a similar nature." On all public highways and related projects, employment preferences were to be extended to persons receiving relief, and the hours of work and the rates of wages paid to skilled and unskilled labor on such projects must be predetermined for each State. Workmen's compensation was required to be paid for injuries received by an employee while engaged on any of the projects.

The Federal Social Security Act, approved on August 14, 1935, was of vast importance to labor, as it provided a means for States to create unemployment compensation systems and to eventually assure every worker an income during his old age. Title I of the act provided for grants to States for old-age assistance. Title II provided for the creation of a Federal old-age annuity system. Title III provided for grants to States having approved systems of unemployment compensation. In addition to these methods of providing security for workers, the act provided for assistance to needy dependent children, grants to States for maternal and child-health services, services for crippled children, child-welfare services, vocational rehabilitation of the physically disabled, public-health services, and aid to the blind.

The year 1935 also saw the extension by congressional action of certain provisions of the National Industrial Recovery Act, enactment of legislation affecting Federal employees, passage of the old-age pension law of the District of Columbia and the District of Columbia Unemployment Compensation Act, and amendment of the Davis-Bacon Act relating to contracts affecting public works.

1936: Although many acts affecting the welfare of workers, either directly or indirectly, were passed by the second session of the Seventy-fourth Congress—January 3, 1936, to June 20, 1936—one of the most important was the Public Contracts Act. This was designed to maintain proper standards of hours, wages, and working conditions on Government contracts for the manufacture or the furnishing of materials, and so forth, in the amount of more than $10,000. Under this act certain prescribed labor standards were required to be maintained by the contractor, including an 8-hour day, 40-hour week, prohibition of child labor and the labor of prisoners, and maintenance of the prevailing rate of wages in the locality where the work was to be performed. Administration of the law was placed within the jurisdiction of the Secretary of Labor, who promulgates necessary rules and regulations to carry out the provisions of the act, which became effective October 1, 1936.

Through the provisions of Public Act No. 776, Congress prohibited the interstate transportation of persons for the purpose of interfering with the right of peaceful picketing during labor controversies. The Judiciary Committee, in reporting the bill to Congress, had declared that the legislation was aimed at those persons and organizations whose regular business was the furnishing, for large fees, of strike breakers to take part in labor controversies. The act provided that—

> Whoever shall knowingly transport or cause to be transported, or aid or abet in transporting, in interstate or foreign commerce, any person with intent to employ such person to obstruct or interfere, in any manner, with the right of peaceful picketing during any labor controversy affecting wages, hours, or conditions of labor, or the right of organization for the purpose of collective bargaining, shall be deemed guilty of a felony and shall be punishable by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding 2 years, or both, in the discretion of the court.

During the closing days of the 1936 Congress, legislation was adopted granting to the States jurisdiction and authority to apply their State workmen's compensation laws on all property belonging to the Federal Government. This act was particularly important because before its passage many employees engaged in the construction, and so forth, of public buildings and works of the United States had been deprived of workmen's compensation when injury or death had resulted from an industrial accident.

Through the provisions of Public Act No. 487, the Railway Labor Act was amended in 1936 by bringing within its provisions common carriers by air engaged in interstate or foreign commerce, as well as those carriers engaged in the transportation of the mails, including the employees of such carriers. Employees of air-transportation companies were thus assured of the right to organize and bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing.

In 1936 several laws governing the employment of labor on vessels were passed. Public Act 808 provided that 75 percent of the crew of every American ship, exclusive of licensed officers, must be citizens of the United States. Licensed officers, coal passers, and sailors were placed on a 3-watch basis, with an 8-hour day at sea. Monthly inspection of crew quarters was required. Under the terms of the Ship Subsidy Act the United States Maritime Commission established by the act was authorized to investigate employment and wage conditions in ocean transportation and to incorporate in subsidy contracts minimum manning and wage standards, and reasonable working standards. Public Act No. 622 created a marine casualty investigation board and provided for stricter and more efficient administration of the steamboat-inspection laws. Three acts were passed to provide for the safety of passengers and employees of vessels while at sea.

1937: Unemployment census; promotion of labor standards for apprentices; railroads; social security; Bituminous Coal Act; United States Housing Act.

During the 229 days of the first session of the Seventy-fifth Congress, much time was devoted to consideration of a bill to reorganize the judicial system of the United States. Extensive hearings were held on this and many other bills of interest and importance to labor, including the wages and hours bill which failed of passage.

Public Act No. 409 provided for the first governmental count of the unemployed.

The information to be obtained by that census, including the number of unemployed, statistics on partial employment and job opportunities, was to be determined by the Secretaries of Labor and Commerce, the Works Progress Administrator, the Chairman of the Central Statistical Board, the Chairman of the Social Security Board, the Director of the Census.

In Public Act No. 308 Congress empowered the Department of Labor to formulate and promote the furtherance of labor standards necessary to safeguard the welfare of apprentices. Such work had been earlier carried on by the National Youth Administration. The new act sought the cooperation of employers and labor in the formulation of apprenticeship programs and was also designed to assist those States engaged in promoting standards of apprenticeship.

Two acts, Public, Nos. 162 and 174, respectively, provided for a railroad employees' retirement and tax system. This legislation was the result of an agreement between representatives of the carriers and the employees following the decision of the United States District Court for the District of Columbia, declaring partially unconstitutional the act of 1935. Under the 1937 act employees became eligible to retire voluntarily at 65 years of age or to retire at 60 years of age after completing 30 years' service, with a reduction in the annuity at the rate of one one-hundred-and-eightieth for each month the employee is under 65 years of age. Death benefits were provided for the deceased employee's estate and taxes, ranging from 2¾ to 3¾ percent, on carriers and employees, were levied to pay for the retirement benefits.

In order that the Social Security Board might continue and make available to June 30, 1939, grants to States for old-age assistance, $18,000,000 was appropriated. In another action, Congress appropriated for the States enacting approved unemployment-insurance laws in 1937 a portion of the proceeds from the 1936 employers' tax. Thus all States complying with the Federal act were placed on the same basis with respect to their unemployment-insurance funds.

The National Bituminous Coal Commission was established in the Department of the Interior by Public Act No. 48. While this act, providing for the regulation of interstate commerce in the soft-coal industry, was similar in many respects to the 1935 act, the labor provisions were not included. Congress had, however, declared a policy of employees' rights to collective bargaining, and so forth.

Under the terms of the United States Housing Act, a national housing authority was created in the Department of the Interior. The act authorized loans to public housing agencies to assist in the development, acquisition, or administration of low-rent housing or slum-clearance project by such agencies.

1938: Fair Labor Standards Act, Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act, Maritime Labor Board, Work Relief Act of 1938, Workmen's Compensation, National Employment System.

The Federal wage-and-hour law, the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, was one of the most important labor measures adopted in recent years, particularly because of the invalidation by the United States Supreme Court of the National Industrial Recovery Act in 1935. The Fair Labor Standards Act provided a minimum wage and maximum straight-time workweek for employees engaged in interstate commerce. Certain industries were specifically exempt. Employment of children under 16 years of age was prohibited, and also employment of children under 18 in hazardous occupations. The Children's Bureau of the Department of Labor was charged with the regulation of the child-labor provisions. To administer the law, a Wage and Hour Division was created in the Department of Labor. Penalties for violation were provided.

The Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act provided a comprehensive system of unemployment insurance for employees of carriers engaged in interstate commerce. Under this act contributions were to be made exclusively by the carriers. The costs of the system, including both the payment of unemployment benefits and the administration of the act, were to be paid from funds into which were to be deposited the taxes collected from employers. Administration of the act was vested in the Railroad Retirement Board.

By an amendment to the Merchant Marine Act of 1936, approved on June 23, 1938, a Federal Maritime Labor Board was established to aid in the settlement of disputes between maritime employers and employees. The primary function of this board was to encourage all maritime employers, their officers and agents and their employees, to bargain collectively and endeavor to settle disputes amicably.

Public Resolution No. 122, approved on June 21, 1938, provided appropriations for work relief as well as for general relief, and for increasing employment by loans and grants for public-work projects.

A number of changes in the Federal Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act resulted from the enactment of Public Act No. 727. The workmen's compensation law applicable to the District of Columbia was amended by Public Act No. 619. Heretofore, the act had been applicable to all employers. By the amendatory legislation, clerical workers of any Member of Congress became exempt from the terms of the act.

The Wagner-Peyser Act, which established a national employment system, was amended in 1938 so as to permit larger appropriations for the National Employment Service. Previously, 75 percent of the appropriations had been apportioned among the States. The amended act provided that Congress shall designate the amounts to be apportioned by the director.

1939: Social security — Railroads — Maritime workers—Wages and hours—Work relief.

The first session of the Seventy-sixth Congress—January 3 to August 5, 1939—enacted legislation in several fields of interest to labor. A number of amendments to the Social Security Act and the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act were made. Strenuous efforts were made to amend both the Fair Labor Standards Act and the National Labor Relations Act.

The principal changes in the social-security law relating to the tax features of the Federal Social Security Act, the liberalization of the old-age insurance system, and the extension of Federal-State programs of social security. By the enactment of the amendments, monthly old-age insurance benefits became payable in 1940 to qualified workers of 65 or over, instead of 1942. The coverage of the Federal old-age insurance system was extended to nearly a million persons not under the original law. The amendatory legislation also provided benefits for wives and children, and widows and orphans of insured workers, or, in some cases, their dependent fathers and mothers. Financial aid for public health, maternal and child welfare, crippled children, and vocational education was increased. Changes were also made in the tax provisions of the act.

Public Act No. 141 amended the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act, with the waiting time changed by requiring a single waiting period of 15 days, in which there are 8 or more days of unemployment, and the special provisions applicable to part-time workers were repealed placing all employees on the same basis.

By Public Act No. 99 seamen were permitted to make allotments of their wages for deposit in a savings bank or a United States postal-savings depository. Public Act No. 188 made effective the provisions of the officers' competency certificates convention, 1936, as ratified September 1, 1938, concerning the minimum requirement of professional capacity for masters and officers on board merchant vessels. Another act—Public Act No. 16—exempted all vessels of the United States of less than 200 tons gross registered tonnage from the provisions of the convention of 1936 as ratified.

Although several amendments to the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 were introduced in the House, the only change in that law approved by the Seventy-sixth Congress was the exemption of switchboard operators employed in public telephone exchanges having less than 500 stations.

A number of legislative measures on relief were adopted by the Seventy-sixth Congress. The Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1939 provided for work relief to be administered by the Work Projects Administration under the supervision of a Commissioner of Work Projects.

1940: Among the many measures affecting labor enacted by the third session of the Seventy-sixth Congress and the first session of the Seventy-seventh Congress was a supplemental appropriation for national defense (Public Act No. 781) which provided that notwithstanding the provisions of any law, work in excess of 8 hours shall be permitted, provided compensation for all hours over 8 is not less than 1½ times the basic rate of pay on contracts covered by the 8-hour law. The act permitted the Secretary of War to waive requirements of payment and performance bond—Heard Act—on contracts for public works for the Military Establishment entered into upon a cost-plus-fixed-fee basis out of funds appropriated for and authorized for the fiscal year 1941.

Public Act No. 831 suspended the 8-hour law on contracts entered into by the United States Maritime Commission for construction, alteration, or repair of vessels provided time and a half is paid for hours in excess of 8 a day and 40 a week. Nothing in this act was to be construed as modifying any contract between management and labor in shipyards which provide for conditions more favorable to labor than provided in this act.

An act designed to expedite housing in connection with national defense provided that laborers and mechanics employed on construction, repair, or demolition work connected with national defense housing projects may work in excess of 3 hours a day provided wages shall be computed on a basic day rate of 8 hours, and work in excess of 8 hours shall be paid at not less than 1½ times the basic rate. The Administrator of the Federal Works Agency was designated to administer the defense-housing program and payment of not less than prevailing wages was required on all projects.

Extension of the 1937 Sugar Act was authorized by Public Act No. 860, with labor provisions on child labor and minimum wage determinations by the Secretary of Agriculture. The Sugar Act, which would have expired December 31, 1940, was extended by 1 additional year.

The first session of the Seventy-seventh Congress extended the provisions of the Bituminous Coal Act of 1937, authorized the Secretary of the Interior, in cooperation with the Bureau of Mines or other safety agencies, to make annual or necessary inspections and investigations in coal mines whose products regularly enter or substantially affect interstate commerce, for obtaining information on health, safety, and causes of accidents and occupational diseases in those mines. Such information was to be used as a guide to legislation, as a basis to determine the most effective use of public funds to eradicate nonhealthful and unsafe conditions and as a basis for reports, studies, and statistics. This session also extended the life of the Maritime Labor Board and made the Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Act applicable in cases of injury or death to employees engaged in any employment at any military, air, or naval base acquired after January 1, 1940, by the United States from any foreign government or any lands occupied or used by the United States for military or naval purposes in any Territory or possession outside of the continental United States, excepting the Canal Zone. Public Law No. 271 changed the title of the District of Columbia Minimum Wage Board to the Board of Minimum Wage and Industrial Safety and directed the Board to make, under appropriate procedure, safety and health rules having the force of law, and to administer the provisions of the act. This act required employers in the District of Columbia to keep places of employment safe and healthful for employees, to keep records and to report on industrial accidents. Section 7 (b) (2) of the Fair Labor Standards Act was amended by Public Law 283 to limit hours on an annual instead of a weekly basis for those employed in pursuance of a collective-bargaining agreement certified by the National Labor Relations Board. The annual limit of hours was raised from 2,000 to 2,080, thus permitting an average workweek of 40 hours instead of approximately 38½ hours.

Public Law No. 380 amended section 7 of the District of Columbia child-labor law to authorize the Board of Education to issue work permits allowing minors 14 years or over, who have completed 8 grades of elementary instruction or its equivalent, to perform in licensed theaters until 11 p. m., instead of 7 p. m., for boys under 16 and girls under 18 as formerly.

The Sugar Act of 1937 was extended and continued up to and including 1944, including the labor provisions.

1942: The second session of the Seventy-seventh Congress amended section 1 (c) of the Walsh-Healey Act to exempt from the overtime provisions employees who are exempt under the Fair Labor Standards Act because they are employed on an annual basis for more than 2,080 hours in pursuance of a bona fide collective bargaining agreement.

Public Law No. 620 prohibited defense contractors from denying employment on account of failure to produce a birth certificate to any person who submits in lieu of such birth certificate an honorable discharge certificate from the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, or Coast Guard, unless the certificate shows on its face that the person may have been an alien at the time of its issuance.

The United States Employees Compensation Act was amended to authorize the Commission to establish a minimum monthly wage base on which death compensation shall be computed in the case or classes of noncitizen employees who sustain injuries outside the United States.

One of the most important enactments of the second session of the Seventy-seventh Congress was that of Public Law No. 729, approved October 2, 1942, which authorized the President, on or before November 1, 1942, to issue a general order stabilizing prices, wages, and salaries on the basis of levels existing on September 15, 1942. The act empowered the President to make adjustments with respect to prices, wages, and salaries to the extent that he finds it necessary to aid in prosecution of the war or to correct gross inequities. This act prohibited any action with respect to wages and salaries which was inconsistent with the provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act or the National Labor Relations Act, or for the purpose of reducing the wages or salaries for any particular work below the highest wages or salaries paid therefor between January 1, 1942, and September 15, 1942. Under this act employers were forbidden to pay and employees to receive wages or salaries in contravention of regulations promulgated by the President under this act.

1943: The first session of the Seventy-eighth Congress took action on matters of principal concern to labor. In Public Law No. 28 the Secretary of the Navy was authorized to pay transportation costs of civilian employees to and from places of duty in the Naval Establishment outside the continental United States, or in Alaska.

As a rider to the Public Debt Act of 1943, Congress amended the wage stabilization law—Public Law No. 729—to delete the following phrase:

Provided, That the President may, without regard to the limitation contained in clause (2), adjust wages or salaries to the extent that he finds necessary in any case to correct gross inequities and also aid in the effective prosecution of the war.

Public Law No. 45 made an appropriation of $26,100,000 for the calendar year 1943 to be expended by the Administrator of Food Production and Distribution, and the agricultural extension services of the land-grant colleges for assisting in providing an adequate supply of workers for the production and harvesting of agricultural commodities essential to the prosecution of the war.

The women's-hours law of the District of Columbia was amended to authorize the Minimum Wage and Industrial Safety Board to grant temporary permits to employers to work females more than 8 hours a day and 48 hours a week upon showing that such action is essential to the war effort. Weekly hours were limited to 54 and pay at the rate of time and a half for hours in excess of 8 a day and 48 a week made mandatory.

Section 9 of the Selective Training and Service Act was amended in Public Law No. 89 as the War Labor Disputes Act. This provided that the power of the President to take possession of plants extended to any plant, mine or facility where suspension of operation as a result of labor disturbance interferes with the prosecution of the war. It required the return to private operation of any business taken over within 60 days after restoration of productive efficiency and prohibited taking possession after the war ends, and terminated authority to operate any plant taken over 6 months after the war. It also required plants taken over to be operated under the terms and conditions of employment which were in effect at time of possession. Under the act, the Government agency operating the plant or a majority of the employees may apply to the War Labor Board for a change in wages or other conditions of employment. The War Labor Board is given statutory authority and the right, whenever a labor dispute may lead to substantial interference with the war, to initiate hearings on a dispute and take jurisdiction over it. In the case of war production, a notice of intention to strike is required and it is unlawful to strike until a strike vote has been conducted by the National Labor Relations Board on the thirtieth day after notice has been filed. Persons who violate this section are liable for damages to any person injured thereby or to the United States.

Public Law No. 113 amended the Vocational Rehabilitation Act of 1920 to extend coverage to all disabled persons instead of only those physically disabled. It set up a new plan for providing vocational rehabilitation to war disabled civilians—those disabled while serving in Aircraft Warning Service, Civil Air Patrol, Citizens' Defense Corps, or as a registered trainee for such services, and officers or members of the crew of a vessel owned or chartered by the Maritime Commission of the War Shipping Administration. It is provided that the entire cost of the program for war disabled civilians shall be paid to the States by the United States Treasury.

The District of Columbia Appropriation Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARENCE CANNON
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I have been rather intimately associated with the formulation of the District of Columbia appropriation bills for many years, having served as a member of that committee under the chairmanship of Robert G. Simmons, of Nebraska, one of the ablest members who ever served on the Committee on Appropriations, and now on the supreme bench of his State, and later as chairman myself.

It is a difficult bill. It involves a plethora of detail and its beneficiaries are on our doorstep. But it is one of the most important of all the annual supply bills. The city of Washington is, consciously or unconsciously, taken as a model by other metropolitan areas of the Nation. It is in effect a guinea pig on which are tried out many theories of municipal administration. Other cities send delegations here to study our school system, our police department, our library system, our fire department, our social-welfare set-up, and our methods in administration of innumerable other city facilities and problems. In my opinion we have through constant study in the limelight of congressional scrutiny developed the most effective and efficient system of municipal administration in the Nation or in the world.

It follows that the membership of the committee in charge of this bill must be selected with particular care and I think I gave more thought to the make-up of that committee in the Seventy-eighth Congress than to the personnel of any other subcommittee of the 10 subcommittees in charge of the annual bills. Consequently, it has been a matter of gratification to note the skill with which Chairman COFFEE and his committee have handled the appropriations for 1945, and it is a matter of particular pleasure to observe the reaction of Washington businessmen themselves. I am therefore including as a part of my remarks one of many favorable comments on the subject, in this instance an editorial from the Washington Star, as follows:

A GOOD BILL

The District appropriation bill reported to the House yesterday reflects the work of a sympathetic subcommittee, conscious of local needs, anxious to meet them insofar as revenue and war restrictions permit and impressed by some of the inequitable divisions of cost which have placed a disproportionate burden on the local taxpayer. Chairman COFFEE and his colleagues deserve the warm appreciation of Washingtonians for the fair-minded attitude displayed throughout the hearings and in their report to the House.

Under Chairman COFFEE there is thus promised a continued improvement in relations between Congress and the local community which holds much promise for Washington. Not many years ago the District suffered under a committee dominated by a chairman who sought to make his continued hostility to the District a political platform back home. The voters removed him, as they have others before him. Under the chairmanship of Representative MAHON, of Texas, and now of Mr. COFFEE, the House Subcommittee on District Appropriations has become a constructive force in development of the Capital.

The bill just reported shows the abnormal effects on local finances of the war, which has reduced availability of personnel and has cut construction to a minimum. The silver lining to that cloud has been the opportunity to wipe the slate clean of indebtedness, and to earmark unexpendable revenues for post-war public works. But of even more fundamental importance to the District has been the subcommittee's recognition of such unfair conditions as the maintenance of a National Zoo at local expense; the creation with local revenues of national parks within the District and under Federal control; the development of a water system by the local taxpayer controlled in part by the Army and from which the National Government receives returns, in the form of free water, far in excess of its own investment. As Mr. COFFEE says, the people of the District would be far better off if they had their own water system.

Although the District has suffered in the past by legislative riders on appropriation bills, creating many of the very inequities to which the subcommittee points in its report, the remedy evidently must lie in new legislation, divorced from the appropriation bill. That, at least, is the course recommended by Mr. COFFEE, who suggests to the Commissioners the preparation of legislation on the zoo, the parks, and other matters. With the influential support thus given by the House Appropriations Committee, they no doubt will take full advantage of the recommendations.

The War Congress, 1943–44

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MAURICE J. SULLIVAN
OF NEVADA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. SULLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, as we are about to take a recess in the closing year of the Seventy-eighth Congress, I deem it appropriate to note the progress of our work to date, as a branch of the Congress and as individual Representatives. It is for us now to give an account of our stewardship for even as we are, by virtue of a 2-year term of office, nearer to the people, we are all the more bound to demonstrate that we are responsive, responsible, and reliable to the satisfaction of the electorate who will shortly sit in judgment upon us all. Rarely has so great a task fallen to any Congress. War is the great test of democratic institutions for power must be centralized to secure the common defense and a centralization of power is ordinarily incompatible with democracy. We did not completely measure up to the test in World War No. 1, for while we won the war we lost the peace and permitted to be planted the seeds of future wars.

Mr. Speaker, the great work of the Nation and the great work of the Seventy-eighth Congress has been that devoted to winning the war. It meant a great task of mobilization. We mobilized our Army, our Navy, and our Air Forces. We mobilized the productive capacity of our farms, forests, fisheries, and mines, our merchant ships and our highways, our accumulated wealth, and our current income. We imposed restraints on our citizens in every field which in peacetime they were accustomed to call fields of liberty. We regulated the supply and price of food, clothing, shelter, the things of the home, the shop, the farm, and the mine. With all of this, we carried on the ordinary affairs of government and we created administrative agencies to see that every citizen contributed his fair share to the common effort and no more.

Mr. Speaker, the duty that fell on the National Government and its legislative branch was not one that could be abdicated or imposed on the people as a whole or on the several States, nor could they justly expect to exercise it. It was a duty that called for centralized power through centralized authority. It called for Nation-wide action planned by Federal legislation and enforced by an administrative arm of Congress.

Mr. Speaker, we cannot say that in providing for the administration of wartime regulations and restraints we have satisfied all the people all the time, but we have given as much satisfaction as the nature of the emergency would permit. No one has escaped. No one has been granted a preferred right. No better plan has been suggested. The people realize, like the soldier, that an uncomfortable fox hole is better than no fox hole at all. Today we are spending about $8,000,000,000 per month for all purposes. We have more than doubled production of crops and production of goods. We are maintaining two existences, a wartime existence and a peacetime existence, where before we had only one. We are running in high gear. We have had to find administrators, staff them, survey the territory and the problems, proclaim the regulations and enforce them through the agency of ordinary human beings. We had to act without experience, and through trial and error learn from experience.

The Seventy-eighth Congress has to date appropriated nearly $182,000,000,000, collecting this sum equally from taxation and the sale of bonds. One hundred and fourteen billions were appropriated in the first session and sixty-seven billions in the second session. Forty billions in appropriations were also carried over from the first year. The actual expenditures, excluding contract allotments, were in the neighborhood of $96,000,000,000 per year of which ninety billions or 95 percent were for war purposes entirely, although considerably more indirectly aided the war effort. The bonded debt is now two hundred billions. The tax burden, while heavy, was lightened by bond sales and justly so, for the succeeding generations will owe a debt to liberty no less than the present generation. We have simplified tax returns and we by-passed one tax year of the income tax by collecting one-fourth more for 1944 to put the taxpayer on a current basis rather than in arrears. This exemption of three-fourths of the 1943 income tax was, unfortunately, of more benefit to those in the higher brackets of income during the war years than to those in the middle and lower brackets.

Due to the insistence of the administration the social progress and gains of the last decade have not been sacrificed or impaired. The National Labor Relations Act, the Fair Labor Standards Act, the Social Security Act and various measures for the benefit of the farmers and for borrowers have been maintained as a part of the liberty we are fighting to preserve.

Mr. Speaker, the work of Congress would have failed were it not for the cooperation of the people in the war effort. The contribution of labor has been magnificent on the part of both men and women in wartime industries. No amount of capital investment, no wealth of natural resources or materials, no plan of war could have succeeded without the wholehearted devotion, industry, and patriotism of our men and women who turned the raw materials into the finished product. The splendid record of industry could not have been made without the cooperation of labor. Under a voluntary pledge against wartime strikes, work has continued at 99.8 percent efficiency, a record unequalled anywhere in the present-day world. We are winning the war with our hands and our hearts rather than with our minds and our money.

The soldier-vote bill, Mr. Speaker, does not offer complete satisfaction to anyone and I do not think it represents that recognition for the servicemen that they could justly expect. Unfortunately some feared the result and therefore desired to limit the vote, while others resisted Federal authority to prescribe voting qualifications in their States because they considered it inimical to their traditions involving racial barriers. The provisions of the Worley bill in the House and of the Green-Lucas bill in the Senate were better, but they were sacrificed rather than expose all legislation to defeat.

Among the many measures enacted by this Congress for the current and postwar relief and benefit of the veterans and servicemen, their dependents, and kin, the G. I. bill of rights stands out as a monument to the studious labor and humanity of the members. It is not alone a strong influence upon morale at home and abroad, but is a material and effective factor making for a healthy postwar recovery in this country and an insurance against deflation and the effects of unemployment.

The strong stand of the President in vetoing the bill designed to outlaw subsidies in aid of price control, and the wise action of the Congress in continuing the Price Control and Price Stabilization Acts without banning subsidies, has resulted in protecting this country from an era of inflation that would have—if the history of the last war is considered—increased the cost of the present war to date by $65,000,000,000 and perhaps discouraged our productive capacity to a comparable extent. Great pressure was brought to bear to throw the economy of the Nation in wartime into the grip of the law of supply and demand. This was done in spite of the fact that a continually increasing supply of cheap money bearing on a continually decreasing supply of goods available for civilian and war purposes, would defeat the operation of any normal relation between a fixed supply of money and a flexible supply of goods. The proposal invited nothing less than inflation constantly spiraling upward and thinning out real wages to be followed by a postwar deflation even without precedent in the disastrous years following World War No. 1. The fight against inflation by keeping price control affected 130,000,000 persons, 35,000,000 families, 3,000,000 business establishments, and 14,000,000 rental quarters. It involved the fixing of 8,000,000 prices and the holding of wartime price increases in the cost of living to 26 percent whereas in the first year of World War No. 1 the increase was 28 percent, in 1919 it was 72 percent, and in 1920 it was 108 percent over the 1914 base. With Government war purchases amounting to 55 percent of total production a subsidy of $450,000,000 would prevent a rise in prices of three and a half billions, thus giving relief to consumer, taxpayer, and producer at the rate of relief of $8 for every $1 distributed in subsidies.

Mr. Speaker, price control with freedom from inflation at a time surplus income can be channeled into the pools of taxation and bond investment is perhaps the greatest blessing of all snatched from the war by a wise Congress inspired by a courageous President. It is a strong base on which to build a firm post-war economy which might otherwise be wrecked on the rocks of inflation.

Much remains to be done, Mr. Speaker, but the war emergency has been met and the domestic economy and finance have received timely attention. We still have a war and a peace to win and we must in good time prepare for the transition. We may look forward to the time when the great powers drained from the people and the States are restored to their proper peacetime owners, but even as mobilization has been a Federal problem, decentralization must be a Federal task. The States cannot demobilize, nor can the people. The Federal Government must liquidate the war, the war contracts, the war supplies, the war industries, and the war obligations. Certainly the States cannot do these things, but they can prepare to resume local government and to put into effect plans to prevent unemployment and plans for deferred construction, improvements, and services held in abeyance for the day of victory. The Nation has responded to the war emergency; Congress as the legislative branch has passed good laws and avoided, on the whole, detrimental enactments. I am proud of the history made here, all of which I saw, much of which I was, and I welcome the judgment of our fellow citizens, which it is their privilege and duty to give at the coming election. The duty to serve rests upon us all. Let us hope we may measure up to the performance of our gallant sons and daughters who are ready to sacrifice—and many of whom have already sacrificed—life itself that our Nation may live.

Profit Control

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PAUL W. SHAFER
OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include an exchange of letters with the Honorable Chester Bowles, of the Office of Price Administration, relative to a statement on profit control by Dr. Ivan Wright, professor of economics at Brooklyn College, which I inserted in the RECORD of June 13. Mr. Bowles' letter and my reply follows:

OFFICE OF PRICE ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, D. C., June 22, 1944.

The Honorable PAUL W. SHAFER,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SHAFER: I have read with some interest the statement which you inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on June 13. This was a statement which you reported had been prepared by Dr. Ivan Wright, professor of economics at Brooklyn College. It related to the subject of profit control and I should like to comment upon the various points made in that statement.

I have no quarrel with Dr. Wright's thesis that profit control would get down to the very mainspring of our economy. I disagree, however, with his allegation that the Office of Price Administration has undertaken to regulate profits per se.

Dr. Wright makes much of the fact that, when profits are taken away from the businessman, his incentive to produce has also been taken away. My experience as a businessman would offer no contradictions to this statement. However, it seems to me that Dr. Wright has lost sight of the realities of the current situation and has not adapted his theory to the current picture. He seems to be arguing that higher profits should be encouraged so that production will also increase. What he fails to see is that we, as a Nation, are and have for some months, been producing at our maximum capacity. We are using our plants, equipment, manpower, and land resources to the maximum. I fail to see how it would be possible to use them more intensively. Further profits would certainly not create a greater labor force than that now being employed. Almost every report which cites difficulties in reaching production goals, attributes the responsibility to a lack of manpower. Adding several times to current profits could not create any greater labor force, would not yield any greater amount of production. All that it can do is divert production from one field to another and only over a period of time. The Congress in its wisdom early recognized the fact that prices could not be used to control the direction of production during a war period. Through the Second War Powers Act it provided for the establishment of production agencies such as the W. P. B. which could directly allocate materials into lines of production which we wished to encourage. The role of price in this connection would be to see that price impediments do not upset the allocations and production schedules of the production agencies.

I can illustrate this point perhaps by citing a recent order which this Office issued providing for a 7½-percent increase in the ceiling prices on chemical wood-pulp mimeograph paper. Here the War Production Board, recognizing the critical supply situation in the case of pulp for paper, determined that a lighter weight of chemical mimeograph paper should be produced. This would require the use of smaller quantities of pulp and would produce the same number of sheets of paper. However, the production of lighter weight paper involved added costs not experienced by the manufacturer in producing the former heavier weight. This Office coordinated its price program with the production program of W. P. B. As a result, users of mimeograph paper will have the same number of sheets, there will be a conservation of pulp, and consequently, a more efficient use of our resources. Thus we have taken action to assure that price will not be an impediment to production.

Dr. Wright's statement would seem to imply that O. P. A. controls have restricted profits and have hampered production. The facts are these: Industrial and agricultural production figures are at all-time highs. Industrial and agricultural income and profit figures are also at all-time peaks. If, as Dr. Wright charges, O. P. A. has sought to control profits and has thereby hindered production, then certainly we have realized a very major failure to attain our purpose; if that were our purpose. Either we are wholly incompetent as regulators of profit or we have no such intention and have not sought to accomplish this purpose. We have, however, sought to maintain stable prices and it is the stabilization of prices rather than the control of profits which is our purpose. The record speaks for itself. Prices have been stabilized; profits are up and production is up.

Dr. Wright makes much of the fact that businessmen, both large and small, who provide the knowledge and the capital for enterprise, must be able to see and plan ahead. Here, I am in complete agreement with Dr. Wright. I feel that no one thing makes business planning so difficult as a complete inability to estimate what prices will be in the near and somewhat distant future. So long as prices are stable, business plans can be carefully made and soundly executed; when they are fluctuating wildly, as they did during the last war, business planning becomes almost pure guesswork and production is hurt. This is amply borne out by our experience in the last war when prices fluctuated wildly and, during the period from 1914 to 1918, went up almost 80 percent in the case of industrial prices. This 80-percent increase in industrial prices was accompanied by a 25-percent increase in industrial production. During the comparable period in this war, from 1939 through 1943, prices of industrial goods rose only 22 percent but production increased 131 percent, a complete reversal of World War No. 1 experience when prices rose more rapidly than production did. It is interesting in this connection to note that in the last year of World War No. 1 when prices were fluctuating wildly, industrial production actually declined over the previous year. This, I think, answers the point that no one thing contributes so much to sound business planning as a stable price structure.

Sincerely,

CHESTER BOWLES,
Administrator.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C.

Hon. CHESTER BOWLES,
Administrator, Office of Price Administration,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BOWLES: I have your letter of June 22 in which you commented upon the statement by Dr. Ivan Wright, professor of economics at Brooklyn College, on the subject of profit control, which I inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 13.

I am glad to note that you do not quarrel with Dr. Wright's thesis that profit control affects "the very mainspring of our economy." It was that thought, as well as Dr. Wright's forthright clear and yet simple exposition of this key problem of the reconversion and post-war periods, that led me to give wider currency to his statement through the RECORD.

I am also happy to learn that your experience as a businessman offered no contradictions to Dr. Wright's statement that, when profits are taken away, a businessman's incentive to produce has also been taken away. It seems to me, however, that you have misread Dr. Wright's statement if you got out of it the view that Dr. Wright has any quarrel with price control and a stable price structure. On the contrary, as I read the statement, he is quite complimentary of the sensible manner in which price control in general has been conducted during the war period. He only asks that the same sensible policy which governed the highly successful conversion from peace to war production be applied in the reconversion back to a peacetime economy. Since he was concerned only with reconversion pricing, what you say about present capacity production for war does not seem to affect the argument at all.

I have found nothing at all in his statement to indicate that he wants higher profits to bring about increases in production at this time. All he asks is that the O. P. A. refrain from issuing directives and orders which prevent producers from making a reasonable profit, or any profit, on civilian goods during reconversion. In this connection, he refers specifically to your MPR 188 as an example of an order regulating profits per se, as you put it. I see nothing in your letter specifically replying to his assertion that this order eliminates profits, and that similar directives of this kind would prevent orderly reconversion.

It seems to me that your letter in no way answers Dr. Wright's charge that MPR 188 and the so-called Vinson directive tend to eliminate the profit motive, and therefore will hamper reconversion. Since you agree with Dr. Wright, as I did, on the broad principle that profit control gets down to the very mainspring of our economy, I do not see why you do not also feel the way he does about specific orders that provide for no profit to producers of particular products.

Thank you for having written me.

Sincerely yours,

PAUL SHAFER.

Army Shoes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN J. COCHRAN
OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, several weeks ago, following the speech of CALVIN D. JOHNSON, of Illinois, in which he stated army shoes were being ground up for fertilizer, I called upon the commanding general of the Army Service Forces for a report.

Under date of June 17 he wrote me explaining in part the disposition of army shoes unfit for use. He promised me at the time that they would make a further investigation.

Under the permission granted me, I now include as part of my remarks a letter from Lt. Gen. Brehon Somervell which follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
ARMY SERVICE FORCES,
Washington, D. C., July 6, 1944.

Hon. JOHN J. COCHRAN,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. COCHRAN: Supplementing my letter of June 7, 1944, I am writing to inform you of the results of an investigation of the reported sale of "good, newly repaired Army shoes" to Smith-Rowland Co., of Granite City, Ill., for conversion to fertilizer.

Investigation fails to confirm this allegation. The shoes, classified as unsuitable for rebuilding for Army use, were bought and paid for by used shoe dealers. On inspection, the dealers determined that the shoes were not worth the cost of transportation. The lots were then shipped, collect, by the purchaser's agent, to Smith-Rowland Co. The specific details of the transaction are set out more fully below.

The Granite City, Ill., plant of Smith-Rowland Co. purchased, in all, five carloads of Army shoes, four in the fall of 1943 and one in June of 1944. An examination of the bills of lading shows that the shipper was Roy Jameson, of Hannibal, Mo.

The four carloads shipped in 1943 were part of a quantity of 4,002,515 pounds of salvage shoes, unfit for further Army use, purchased by the Army Salvage Co., of Chicago, Ill., during the period from March 5, 1943, to May 8, 1944. These carloads were inspected at Hannibal by the principal owner and manager of the Army Salvage Co., who arranged to dump the shoes, because the lots were so poor that they did not justify payment of the freight from Hannibal to Chicago. The shoes were then shipped, freight collect, to Smith-Rowland Co. The Army Salvage Co. paid for the shoes and also paid Jameson the loading charge.

Some indication of the condition of these shoes can be gained from the estimate of the Army Salvage Co., that of a lot of salvage shoes accepted by the company, approximately 10 percent are repaired, 40 percent sold to shoemakers and cobbler shops "as is," and the remaining 50 percent burned. The general manager of the company stated that shoes in wearable condition occasionally were included, but it was hard to locate a pair, and the total of such shoes probably constituted less than one-tenth of 1 percent of the shoes handled.

The carload shipped to Smith-Rowland on June 6, 1944, purchased by the Housman Shoe Co., was inspected at Hannibal by Mr. Housman. Mr. Housman found the shoes "so badly rotted" that he could not use them. This was confirmed by an inspection of the car while it was still on a railroad siding and before its release to Smith-Rowland Co. The shoes were a very poor lot from overseas—moldy, hard, torn, brittle, manifestly nonrepairable. Housman Shoe Co., like the Army Salvage Co., arranged to dump the shoes in Hannibal. Mr. Housman stated that he had never received shoes that were newly repaired.

In explanation of the statement that "a lot of people who can get them are wearing discarded Army shoes," it was learned that at the time the first shipments were received, Smith-Rowland Co. allowed each of its employees to take a pair of shoes, if a pair could be found. The shoes were in a loose pile in the yard of Smith-Rowland Co.

As stated in my letter of June 7, 1944, the utilization of Army salvage shoes for relief purposes has been under consideration for some time. During the past several months, experimental quantities have been shipped to approximately 20 State prisons and shoe factories, which have been conducting experiments for U. N. R. R. A.

Procurement Division, Treasury Department, has advised this headquarters that a request for two to three carloads per week of such shoes for relief purposes is being acted upon by that agency and that an additional two to three carloads per week will be requested in from 60 to 90 days. This is in addition to the shoes already turned over to that agency for rebuilding.

Sincerely yours,

BREHON SOMERVELL,
Lieutenant General, Commanding.

Thomas Henry Cullen

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN J. ROONEY
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Speaker, it becomes my sad duty to record a personal word to the Members of this House upon the life, character, and public service of that distinguished and lovable statesman who came to Congress from Brooklyn in the State of New York and who dedicated his life to the upbuilding and perpetuation of American ideals and institutions—the late illustrious gentleman who preceded me as Representative in Congress of the Fourth Congressional District, Hon. THOMAS H. CULLEN.

The death of my dear friend THOMAS H. CULLEN has been a great loss to this House, to his party, and to the people of his congressional district. He was courageous, honorable, and one of the outstanding men of his State, and of the Nation. His legislative life was marked throughout by his deep devotion to duty and his sense of responsibility of the trust that was his. He possessed in a superlative degree those elements of human sympathy and kindness which made lifelong friends of all who knew him. Of him it can be truly said that if everyone indebted to him for a kindly act should drop a flower on his bier he would slumber beneath a myriad of flowers.

THOMAS H. CULLEN was one of the most picturesque and striking and at the same time one of the most lovable and loyal characters in the public life of our time. He was ever courteous and charitable, and at once an example and an inspiration to all who enjoyed the privilege of his acquaintance and friendship. He resorted to no showy expedients to attract the crowd and attain transient distinction. His life was simple, his aims modest. He sought only to be kind and to be just; and he loved his fellow man.

He was affectionately known as TOM CULLEN by most of his colleagues in the House and by his intimate friends. He was ever ready and willing to extend to others the fruits of his many years of experience, matured judgment, and practical wisdom. He was steadfast in his loyalty to his legislative duties, his family, and his host of friends. His gracious nature and warmth of greeting will always be missed and will long be remembered. Gifted with a keen sense of humor, he had few equals as a social companion. Many a happy social gathering was enlivened with his folk songs and old Irish ballads.

For practically half a century Mr. CULLEN was the able legislative representative of his neighbors in the New York State Legislature in Albany and in the Halls of Congress here in Washington. In his long and illustrious career he lacked but a few days of fulfilling 25 years of faithful service in this House, representing the people of the district in which he was born. He was a product of Brooklyn, and that great borough of the world's largest city can be as proud of him as he was of it.

It can truthfully be said that Mr. CULLEN was a casualty of this war. For some time previous to his passing he was a very sick man, and despite the entreaties of his loved ones and of his colleagues in the House, he refused to relinquish his duties until his health was such that it was physically impossible for him to continue. Just a few weeks prior to his death he attended a series of grueling committee meetings as the ranking majority member of the Committee on Ways and Means and as one of the conferees in connection with the recent revenue bill. It seemed incredible that he could carry on such a difficult task, but he had the determination and courage to complete his last great assignment.

I shall ever recall his many kindnesses during all the years we lived as next-door neighbors in Brooklyn. My children should never forget the kindly and generous Congressman CULLEN. His passing on March 1, 1944, left me with a deep personal feeling of having lost a sincere and true counselor and friend.

To his wife, who was always his constant companion, and to his good family, I extend my sincere sympathy; to his constituency I recall that God has taken unto Himself an able Representative, a devoted friend, a man amongst men. The memory of his faith, his loyalty to the things in which he believed, shall abide with us forever.

None knew him but to love him,
Nor named him but to praise.
May he rest in deserved and eternal peace.

Action on Railroad Retirement Legislation Should Be Hastened

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN C. KUNKEL
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. KUNKEL. Mr. Speaker, there are thousands of retired railroad men in the country who for years have been looking forward to congressional action to liberalize the Railroad Retirement Act. Some liberalizing changes have been made during the past few years and in every instance I was happy to support them. Nevertheless, there are many changes that should be made—and made quickly.

Recently, companion bills were introduced in both the House and Senate dealing with this entire subject and at length. In fact they each contain 207 pages. Two days' hearings were held on the House bill by the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee and then came the recess.

It is admitted by everyone concerned that the problem is complicated because it involves decisions as to who should benefit by the liberalizing features. In other words, "who should get what?"

I strongly feel that this bill is an additional reason why the Congress should be on the job during August, so that the committees will be able to work on this problem and report out some adequate proposal at the earliest possible moment. Legislation on this subject should be enacted this year by the Seventy-eighth Congress. We have waited long enough. We have waited much too long!

Contribution of Vocational Education to the Success of the War Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARENCE CANNON
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, when the final history of the World War is written, one of the most interesting and significant chapters will be the chapter on the contribution of vocational education and the school departments of vocational education to the war effort.

For the last couple of decades we have been realizing the importance of training our young people for the business of living and have been slowly developing in our secondary schools courses in vocational education which provided practical training for our boys and girls in the vocations, trades, and professions, as well as the classics and the humanities, and prepared them to take their places in the world as representative citizens equipped to assume the work-a-day responsibilities of life.

No recent educational development has paid higher dividends in the last three critical years. One of the most urgent problems that faced us when we entered the war—a war of production—was the necessity of manning our war plants and factories with skilled craftsmen. Our reservoirs of skilled workmen were sadly depleted and it was only through the mobilization of graduates from high school courses in vocational education and the adaptation of the schools themselves to the training of men and women for war production in factory and field, that we have achieved the miracles of production that have made victory certain.

In none of the vocational courses provided in the average school has this achievement been more marked than in the courses in vocational agriculture. Charged with the responsibility of feeding our armies, the armies of our allies, the hugh concentrations of workers in the industrial centers and the civilian population of two continents, the American farmer has met that challenge with success and efficiency due in no small degree to the armies of trained men and women turned out by every high school in the land. For example, I am just in receipt of a report made by the Department of Vocational Agriculture of the St. Charles Public Schools of St. Charles, Mo. Prof. J. L. Evans, the instructor, who has been in charge of the course for the last several years, says of the work of the department:

No other agency in the county has carried out so extensive a program of agricultural education during the past year.

Our department has made remarkable progress in our fight to increase food production by aiding farmers in machinery repairs, canning of vegetables, the control of livestock diseases, securing adequate feeds, etc.

Our department gave systematic instruction to classes of adult farmers during the past winter. Ten to fifteen meetings were held in each community in sessions of at least 2 hours length. With the exception of Christmas week and Saturday and Sunday nights, I taught adult classes 2 to 3 hours every night from November 1 to March 1.

In a more detailed summary of the character and extent of the work of the department, Professor Evans itemizes and classifies the activities of the department of vocational agriculture of the St. Charles Schools, as follows:

1. Conducted a course in milk and egg production for farmers in the Cottleville area.
2. Conducted a course in farm machinery repair for the farmers in the St. Charles area.
3. Conducted a course in diseases of livestock for the farmers in the O'Fallon area.
4. Conducted a course in farm machinery repair for the farmers in the St. Peters area.
5. Conducted a course in egg production for the farmers in the St. Paul area.
6. Conducted a course in egg production for the farmers in the Portage area.
7. Conducted a course in agricultural economics for the out-of-school farm youth in the St. Charles area.
8. Conducted a course in food production, conservation, and preservation for the people of the St. Charles area.
9. Conducted a canning center for the people of the St. Charles area.
10. Trained a group of city youths for farm labor; aided in placing youths in production.
11. Tested herds for Bang's disease and mastitis for farmers in the county.
12. Tested soils for calcium, nitrogen, phosphorus, and potassium needs for farmers in the county.
13. Gave demonstrations on proper procedure in castrating, worming, and vaccinating hogs before farm groups in county.
14. Gave demonstrations in the Harvester community on the proper procedure in docking and castrating lambs.
15. Gave demonstrations on proper procedure in removing retained placentas for farmers in the county.
16. Gave many demonstrations on proper methods of culling and worming poultry for farmers in the county.
17. Tested whole milk, skim milk, and cream for butterfat as a service to dairymen in this area.
18. Gave many demonstrations on proper procedure in operating on hogs with hernia as a free service to farmers in this area.
19. Gave many demonstrations on pruning grapes and fruit trees for area farmers.
20. Drew plans for farm buildings and equipment for area farmers.
21. Gave many demonstrations on proper procedure in castrating and dehorning cattle for farmers in area.
22. Worked out economical, balanced rations for livestock and poultry for county farmers.
23. Treated seed for various diseases for farmers in this area.
24. Constructed a large number of labor-saving devices for farmers in the area.
25. Identified noxious weeds and seeds; diagnosed animal diseases; diagnosed plant diseases; and prepared treatments.

Mr. Speaker, this is typical of the character of service rendered by the 26,000 high schools of the Nation. The vocational schools of both the city and the country have been making an invaluable contribution to their respective communities and to the war program.

But their service is just beginning. The close of the war will precipitate increased and diversified needs which only the schools can adequately supply. There will be new conditions requiring new skills. Training to meet those needs must start first in the secondary schools. Increased emphasis must be placed on their vocational departments and increased support must be provided. It is not too early for school boards, school patrons, and local businessmen who have so much at stake in the postwar period to begin now to plan for the vocational training of the young men and young women who in the years to come are to make this Nation the outstanding nation of the world not only in production but in commercial and spiritual leadership.

Veterans' Rights Under the G. I. Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HUBERT S. ELLIS

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Speaker, the war veterans' measure, appropriately called the G. I. bill of rights, has been approved by Congress. General satisfaction has been expressed by the people because it fulfills a general desire and obligation. It is gratifying to the American people who are determined that the rehabilitation of the veterans of this war will reflect the appreciation of the Nation and not reflect its long indifference and indecision as was the case after the First World War. It is especially gratifying to the men and women in the armed forces who will eventually become the veterans of this war. The Congress kept the fundamental interest of our fighting men in mind, and their interest has been safeguarded in the post-war readjustment. I am happy that the word can now go to our forces throughout the world that their bill of rights has been enacted into law. This law means that when our boys return they will find that the provisions of this act provide hospitalization, when needed, assistance in finding jobs, resumption of interrupted education, granting loans to give them a new start in business, buy farms or build a home, and unemployment compensation. These are the principal provisions of the G. I. bill of rights but by no means all of its provisions.

This is news the American people are proud to tell to their sons, brothers, husbands, and fathers. It is the pledge of the Nation to its fighting forces that their country not only supports them now but is ready to assume its obligation when they return to civil life.

This legislation, together with the Mustering-Out Pay Act, will go a long way toward the rehabilitation of our returning soldiers. I am glad that I supported both measures.

Benefits for Servicemen in So-Called G. I. Bill, With Regards to Education, Government Guaranteed Loans, and Unemployment Compensation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MICHAEL J. BRADLEY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. BRADLEY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, on July 28, 1943, in a radio address President Roosevelt advised the American people that he intended recommending to the Congress the passage of legislation, which in addition to giving mustering-out pay to the men serving in World War No. 2, would also provide opportunity for those who served in this war to secure further education or trade training at Government expense. Also to provide unemployment compensation for the returning veterans and to enable them to negotiate loans guaranteed by the Government for the purpose of purchasing homes, farms, and to finance business undertakings through the purchase of supplies and equipment. These recommendations were accordingly made by the President and in response thereto Congress enacted appropriate legislation, which was signed by the President on June 22, of this year.

Because I am anxious that the major provisions of this legislation be available in brief and concise form for the servicemen whose homes are in my district, so that they may be aware of the benefits for which they are eligible, providing their discharge was not a dishonorable one, I am listing herewith the objectives of the legislation with respect to education, Government guaranteed loans, and unemployment benefits.

1. EDUCATION

A veteran in the service on or after September 16, 1940, who served more than 90 days—except time spent in an educational course in Army or Navy specialized programs, which was a continuation of his civilian course and which was pursued to completion—or who was discharged or released by reason of actual service-incurred injury or disability, who was under 25 years of age at the time he entered the service, is entitled to a year's course at a college or educational or training institution. Upon the satisfactory completion of that year he is entitled to an additional period or periods of education or training equal to the time he was on active duty after the date stated above and before the termination of the war.

If a veteran's education had been completed when he entered the service, providing he was under 25 years of age at time of entry, he is entitled to a refresher course for a period of 1 year. A veteran who was over 25 years of age at time of entry into the service who can prove that his education was interrupted is also eligible for this training.

The veteran may choose his own college or institution. The cost of tuition, books, and similar incidental charges will be paid by the Government up to $500 per year. The total period of training cannot exceed 4 years. During the period of training the veteran will receive from the Government $50 a month if he has no dependents and $75 a month if he has a dependent or dependents.

The course must be initiated not later than 2 years after discharge or the termination of the war, whichever is later. No education or training shall be afforded beyond 7 years after the termination of the war.

2. LOANS FOR THE PURCHASE OF HOMES, FARMS, AND BUSINESS PROPERTIES

For these purposes the Government will guarantee 50 percent of a loan, the amount guaranteed not to exceed $2,000. The money can be borrowed from a bank, individual, company, association, or Government or State agency authorized to make such loans. No security shall be required for the amount guaranteed by the Government. Loans shall be payable in 20 years. Interest shall not exceed 4 percent per annum and the first year's interest will be paid by the Government. Loans will be authorized for the purpose of repairing, altering or improving homes as well as for the purchase or construction of new homes.

A veteran with 90 days or more of active service after September 16, 1940, and before the termination of the war, or who was discharged for service-incurred injury or disability is eligible for these benefits. Application must be made within 2 years after discharge or 2 years after termination of the war, whichever is later, but in no event more than 5 years after termination of the war.

3. UNEMPLOYMENT COMPENSATION

For any actual unemployment occurring 2 years after discharge or 2 years after termination of the war, whichever is later—providing that nothing be payable for any period more than 5 years after termination of present war—a veteran who is registered and reports to an unemployment office in accordance with its regulations shall be eligible to an allowance of $20 per week.

A person only able to secure part-time employment, earning less than $20 during the week, is likewise eligible for a portion of these benefits.

A person who is self-employed in an independent establishment, trade, business, or profession whose earnings amount to less than $100 a month shall be eligible to receive benefits for an amount equaling the difference between his net earnings and $100 for such month.

The number of weeks a veteran shall be eligible for this allowance is 4 weeks for every calendar month or major fraction thereof of active service between September 16, 1940, and the termination of the war, not to exceed a total of 52 weeks.

Regarding other provisions of the act, it is suggested that the discharged veteran seek the counsel and advice of the Veterans' Administration facility, which in Philadelphia is located in the Customs House Building at Second and Chestnut Streets, or the service officer of one of the veterans' organizations in his home community.

Why Resurrect the St. Lawrence Seaway at This Stage of the Game?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN C. KUNKEL

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. KUNKEL. Mr. Speaker, all through the year there has been gathering another gigantic push, backed by an enormous lobby, to jam approval of the St. Lawrence seaway through the Congress of the United States. This project continues to rear its ugly head at spaced intervals of time during the past decade. Ever since my election to Congress in 1938, I have actively opposed the St. Lawrence Waterway and I shall continue to do so now.

A careful analysis of the various studies, reports, and documents on the subject have convinced me that it would be a waste of money and economically unsound. The basic objections to the project are so well known and have been discussed so frequently and at such length that it is unnecessary to restate them at this time. They were responsible for its defeat in the Senate in 1934.

After its rejection as being unsound, the seaway emerged again in the 1941–42 era, this time masked as a war project. I expressed my views on this subject in that relationship over Station WHP in April 1942, and also at the same time in an open letter to the Harrisburg Patriot. I pointed out that "what in ordinary peacetime would have been a gross waste of the taxpayers' money, placing the burden on future generations, to the prejudice of the district and the State, in wartime becomes an inexcusable squandering of irreplaceable men and materials for whom and for which there is a known, pressing, and immediate need in our production program. Raw materials, labor, and time sunk in the St. Lawrence cannot be used to create ships, tanks, and munitions we must have at the earliest possible moment for victory."

I also pointed out that it would take anywhere from 4 to 8 years to construct and that at any time during that period there was a strong probability that it would have to be abandoned because of unforeseen shortages of strategic materials. These unexpected shortages did occur in many cases. If that happened, then all materials used to date would have been lost.

The past 2 years have proven that my viewpoint and analysis was correct and farsighted. Subsequent events have borne out my prediction. At many times the boys in the Service who are fighting so valiantly have been short of tanks, planes, guns, ammunition, and other items essential to successful warfare. They would have had far fewer if men and materials had been diverted from the factory and the assembly line to the St. Lawrence sinkhole. They still need all we can give them. We still have many shortages on the civilian home front.

To start this canal now would be as ridiculous as it was then. When we can start to turn our swords into plowshares, we will face a crying need for materials with which to create those many articles required by a starved civilian economy crying for expansion. Returning service men and women, citizens on the home front, all will want and need automobiles, refrigerators, and thousands of other articles. We must use what we have to supply this demand.

Certainly, no one can contend that there has been any trouble with transportation during this war period. And, can anyone point to any real use that the St. Lawrence would have served in the war effort if it had been completely built and in operation even before the war started? It seems to me that it is most embarrassing for those who urged it and testified for it in 1941–42 to come before congressional committees and tell that same story again.

Under the G. I. bill's loan provisions, an opportunity is given for the returning veteran to establish himself in business as a filling-station operator, as a small merchant, or as an automobile accessory salesman, or in many other lines of business. But, if he has nothing to sell, and if automobiles are not available to drive, then from whence will his customers come? How will his business be successful? How will the wheels of commerce keep turning? How will the Government be repaid? The goods that he sells and which the mass of the customers buy, will come in over the railroads and keep railroad employment relatively near its present high figure, and the same is true for trucking and other forms of transportation. But whether for sale or for transportation, the basic necessity is goods.

To debate such a proposal at this time is ridiculous. The war is not over. We hope and pray that it will be ended soon. You will certainly agree that when the war is over, our first major problem is to reconvert industry to peacetime operation and to create jobs and small businesses for the boys and girls who are coming back to civilian life. We do not want to waste the materials that would create those jobs in the "noble experiment" which most engineers say would not work.

EFFECT ON RAILROADS AND RAILROAD MEN WOULD BE DISASTROUS

The basic idea of the St. Lawrence seaway is to take the taxpayers' money and use it to build and maintain a free right-of-way for water-borne traffic, which would compete with the railroads now so adequately serving our community. There are thousands and thousands of railroad men now employed in this district who know full well that the net result of such a program would be to render them jobless. The railroad brotherhoods have always unanimously opposed this whole idea. The railroads themselves would lose traffic. Fewer trains would run. There would be fewer cars to fix in the shops. There would be less freight to move. It would be disastrous.

Its ill effects on the railroads are so obvious that many people at first sight think that the railroads and the railroad men are the only ones affected. But, in our closely knitted, modern industrial State, that cannot be so.

SHIPPERS AND MANUFACTURERS

Shippers and manufacturers in Cumberland, Dauphin, and Lebanon Counties would be placed at a strong disadvantage. They would have to pay freight rates based on compensatory costs to the railroads who build and maintain their own rights-of-way, while freight from the Great Lakes region would be floated—if it could actually be floated—down the St. Lawrence on the back of a Government subsidy, paid in large part by Pennsylvanians, whose tax money would be used to cut the foundation out from under their own businesses and impoverish their own transportation systems. Many factories and firms would not be able to meet such subsidized competition. The result would be widespread unemployment in industry in this area, as well as among many railroad men.

MERCHANTS

Anything prejudicial to the welfare of the railroad man in a district containing as many as does the new Eighteenth Congressional District of Pennsylvania obviously would be reflected at once in the sales by the merchants. That effect would be aggravated by what was being caused to industry. You cannot have a healthy community or trade area in which large sections of the citizens are out of work or have to work at greatly reduced wages. So, in the last analysis, the St. Lawrence waterway would have a bad effect on everybody in this whole section, and, for that matter, in the whole State of Pennsylvania. At best, from the national viewpoint, there would be a huge upheaval and dislocation of manpower and factories which only the lapse of a long period of time could heal.

I cannot take the time to go into the technical reasons which engineers, who have carefully studied this project, give for its utter unfeasibility. But let me mention a few. One is that the Great Lakes and certain parts of that area are frozen over from early December until late April in most years, thus rendering the waterway useless during those months. A friend of mine from Buffalo, N. Y., said to me a few days ago, "All you have to do is to look out of one of the skyscraper windows in December or January to see with your own eyes what nonsense the St. Lawrence waterway is." Another is that, prior to the war at least, only 30 percent of the world's tonnage could navigate the seaway and only 5 percent of the United States tonnage could navigate the seaway.

The construction-cost estimates at the lower pre-war prices of 1940–41 were over a billion dollars. Some estimates ran much higher.

There are other objections, particularly technical ones, but these are enough to prove their seriousness. It cannot be shown that it would be of any national benefit. Consumers costs would not be lowered.

Farm Organization and Farm Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. VIRGIL CHAPMAN

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. CHAPMAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article on farm organization and farm legislation by Hon. James H. Thompson, of Paris, Bourbon County, Ky., formerly speaker of the Kentucky House of Representatives and majority leader of the Kentucky Senate:

FARM ORGANIZATION AND FARM LEGISLATION

(By J. H. Thompson)

Farming is an essential industry. The farmer is the main dependence for food and nourishment of all people everywhere. In the early period of the Nation's history farming was the leading industry; it was the occupation of the majority of the people. In the course of time the population of the country increased, principally by immigration. Among the new citizens were prospectors, investors, and exploiters. Through the influence of this increased population of varied occupations and trades, community centers were established and grew in population, and industry was established here. At the present time those engaged in farming constitute only 25 percent of the Nation's population. Nevertheless the farmer continues at his task of supplying food for all. His job has not been easy or remunerative; his hours of labor have been long; his task laborious.

Many changes may be noted in farm management and farm life in this country during the last quarter of a century. These changes have been brought about by new and improved methods in farm management; also by the use of improved farm machinery and equipment. For many years farmers devoted special attention and time to increasing farm production. Agricultural colleges and experiment stations worked overtime to improve the quality of farm seeds as well as the method of cultivation in order to increase the size and yield of the crops. This practice was continued and as a result large surpluses of farm crops were accumulated. This oversupply naturally depressed prices.

INDIVIDUAL VERSUS ORGANIZED FARMING

The farmer of the past has been generally an individualist. Being more isolated from his neighbors than those in mercantile business, each farmer worked out his own problem to himself, and, in fact, often vied with his neighbors in an effort to produce bigger crops and larger yields than others. In addition, each farmer strived to obtain a better price for his crops than did his neighbor. While this practice of the farmer was in vogue the purchasers of farm crops were combining and cooperating in their efforts to purchase crops and produce at the lowest cost possible. The result was that with only one buyer and a multitude of sellers the market for farm crops was much depressed. In the meantime the farmer continued to increase production, which only aggravated his trouble.

For years farmers devoted their time and efforts mainly to increasing the quality and quantity of their production, giving little thought or attention to the sale of crops. As a result, market conditions became bad and farm income so reduced that farm leaders became alarmed and began to confer about their problems, and to try to find some way to remedy this situation. As a result of these conferences organizations were formed among the farmers to formulate plans for concerted action to secure better prices and to improve living conditions of farmers. Through the efforts of organized farmers a new era was created in the farm life of this country. Today, three great national farm organizations are functioning to promote and protect the interests of farmers.

RESULTS OF ORGANIZATION

The result accomplished by farm organization has demonstrated its worth. Formerly, independent petitions of unorganized farmers were ignored by authorities to whom addressed, while today farm representatives are welcome and counseled with by the highest Government officials. We cannot impress too strongly the importance of organization among farmers. The effective worth of these organizations depends upon the service and devotion of individual members. This fact has been demonstrated by the results accomplished by business organizations including industry, labor, agriculture, which are:

Industry: 85 percent organized; 10 percent population, 21 percent national income; labor: 75 percent organized, 65 percent population, 67 percent national income; agriculture: 30 percent organized, 25 percent population, 12 percent national income.

It will be noted from the above tabulation that the more intensively organized groups receive the greatest percentage of national income. The ratio of income to population of the different groups is as follows: Industry, 210 percent, labor, 102 percent, agriculture, 48 percent.

Organization work is teamwork. It is the combination of forces to accomplish some definite purpose. It is plainly evident that the greater the force attached to a given load, the easier it is to move, provided it is accompanied with teamwork, that is working together in a common cause and to given end. This means of course merging of forces as contrasted with individual initiative and individual action. In the case of the farmer it means the abandonment of the idea and policy of running each his own business and in his own way. Individualism has proved ineffective in combating other well organized business and forces.

EXPERIENCE SUGGESTS CONTROL

Experience and education have taught the farmer a valuable lesson. While not minimizing the skill and ingenuity of the younger generation which will now carry on, their elders have pioneered in the work and learned by experience much that should be of benefit to future farmers. Take the case of handling and marketing a tobacco crop, the leading money crop of this State. Progressive farmers of this State have been striving for many years through concerted action to make this business more profitable.

The first movement for that purpose was started in 1901. Later, in 1906, the Burley Tobacco Society was organized by the farmers for the purpose of increasing the price of this crop. This organization pooled two crops of tobacco and eliminated a third crop of 1908. Much of the pooled tobacco remained unsold and was sold at auction in 1909. In 1921 the Burley Tobacco Growers Cooperation Association was formed. This organization controlled and marketed six crops of tobacco, namely, 1921 to 1926, inclusive. While each of these movements stimulated the market for tobacco they failed to solve the problem for the farmer, failed to establish a permanent and dependable market plan.

While all efforts failed to control and market tobacco they demonstrated the weakness of such efforts through voluntary control, the basic idea upon which such efforts were founded. Had all the tobacco growers joined together and delivered all of their tobacco to the one sales agency for disposal, then the business could and would have been held under control. With one sales agency for their crops the farmers would have been in a much stronger position than they were as individual salesmen dealing with well-organized buyers. Thus, we have learned by experience that control not only of the marketing but of the production of farm crops is essential to orderly sales and profitable prices.

NATIONAL PROBLEM

Price control of farm commodities can be attained only by control of the production of such crops. This we have learned by previous efforts to secure higher prices simply by the organized sales agencies. While controlling the sale of tobacco within a given territory the production of that crop spread to other and new territory thus not only defeating our efforts but aggravating our problem for future control. The fact that tobacco is grown in several States removes State jurisdiction and regulation by State law, thereby making it a national problem. We have learned by years of experimentation that our efforts, while not entirely unrewarded, have been misdirected. We know now the extent of our problem and the authority to which we may appeal for its solution. The Congress of the United States is the one having authority and jurisdiction over interstate problems. It is apparent therefore that future petitions of farmers for relief or redress will be made to Congress which agency has been most courteous and responsive to appeals of organized farmers.

The facts that farming is Nation-wide and farm problems generally in Kentucky are without the jurisdiction of State authorities make it necessary that farm organization be extended throughout the entire country. Many farm crops as well as farm activities are more or less localized; that is, confined to certain sections of the country. The cotton industry is largely confined to the Southern States while the tobacco industry is in a more widely distributed territory and generally in a different section, though operated in some of the States growing cotton. More widely distributed is the corn as well as the wheat industry. Also the dairy industry and the fruit industry are in different sections and widely different territories. All these farm commodities and farm producers share in a common cause and have common problems, that should be dealt by a national organization.

ORGANIZATION TO MEET ORGANIZATION

Organization is indispensable to the successful conduct and protection of farm business and farm activity. The reason it is necessary for farmers to organize is that all other business is organized. The people with whom the farmers deal are organized, those to whom he sells as well as those from whom he buys. In order successfully to meet such competition it is necessary to use similar methods. A pronounced success in organized marketing has been that of the fruit and vegetable growers, which products are perishable. Purchasers who desire these products are compelled to go to organization rather than individual growers to obtain their supplies. Here the organized purchasers are met by organized growers who fix the price of their products.

Organization is a most effective agency for presenting farm problems to legislative bodies. The representatives of the people who are sent to Congress usually consider and are influenced by the interests and well-being of the majority of their constituents. Particularly are those representatives responsive to the appeals and petitions of organized groups of their districts. This is proper because such groups represent collective sentiment rather than the opinion of one individual. It is not only a courtesy but a favor to the representative of the people that he be informed as to the wishes and interest of those he is elected to represent. Any worthy representative of the people in Congress will not only consider it a duty but a pleasure to serve his constituents and particularly such as are supported by collective actions.

GOVERNMENT POLICY

It sometimes happens that a minority interest in the community dominates public policy. This is not a natural situation and is calculated to create an unwholesome condition. In a democratic country it is presumed that majority sentiment prevails in the operation of the government. When in any case majority rules is thwarted by clique rule or the polution of the ballot, disintegration sets in and corruption is fostered. Such situations have existed in many communities of the country and usually ruling dynasties meet self destruction or die by edict of the public in protest. The same is true of the conduct of the National Government when popular rule is destroyed or when the interests and well-being of the people of the Nation are ignored; then representative government becomes unrepresentative.

For many years prior to 1930 our Government was decidedly capitalistic; its policies were dominated largely by organized industry. During this period great combinations of capital and business were formed which practically dominated all business of the Nation. The power and influence thus created over business was used to influence the selection of high Government officials and representatives in the Congress. As a result of the control of the executive and legislative branches of the Government, first consideration was given the problems of vested interests. Under Government protection huge combinations were formed and fostered through Government favor; the rich grew richer through Government bounty while independent business and farmers paid the bills.

REFORM AND A NEW DEAL

Reform movements, both social and political, are generally preceded by excesses and abuse of power by authorities. The patience and tolerance of the people will bear only so much abuse and when tested beyond endurance they will rebel. The incentive for the radical change in the policy and canduct of national affairs in 1932 was the neglect and indifference of authorities to the appeals of the rank and file of our citizenship, to the demands of the farmers and laboring people for justice and a fair deal. As evidence of prevailing distress in some sections of the country, the people resisted the efforts of authorities to execute foreclosures on homes and farms. In the meantime, authorities and administrators of national affairs made no effort to relieve this distressing situation. The people as a last resort exercised their sovereign right of suffrage and dismissed this unfaithful regime.

The time had come for a new deal or an insurrection among the people of the Nation. Realizing the seriousness of the situation the President, when a candidate, pledged the people of the country a change in policy and in the method of operating the Government; that if given control and authority to do so he would see that the people were given a New Deal; that favoritism would be abolished, and the agencies of Government operated for the benefit and by the direction of the people; that constitutional government would be restored; the rights and well-being of all citizens protected. Besides reaffirming the rights of the people he pledged to provide opportunities for them to live and enjoy the privileges of a free democracy. This program made a strong appeal to the people. It was not only a practical appeal to all properly conducted business but also to the better instincts of people who recognize the obligation of the Government to serve and protect its citizens.

PRINCIPLES AND PROVISIONS ADOPTED

The essential principles and purposes cutlined by the President for enactment include the following: Restore confidence of the people in the safety of our institution; stabilize business, establish banking, on a sound and secure basis; provide security and opportunity to farmers and home owners; creation of farm credit and farm loan agencies; establish parity of farm income by stabilizing farm prices; provide work for the unemployed; food for the hungry; provide for the comfort of the aged and distressed.

Such policies as outlined are essential to the maintenance of order and a well regulated democracy. These have now been enacted into law; the principles and purposes of their enactment remain unchallenged.

The farmers' problems have for a long time been serious. There is no precedent for their solution. The Chief Executive of the Nation, realizing the importance of action on this matter, called an extraordinary session of Congress to deal with it. Previously an effort had been made by Congress to provide relief to the farmers and a measure was enacted for that purpose but was vetoed by President Coolidge. In the present instance President Roosevelt requested the Congress to prepare a farm relief measure and thereby pledged his indorsement of their action. At the time Congress had this problem under consideration the country was oversupplied with farm products; huge surpluses had been accumulated which resulted in starvation prices. The Congress after mature deliberation resolved its problem as a twofold one, namely, first to limit production to public demands, second, to stabilize prices in accordance with those of other business activities; in other words provided parity of farm income with that of other business income.

RESULTS ACCOMPLISHED

A recent communication from a prominent Member of Congress who has participated actively in support of farm legislation, states, "Unquestionably more has been done in a legislative way for American agriculture during the past 10 years than was accomplished during all of the years of the history of the country up until 1933. A further testimonial of interest and value to farmers is one by Dr. J. B. Hutson, president of the Commodity Credit Corporation at Washington, which says, "prices of most major farm products are protected by Government loans or purchase arrangements at 85 or 90 percent parity. The net effect is to give farmers approximately parity prices for these products." He further stated, "The net income of farmers in the United States in 1943 is estimated $12,500,000,000 as compared with $9,500,000,000 in 1942, and a pre-war average of $4,700,000,000." Further Dr. Hutson states, "The control of prices received and prices paid by farmers is assurance against a repetition of the experiences of the other war, when farmers lost their homes or became burdened with debts which they were unable to pay off until recent years of increase in farm income."

Only those of experience can appreciate the difficulties to be encountered in the enactment of a measure in the Congress. First in importance is to procure a worthy sponsor, one who is in sympathy with the purposes to be accomplished. Then, to be successful the sponsor must hold the respect and confidence of his colleagues; this is all important since courtesy is the dominating influence among legislators. Kentucky enjoys the distinction of having the most honored and influencial Member of the National Congress. The services of the senior Senator from this State to the farmers of the Nation will be of permanent and lasting benefit. I may add also that he has the hearty support of other Congressmen from the State. May we say if there is such, farming today is a favored industry and due to the loyal sponsorship and support of Congress and the Chief Executive.

FARM AGENCIES

A number of farm agencies were created and others extended recently by Congress. These are credit and finance institutions and include the Federal Land Bank, the Commodity Credit Corporation, the Intermediate Credit Bank. These institutions were designed specially for service to the farmer and landowner. Such agencies have been of great benefit and service to the farmers in furnishing capital for the operation of business and for the relief of banks that were carrying long term and uncollectable loans for farmers. In times of depression banks are unable to furnish capital to cperate business. It was deemed necessary to create "A permanent dependable credit system for farmers" in order to protect their property and to forestall forced liquidations. To serve the people successfully an agency must serve continuously rather than periodically, which is the policy of the Government loan service.

The Commodity Credit Corporation provision of the Agricultural Adjustment Act is what the name implies, a credit agent to serve farmers. It not only provides loans to farmers on commodilties but supplies funds for the purchase of farm crops. By authority of this agency the Burley Tobacco Growers Cooperative Association purchased and handled twenty-five million pounds of the 1940 Eurley tobacco crop for the farmers and resold it for a creditable advance. This same agency also handled five million pounds of the 1941 burley crop. An additional provision of the Agricultural Adjustment Act guarantees parity prices for farm crops. In the case of the 1942 Burley tobacco crop the average price was 41 cents a pound, while the average 1943 crop was 44 cents a pound. The entire output of the 1942 and 1943 crops were sold at prices posted by Government graders under guarantees by the Commodity Credit Corporation. These prices were above a 5-year average, 1935 to 1939, nearly 20 cents per pound.

TIMELY WARNING

The maintenance and support of crop quotas and parity prices depend entirely on the action of farmers and growers. These provisions were inserted in the law at the request and for the protection of farmers. The period of tenure of such quotas is fixed by the farmers themselves. In order for a continuance of the service of the Government the farmers must approve said action. We have previously experienced the results of over-production, which are demoralized markets and starvation prices. We have noted fluctuating prices resulting from uncontrolled production; have learned that nothing can be accomplished by individual effort. We have failed in all efforts to control production by State laws, also in our efforts to obtain living prices by voluntary organizations. We now know from experience and observation that satisfactory prices can be obtained by Government control and supervision of markets. It is therefore up to the farmers to accept this Government service or to open the flood gates of production and drift to old time depression and suffering.

Kentucky farmers are intelligent; they are well informed. They have not forgotten business conditions of 10 years ago when prices of farm products were below cost of production; they recall previous efforts to improve such conditions that were unsuccessful. While today through friendly cooperation by Government agencies farm business and farm life have risen to unprecedented levels, farm income to an all time high. In view of these facts there should be general satisfaction and approval by farmers of the way the Government has assisted them in achieving such results. Any criticism or complaint about the present farm policy would seem unfounded, emanating from sources not concerned about the welfare and success of farmers.

REGIMENTATION

We have heard some talk about the regimentation of business during the present war period; some complaint about the restrictions placed on the conduct of business; of unnecessary drafting of labor in the armed forces causing inconvenience to employers. Some ingenious man has recently coined the expression "free enterprise," which is suggested as a plan for solving our disarranged affairs and business troubles. The inference of this suggestion is that we should be permitted freedom of action during this emergency. This suggestion presupposes that things could and should be run in a normal way while the Nation is waging a desperate struggle requiring the combined effort, and all our manpower as well as resources, to maintain our position in the world—to defend the rights and liberties of the people against an all-powerful combination of forces that would not only conquer but subjugate and enslave our people.

Business must and will go on, and in the best and most practical way possible under the circumstances. We must realize, however, and must concede that our most important business at this time is to prosecute the war to a successful conclusion. To do this will require the mobilization of all the manpower available as well as the resources of the Nation, including a vast army of men and women for the fighting forces, vast amounts of equipment and supplies to maintain such forces in the fields. Then there must be provided food and fiber in the greatest amounts possible in order to nourish and sustain men in the Army.

MOBILIZATION

To conduct a war properly requires mobilization of forces. This includes not only manpower for an Army and Navy but all materials and equipment required to provide manpower with implements used in warfare. Food is as much a necessity as ammunition for servicemen. A soldier without ammunition is helpless; without food he is powerless. In addition, present warfare requires more than any previous conflict in history vast quantities of fuel oils, explosives, as well as rubber supplies, and many other articles of equipment. The quantities of food, fuel, and supplies being consumed in the present world war is almost beyond human comprehension. Problems of transportation alone are so great as to test the capacity of the great railroad and motor transportation systems of the Nation as well as those of the electric and air lines of the country. Only by mobilization can we hope to attain the desired results.

To train an army of millions of men and women for military service is a stupendous task. A review of the immensity of supplies required to equip an army shows what a task it is. In assembling these the Government, by authority of Congress, calls men into the service. Such trainees are subject to the orders of the Government, given by officers of the armed forces. Such orders must be obeyed, even to the giving of their lives in combat with enemy forces. Property and business of civilians are also subject to conscription by authority of Congress to be used for public defense and to provide funds for the prosecution of war. This obligation is being fulfilled voluntarily by all loyal and patriotic Americans, which should be an object lesson to complainers and fault finders. Government regulations are necessary to the prosecution of war and should be cheerfully observed. The greatest obstacle confronted today is the action of some individuals who refuse to do their duty.

American Legion Clears Hon. Hamilton Fish, of New York, of Abuse of Franking Privileges

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAMILTON FISH

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the National Tribune of May 11, 1944, dealing with the action of the national executive committee of the American Legion in clearing me of any and all charges of violation of the franking privilege, made by the Seventeenth District Americanism Commission of Los Angeles, Calif., without any evidence to support its allegations nor affording any presentation of the facts.

The article follows:

At its first meeting in the Nation's Capital since 1919, called by National Commander Warren H. Atherton because of the needs of its legislative program, the national executive committee of the American Legion closed a 3-day session at the Statler Hotel, May 2, that was high lighted by the adoption of far-reaching programs and addresses by high Army and Navy officials, the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, and others, who discussed problems relating principally to existing war conditions and to the care of the Nation's veterans.

* * * * *

In addition to the usual study of matters relating to legislation, employment, national defense, and foreign relations, the committee listened to more than twoscore of national-standing groups and discussed their findings. Perhaps the most outstanding of these in the minds of attendants were the adoption of a skeleton report of the Post-war Planning Commission, which stressed first the winning of the war and then the continuing in America of free enterprise, and by the adoption of another special committee report which freed Representative HAMILTON FISH, of New York, from the taint of misuse of his franking privileges in the promotion of un-American activities.

FISH IS CLEARED

The report of the special committee to deal with charges leveled at Congressman FISH was submitted in a 14-page document by Past National Commander Harry W. Colmery, of Kansas, on behalf of himself, William H. Hargraves, District of Columbia, and National Vice Commander Edward L. Mulrooney, of Delaware. The committee was appointed at Indianapolis last November after Congressman FISH appeared before the executive committee to protest against resolutions adopted at the Kansas City and Omaha conventions of the Legion in which he was accused by misusing his congressional frank by permitting speeches to be sent out, un-American in content, by persons whose patriotism is questioned. FISH has been sorely criticized for granting permission to send out speeches in his envelopes and for encouraging subversive activities.

Colmery quoted the postal laws and regulations relating to the use of the "frank"; submitted as exhibits material used in support of complaints which originated from California; contended that the material in speeches mailed was not germane to the resolution regardless of any possible views or feelings of the Congressman, and concluded that there was no confirmation in the fact of the allegations.

The report went further to state, in effect, that the franking privilege was not to an individual as such but to a representative of the people he serves, and that speeches complained of were explanatory of the right of freedom of speech, that under the Constitution should be exercised without fear of intimidation.

The report suggested strongly that hereafter greater care be given to limiting the scope of convention actions which result "in debates beneath the dignity of the Legion," and further suggested that, where necessary, effort should be directed to a change of laws rather than to personal attacks on individuals. It said that fair criticism without impugning the good faith of honest Americans would redound to the benefit of the Legion.

FISH PRAISES ACTION

After brief debate, the executive committee adopted a resolution to present the complete subcommittee report to the Chicago convention for final acceptance. Colmery later took to task the California Legion district for again attacking the Congressman recently, as a result of which a radio commentator leveled another vicious assault on FISH and the New York newspaper, PM, spread the California action over its pages.

The committee named to investigate the charges against FISH, who is a charter Legion member, was continued to investigate additional complaints on subversive activities.

Congressman FISH, notified of the Legion action, at Goshen, N. Y., issued the following brief statement:

"The action taken by the national executive committee of the American Legion is exactly what I hoped and expected it would be, a simple outspoken act of justice. There is no greater patriotic organization in the country. The Legion is utterly fearless and knows no other interest except what is best for America.

"I am more proud than ever to be a loyal Legionnaire and to have been the chairman of the committee of three that wrote the preamble to the Legion constitution."

Mr. Speaker, I also include the following editorial, which appeared in the same issue of the National Tribune:

THE FISH RESOLUTION

Most veterans will be glad to know that the American Legion has officially relieved Representative HAMILTON FISH, of New York, from any taint in connection with the unfortunate use of his franked envelopes for the purpose of mailing material said to be un-American in character. The special committee of the Legion, headed by Past National Commander Harry W. Colmery, of Kansas, an able and successful lawyer, made a most exhaustive study of the laws and of the allegations contained in the resolution adopted last year by the Legion's Omaha convention. It found no basis in fact for the Legion action and it chastised the organization soundly for directing its efforts to such channels.

Congressman FISH is a loyal American, whose forebears were as thoroughly patriotic as is he. He is one of the founders of the Legion, his eligibility to membership being based on distinguished service in the last war, during which he was decorated for gallantry. He also saw service during the present war; and if he had his own way, he would still be in his country's uniform. He has served his country with distinction in the Congress for a quarter of a century. The unfounded charges of opponents who initiated the Legion resolutions were personally offensive. They were character assassinating and libelous. Had it not been for his regard for the Legion and all of the splendid work it has accomplished, the Congressman would have looked to the courts for relief.

We have not always been in sympathy with Mr. FISH's public utterances. He was an isolationist before Pearl Harbor, and that was his right and privilege. His addresses in behalf of free speech were masterful, if unfortunately violated by his supposed friends. His efforts were honest, if abused. His heart was always right, even though his own close friends have believed his judgment was occasionally warped.

The action of the Legion in sifting the evidence and in making an honest and forthright finding is to be commended. The committee and its chairman did a magnificent job and is to be complimented. That committee has now been continued in service for the purpose of reporting, if necessary, on other actions by alleged subverts that would lead to harm to our country.

The initiators of the original resolutions directed at Representative FISH are to be found in California. We are of the opinion that the resolutions were communistically inspired, perhaps by others than Legionnaires. A so-called legal issue was distorted into an almost successful attempt to brand falsely a loyal citizen and a veteran. We suggest that the continuing committee might well investigate now those who tried so hard to do the branding.

I also include a letter from Mr. Edward K. Inman, vice president and associate editor of the National Tribune, in answer to an inquiry concerning the above editorial, which is self-explanatory:

THE NATIONAL TRIBUNE,
Washington, D. C., May 24, 1944.

Mr. JOHN D. LAWALL,
Brockport, N. Y.

DEAR COMRADE LAWALL: I wish to acknowledge your letter of May 20 which relates further to an editorial that appeared recently in the National Tribune.

May I first state to you that we carry no torch for Congressman FISH or for any other individual. We do, however, believe in fairness and in justice. I do not know whether or not you know Mr. FISH personally, or whether you have any detailed knowledge of the resolution that the American Legion adopted at Omaha last year. I know Mr. FISH personally, and I have known him and his family intimately since soon after the last war, in which he served with distinction and in which he received citations for valor above and beyond the call of duty. I am thoroughly familiar with the Omaha resolution, and was present at the time of its adoption. I was present and an interested listener to Mr. FISH's presentation to the national executive committee of the Legion at Indianapolis last November. I was present this year at the May meeting of the Legion committee in Washington, and listened most carefully to the presentation of the FISH question by an unbiased and nonpartisan group. I later read in detail the findings of that committee and the so-called evidence on which the original resolution was based and on which the last Legion action was taken. I am convinced, as were the whole of the executive committee of the Legion, that there was no basis in fact for the charges that were made and I am satisfied that the representatives of a million and a quarter members of the Legion will sustain the executive committee action at the Chicago convention in September. I suggest to you that you be present at that convention and yourself pass judgment on the evidence as it will be submitted.

No one more than I has disagreed at times with pre-Pearl Harbor utterances of the Congressman. I have personally discussed them with him, and I did not see eye to eye with him, but that in no manner whatever prejudiced his right to make them.

The New York Representative is without question a loyal American citizen. His views before Pearl Harbor were apparently not your views. Some of them were not my views. Our Constitution, which we today fight to uphold, gave him the right to express his opinions just as you are given the right to express yours. No finger of prejudice has been pointed to Congressman FISH because of any utterance he has made since we entered the war.

The allegations made in the original resolution adopted at Omaha not only were not sustained by the evidence submitted by its sponsors, but there was also unearthed evidence that persons with communistic leanings were behind the original action taken in California. Subsequently, activities of the same group bear out the suspicions and known facts in this regard. These recent accusations seem to be as ill-founded as the earlier statements against the Congressman, none of which could be substantiated.

This is an analysis of the situation on which was based the editorial I prepared. It was written without personal bias, and without any solicitation whatever. It was prompted solely by the facts as they were presented to the Legion's national executive committee. Any opinions which you may have are your own, and you are fully entitled to them, but nobody has the right to accuse without more than opinion as a basis. I protest strongly any inference on your part that our writings are guided by anything but competent evidence.

Sincerely yours,

E. K. INMAN, Vice President.

A Reminder for Servicemen, Servicewomen, and Their Families

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN C. KUNKEL
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. KUNKEL. Mr. Speaker, a great many service men and women and their relatives and friends do not realize just what their rights and benefits are as a result of the recent legislation passed by the Congress. Under permission to extend my remarks, I am setting forth a short summary of the more important laws on this subject. By reading the title of the law, any service man or woman will then be able to seek further information about his or her rights under it.

I would also like to add if anyone in the new Eighteenth Congressional District of Pennsylvania has any difficulties in this respect and they will call at my office, 20 South River Street, telephone 4-3356, Harrisburg, or write me either to Harrisburg or Washington, I will be glad to help get them in touch with the proper authorities and do anything else possible for them.

First. Mustering Out Payment Act: It provides payments for those who have been or are being mustered out of the service after 60 days or more, depending upon the length of service and the place of service.

Second. An act authorizing the Administrator of Veterans Affairs to provide seeing-eye dogs trained for the aid of blind veterans entitled to disability compensation. It provides for mechanical and electronical equipment.

Third. Public Law No. 312, providing for payment of pension or compensation to certain persons receiving retired pay by permitting waivers of so much of the retired pay and allowances as is equal in amount to the pension or compensation to which the retired person is entitled. Note: Pension and compensation are exempt from income tax. Retired pay other than that for disability incurred in line of duty is not so exempt. Therefore, the effect of this is to permit exemption from tax of so much of the retired pay as is waived in order to receive compensation or pension.

Fourth. G. I. bill of rights provides for hospitalization, loans, education, employment, and readjustment allowances for veterans of the armed services—a most comprehensive bill.

Fifth. National life insurance: A number of liberalizing amendments have been enacted. Application may be made for not less than $1,000 nor more than $10,000 without physical examination, prior to the expiration of 120 days from entrance into active service. Thereafter, applicants must pass a physical examination. Do not neglect to take out this insurance and do not neglect to keep it in effect after you have taken it out. It is the best insurance policy you will ever be able to get and, after you leave the armed service you can have it converted into most of the regular forms of life insurance and continue it thereafter.

Sixth. Dependency benefits: This act provides for allowances to the dependents of men and women in the service, depending on the type of relationship and the degree of dependency.

Seventh. Casualty payments: Should there be a death casualty in your family, remember that there are four payments due the dependents: first, 6 months' gratuity payment; second, insurance; third, a pension; and fourth, arrears of pay.

Eighth. Maternity care: Under appropriations by the Congress maternity aid to the wives and children of servicemen is granted under State supervision. Consult your own physician for full information.

Ninth. Emergency relief: The Army and the Navy have special funds for emergency relief. The American Red Cross can advise you how to get in touch with the proper authority for advice in this matter.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM P. LAMBERTSON
OF KANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, Dewey stands for democracy; Roosevelt for revolution.

It is evident that Hoover has improved more in his 12 years out than Roosevelt has in his 12 in.

The facts of CLARE BOOTH LUCE and her Chicago speech is another story of a woman who fought for the chance to make good and did.

The serenity of farm people in their short-handed emergency is a comforting and an amazing reality.

From 9 to 9 is the glorious span of the combine day. The dewey morning permits the iron horse to plow corn. There are farm compensations.

The reconversion from continuous rains to a delightful harvest is the order of the week. Growing corn and grasses forget gloom faster than the human.

Some people think it is patriotic not to be interested in politics and yet that is one of the things for which the boys are fighting.

The best answer to the horse in the middle of the stream is that he has gone amphibious, web-footed from time. It just is not a horse.

I have heard Democrats say the unintentional way to get rid of a good political worker is to get him a job and send him to Washington.

The fact that Governor Warren, thinking of his seven children, refused the possibility of sojourning in Washington, is rare and worthy of admiration.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS
OF
HON. FRANCIS CASE
OF SOUTH DAKOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 31, 1944

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. JOHN WILLIAM DITTER, late a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania

Mr. CASE. Mr. Speaker, it will be impossible for Members of the House of Representatives who served with him ever to forget J. WILL DITTER—BILL DITTER to all of us. He could wade into any debate and establish a beach head by slashing words here and there until he had found a footing from which he could press a relentless attack.

BILL DITTER scorned defense and apology when he dealt with a subject for which he fought. He was respectful; he was quick to disavow any misinterpretation of an adversary's words; but he believed in carrying the battle to his opponent. And he did so with vigor. He drew on an intensive knowledge of history to supplement his logic. He threw into his remarks the fire that is born of an intense love of country. This combination of knowledge and earnestness gave him an effective eloquence.

We who have seen him take his position in front of the tables will always see him there. He was too vigorous a character to die and be forgotten. He lives.

Silver Propaganda and Money Facts

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. COMPTON I. WHITE
OF IDAHO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, when the American people have so much at stake in the stability of the Government credit and the integrity of our money system it would seem that the newspapers on which most of us must rely for information have a grave responsibility to give their readers the facts in discussing any monetary program established by the Congress and entrusted to the Federal Treasury for execution. So much misleading propaganda has been printed about silver and the use of silver as money that most people have the erroneous idea that the silver-purchase program is a big expense to the Government when in fact it is the only money program on which the Government is making a profit; a profit which could be tremendously increased if the full intent of the law was carried out and all the silver that has been purchased was used for money by the Treasury Department. It is difficult to understand the motive of the newspapers from one end of the country to the other in persistently misrepresenting the issue and attempting to discredit a money program that has been profitable to the Government and has worked so well in supplying the Nation's money needs. There is inserted herewith an editorial from the Washington Post of June 16 on silver and my reply thereto:

[From the Washington Post of June 16, 1944]

SILVER LOAN

The Treasury has found a new use for its idle silver by agreeing to ship 100,000,000 ounces to India under a lend-lease agreement. It may be remembered that after a prolonged struggle with Congress the Treasury was permitted to sell some silver at inflated prices to domestic industries needing it for war purposes. Prior to that time it had resorted to various lending expedients to circumvent the prohibitions of the Silver Purchase Act. This time it has again found the lending device a handy one for making idle silver hoards useful. The metal lend-leased to India is to be used to increase the coinage supply for the United Nations forces stationed in India and to help keep prices stable.

It may seem curious to suggest that an importation of silver into India provides a means of fighting inflation. But such is the case not only with respect to silver but gold as well. Sales of silver in the open market provide a means of mopping up local purchasing power because silver is selling at highly inflated prices in terms of the local currency. The higher the sale prices the greater, of course, is the anti-inflationary effect of purchases of the metal. The shadow side of this picture is that the authorities have in the past sought to discourage the Indian habit of investing savings in sterile monetary metals instead of putting them productively to work. It is unfortunate that the extraordinary conditions of wartime have made encouragement of the hoarding habit seem desirable as a means of checking inflation. But, given the circumstances, hoarding is at least a lesser evil than accelerated decline of the purchasing power of Indian currency.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., June 26, 1944.

EDITOR, WASHINGTON POST,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Please refer to the statement made in your editorial of June 16 entitled "Silver Loan" in which you say, "The Treasury has found a new use for its idle silver by agreeing to ship 100,000,000 ounces to India under a lend-lease agreement."

In considering the Government's need for money and the monetary use of the Treasury's stock of idle silver, you might tell your readers why it was necessary to circumvent the provisions of the Silver Purchase Act and keep approximately one-half of the silver bought under the mandatory provisions of this law idle, while the other half was put to use as money at a tremendous saving in interest to the American people and a profit in the form of silver seigniorage amounting to $820,700,000 (p. 85, Treasury Bulletin for May). If the first 1,477,659,945 ounces (Treasury statement, June 15) now in circulation as money can be used at such a large profit, why was it necessary to circumvent the provisions of the Silver Purchase Act by keeping the second 1,253,307,039 ounces idle (Treasury statement, June 15, 1943), when there was full authority in law to use all the silver purchased by the Treasury as money at its coinage value of $1.29 per ounce, which would give the Treasur yan additional profit of $887,000,000 (col. 9, p. 95, Treasury Bulletin for May), to say nothing in the saving in interest to the money users of this country.

Today silver is selling in India for $1.05 per ounce (report, Commerce Department) despite the fact that the British Government for India has demonitized the standard silver rupee and made a 50 percent alloy rupee legal tender. And now our Government is turning over 100,000,000 ounces of our silver to the British Government for India to be coined and put into circulation at full coinage value, all the profits between the difference in the price credited to our Government on the lend-lease books and the coinage value going to the British.

The Treasury is doing this at a time when the Federal Reserve banks are inflating the volume of our unredeemable paper money by the billions, every dollar of which is loaned to the Government or business at interest. The Treasury is doing this while the Government is beating the tocsin to buy bonds and more bonds, and scraping the barrel to find a little more taxation money, while we have the equivalent of $1,750,000,000 in good money metal all bought and paid for—money that is plenty good enough for the British, which our Treasury for some mysterious reason refuses to use.

Why do you tell your readers, "That this time it (the United States Treasury) has found a handy device for making idle silver hoards useful?" And when did silver become a sterile silver hoard in India?"

It would seem that an influential national publication, such as the Washington Post, has a duty to give its readers the facts.

Sincerely yours,

COMPTON I. WHITE,
Member of Congress.

Prices Paid by Farmers Under Price Control

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALBEN W. BARKLEY

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 1, 1944

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, at the request of the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS], I ask to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a memorandum on the prices paid by farmers under price control.

There being no objection, the memorandum was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE PRICES PAID BY FARMERS UNDER PRICE CONTROL

Farm prices rose during and after World War No. 1 somewhat more than they have risen in this war and in this war they started from a lower level, yet in 1943 farm income was more than $4,000,000,000 higher than in the peak year 1919. Farm operators' net income nearly tripled between 1939 and 1943. Between 1941 and 1943 it nearly doubled.

A very important factor in this increase of farm income to levels never approached in the last war has been the control over prices which farmers pay. In the last war these prices followed farm prices right up the spiral. This happened because there was no effective control of prices. In this war farm prices have risen nearly as much as in the last war, but the prices farmers pay have been very greatly restrained. On the average, prices paid by farmers rose 94 percent between 1914 and 1919. Between 1939 and 1943 they rose only one-third as much, 31 percent. This has resulted under a system of price control that has been geared to restoring and maintaining balance between farm and nonfarm prices.

COMMODITIES USED IN FARM PRODUCTION

In farm operations, costs are increased by rising prices of machinery, of building materials, of fertilizer, of supplies of all sorts. A program which keeps these prices from rising helps keep farm-operating costs down. Following is a summary of what has happened to these prices in comparison to what happened to them during and after the last war.

Farm machinery

Plows, which rose 80 percent in the last war, are up only 11 percent today. Corn planters are up only 21 percent as compared with 89 percent. Grain binders rose by two-thirds last time and by only 15 percent in this war. Cultivators more than doubled in price and in this war have risen by only a sixth.

Building materials

Prices in this group rose from 2 to 10 times as much in the last war as they have since 1935–39. House paint, which more than doubled in price by 1920, has risen only 11 percent this time. Portland cement went from 84 cents a bag in 1910–14 to $1.42 in 1920. Today it is 76 cents, less than half a cent above pre-war levels. Boards and shingles more than doubled in price during the last war, but are up only 50 percent in the present war.

Fertilizer

A typical commercial fertilizer sold for $25.50 a ton before the last war and in 1918 had risen to $42, a rise of over 60 percent. In this war it has risen from $27.50 to $33.50, or 30 percent, just about half as great a rise.

Supplies

The price of milk cans jumped nearly 150 percent by 1920 as against a rise of 35 percent in this war. Kerosene went from 15 cents to 21 cents a gallon. In this war it has been held stable at 13½ cents. Binder twine much more than doubled in the last war, going from 11 to 26 cents. In this war it has risen only from 9 to 14 cents, or slightly more than 50 percent.

FARM LIVING COSTS

These are examples of the differing movements of prices paid by farmers in this war and in the last for commodities used in farm operations. This difference in price movements has made an important contribution to the increase of net farm income since 1939. But this net income itself goes further than it would have gone if the farmer's cost of living had been permitted to rise as it did in the last war.

Clothing

The farmer's wife knows that in this war clothing costs have risen. This has been a very troublesome sector for price control. Yet in the last war these prices rose even more sharply.

Cotton workshirts, which have risen 90 percent, from 70 cents to $1.33, went up 137 percent in the last war, from 61 cents to $1.45. Cotton socks are up 45 percent. Last time they rose 127 percent.

Wool suits sold for $14.00 in 1910–14 and hit $40 in 1919, a rise of 190 percent. Since 1935–39 they have risen from $20 to $29, an increase of less than 50 percent.

Men's work shoes went from $2.20 to $4.90, a jump of nearly 120 percent. In this war they have risen only about 50 percent, from $2.50 to $3.85. Women's shoes before the last war cost $3 a pair, but hit $8.50 by 1920, a rise of nearly 200 percent. In contrast they have risen in this war from $2.45 to $3.35 or slightly over one-third.

Food

The same contrast shows up in foods. Even though the farm prices of these foods have risen substantially, the retail prices paid by farmers for foods which they do not raise themselves have been markedly restrained.

Flour, which rose 120 percent in the last war, is up less than half as much today—50 percent.

Despite the interruptions to shipping which have made rationing necessary, both coffee and sugar prices have been kept far below their World War No. 1 levels. Today sugar is 7 cents a pound as against 5½ cents before the war. In 1920 it hit 27 cents a pound, four and one-half times as much as in peacetime.

Coffee jumped from 27 to 49 cents a pound last time. Today it is up to 32 cents from 22 cents, about one-half as great a rise.

THE FARMER'S POSITION UNDER PRICE CONTROL

Price control has so effectively restrained the prices the farmer pays that, despite control of the prices he receives, he is better off today then he was in the last war when there was no price control. It must be emphasized that we are operating under a single price-control system, one that reaches to all prices. The system of control cannot be maintained here and let go there. It is all one piece and embraces farm and nonfarm prices together. If the present balance is to be maintained and the farmer's position is to be protected, the system must continue to work in all its parts.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. FRANCIS CASE

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 31, 1944

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. WILLIAM HOWARD WHEAT, late a Representative from the State of Illinois

Mr. CASE. Mr. Speaker, I want to record my personal affection for WILLIAM H. WHEAT, late Representative from the State of Illinois. We all liked BILL WHEAT for his poise, his friendly smile, his calm confidence in the right as he saw it. An exchange of experiences with him one day revealed that we had many experiences in common as boys from a parsonage home. He knew and others knew that he was not well for months before his death. He said little about it, however, and was cheerful to the end. He believed in his colleagues and in his country. I think it was because he had a fundamental faith that God is in His heaven keeping watch over all.

Address by the Vice President to Iowa Democratic State Convention

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH F. GUFFEY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 1, 1944

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have published in the RECORD the address delivered by Vice President WALLACE before the Democratic State Convention of Iowa at Des Moines, Iowa, on Saturday, July 29, 1944.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Your choice of me as permanent chairman is deeply appreciated as a token of respect and affection. It is good to be with old friends to plan for victory on November 7 here in Iowa. The prospects for a Roosevelt victory in the Midwest and especially here in Iowa are brighter than they were 4 years ago. At that time we were not in the war. Now we are, and the most reactionary Republican has reason to be concerned as to what might happen to the war effort if we should lose the skilled leadership of the President. Roosevelt will win next fall in Iowa provided you do your part in getting out the full Democratic vote and provided, furthermore, you conduct the campaign on a high plane which does not alienate Republican voters who otherwise would be with you. This plan of campaign will give several Midwestern States to Roosevelt, but it is not enough to win many congressional seats or many State or county tickets.

To do a real job on this front it will be necessary to make the Democratic Party a vital continuously functioning organization through which farmers, workers, and small-town business and professional men can come to agreement and make their wants known. The Republican Party and its organs of publicity have always tried to separate the farmer and the worker. The Democratic Party can succeed only if it brings the farmer and the worker together on a liberal, constructive platform. Those Democrats who fight such a program are Republicans wearing false faces.

It is important to say a word about my southern friends. The farmers of the Middle West owe a lot to the farmers of the South. We would never have gotten satisfactory agricultural legislation if it had not been for men like Marvin Jones, Senator John Bankhead and Senator Alben Barkley. True, there are certain reactionary leaders, but these men are usually financed directly or indirectly from the North. More and more an intelligent, constructive, liberal leadership will arise in the South which will not owe anything directly or indirectly to Wall Street or to outworn prejudices. CLAUDE PEPPER, of Florida, and Gov. Elliss Arnall, of Georgia, illustrate what I mean. Watch these men. They are young and have a sense of future trends.

One function of a liberal, constructive Democratic Party is to keep the West and the South united. Another function is to keep the farmer and labor united. In carrying out this second function the Democratic Party in Iowa should preach to the farmers every day in every county seat town in Iowa—"your income from hogs, butter, eggs, and cattle goes up and down precisely with the total pay rolls of labor. The moment labor gets into trouble you get into trouble also. You must have a sympathetic understanding of labor's problems if you are to understand your own. You have never been able and never will get satisfactory agricultural legislation without labor's help."

After saying this, ask if it is not true that the Republicans are more interested in balancing the budget than in preventing unemployment. The Republicans were in charge after the Civil War and after World War No. 1, and on both occasions proceeded on the assumption that depression and unemployment were necessary correctives. The world-wide economic whirlwind unleashed sooner or later after the end of this war will be of such a magnitude as to require vigorous action of a type which the Republicans have never been willing to take.

That segment of the press and radio which is controlled by evil monetary interests continually fans every flame of prejudice which will maintain hatred between the farmer and worker. It is easy to state the fudamental Democratic thesis of unity between the farmer and the worker and contrast it with the Republican thesis of hatred between the farmer and worker. The problem is to do something effective about it. It is not enough to make fire-eating speeches for 3 months once every 4 years. The money behind the Republican press and radio subtly spreads its poison every day. To counteract this we must be on the job forming constructive public opinion. We do not have much money and our avenues of press and radio publicity are, therefore, seriously limited. But we do have manpower, womanpower and the enthusiasm of youth on our side. All that is necessary is to formulate a liberal program for constructive democracy which is so compelling in its appeal to farmers and workers in both the North and South that they will be anxious to give personally of their time and money to building a precinct by precinct and county by county organization with channels of publicity to service the members of the organization. In doing such work we must enlist the services of the forward looking men among the lawyers, the school teachers, the doctors, the bankers and all the other professions. You will find help in the most unexpected places provided your program is based on the full use of all manpower, all resources and all technologies for the purpose of equal opportunity and a higher standard of living for all.

The liberal cause has not been defeated and will not be. It merely is in process of being reborn. I ask you to look up—not down; ahead—not backward. When we battle for full production and equal opportunity we battle for the common man. That cause cannot die no matter what may happen temporarily to certain individuals.

And so for the sake of your boys I ask the members of this convention to work with all the fervor that is in them for a Roosevelt victory in the conviction that only by such a victory can the war be terminated promptly and rightly. A Dewey victory, no matter how estimable Mr. Dewey himself may be personally, will inevitably give hope to the wrong elements in Germany and Japan. A Dewey victory, just as was the case with the Harding victory in 1920, would make difficult the building of a world order characterized by abiding peace. The Republicans betrayed the common man of the United States after the Civil War and after World War No. 1. We shall not let them do it again. We will win with Roosevelt.

The Battle for Rubber Is Won

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARENCE CANNON

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 2, 1944

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include an editorial from the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, one of the greatest American newspapers, citing statistics showing an acquisition of 10,000 tons of crude rubber per month with a reserve stock pile of 100,000 tons still on hand. The editorial follows:

THE BATTLE FOR RUBBER IS WON

There haven't been any victory salvos fired in celebration, but the United States has definitely won the battle for rubber. In 2½ years, the rubber scarcity, once the most critical of our raw material shortages, has been turned into what may develop into an oversupply.

Rubber Director Dewey has reported that the production of synthetic rubber in this country now exceeds the volume of crude rubber consumed in the United States in any year prior to 1941. Production is now running at 70,000 tons a month and increasing steadily. The official estimate for 1944 was 869,000 tons, and if the present rate of monthly increase is maintained the final production total will be closer to 1,000,000 tons.

In addition, about 10,000 tons a month of crude rubber is now being imported, and the Nation still has a reserve stock pile of 100,000 tons of crude rubber. Because of this amazing record, materials originally allotted to the synthetic rubber program have been released to make 100-octane gasoline, and this country is now able to export some synthetic rubber to its allies.

With adequate supplies of rubber on hand, civilians find it hard to understand why tires are still rationed for B and C card holders and not available at all for A card motorists. The bottleneck is in manpower and tire cords, with increased military demands for tires as a complicating factor.

However, the situation is much better now than it was a few months ago. Tire tubes are no longer rationed. There is an ample supply of high-grade camelback for recapping, and rationing allotments have been increased. It is now believed that there will be encugh tires to supply A card holders by early next year.

The total output of tires for this year is now estimated at 19,000,000. This figure is 3,000,000 under the planned production, but in 1942 the total output was but 2,500,000. The pre-war average was approximately 50,000,000.

With the battle of production won, the problem which faces the rubber industry is what disposition shall be made of the synthetic-rubber plants after the war. Undoubtedly there will be pressure brought to bear by the natural-rubber-producing nations to regain their pre-war markets in this country.

But regardless of the economic factors involved in that decision, it is apparent that national defense will dictate the retention of at least a part of the synthetic-rubber industry in this country. Moreover, the war has forced industry to learn to use synthetic rubber profitably and many industrial needs are now better served by synthetics made for specific purposes.

If it can be demonstrated, as now seems probable, that synthetic rubber can be made as cheaply as natural rubber can be produced, the synthetic-rubber industry is here to stay.

This editorial and the statistics quoted bear out the contention that further appropriations for the guayule project are unwarranted.

My Record on Measures Relating to Discrimination Against Negroes

---

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LOUIS LUDLOW

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 1, 1944

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I think I can say with absolute sincerity and truthfulness that Negroes have had no better friend than I have been during my service in Congress. No Member of the national lawmaking body has been more earnest and constant than I have been in seeking to safeguard the constitutional rights of Negroes, to protect them from discrimination, and to see that they secure the recognition that is due them as members of our civil community and as patriotic defenders of the Nation to which both white and Negroes owe a common allegiance.

FOR ANTILYNCHING LEGISLATION

Believing that the crime of lynching is the ugliest blot on civilization and the most heinous of all crimes, I have contributed my very best efforts toward stamping it out. I threw the entire weight of my efforts and influence back of the Gavagan antilynching bill, and on June 17, 1936, Representative Joseph A. Gavagan, the author of that bill, wrote to me as follows:

MY DEAR MR. LUDLOW: I wish to take this opportunity to express my appreciation for your cooperation in procuring the discharge of the Judiciary Committee on my antilynching bill, H. R. 5. Without your signature to this petition it would not have been possible to discharge the committee, and I wish you to know that I am very grateful. No matter what honors may come to you in the future, I am quite certain that you will look backward to your signature on this petition, seeking justice instead of mob rule, as one of your finest contributions to your country.

Assuring you of my appreciation and esteem, I remain,

Sincerely yours,

JOSEPH A. GAVAGAN,
Member of Congress,
Twenty-first District, New York.

We passed the Gavagan bill through the House but it failed in the Senate. Believing that if the Federal Bureau of Investigation, with its record of crime detection and prevention, could be brought into service in lynching cases it would act as a powerful deterrent, I introduced the following bill in Congress:

A bill to define the crime of lynching, to prescribe punishment therefor, and to authorize the Federal Bureau of Investigation to investigate the facts in connection with lynchings

Be it enacted, etc. That (a) it shall be unlawful for any person to move or travel from one State into another State for the purpose of aiding or abetting the lynching of any person.

(b) It shall be unlawful for any person to send by telephone, telegraph, or radio, or through the mails, any communication which urges or invites any person to aid or abet the lynching of any person.

(c) As used in this section, the term "States" means a State, Alaska, Hawaii, Puerto Rico, and the District of Columbia.

(d) Violations of this section shall be punished by imprisonment for not less than 5 years.

SEC. 2. Whenever a lynching occurs in any State, the Federal Bureau of Investigation is authorized and directed to investigate the facts in connection with such lynching to determine whether, in connection with or in the course of such lynching, any crime against the United States has been committed.

While antilynching legislation still remains "unfinished business" in Congress I pledge to devote my best efforts in the future, as in the past, to promote legislation which will deal effectively with lynching and get rid of the antisocial conditions which breed such unspeakable crimes. I repeat now what I said on the floor of the House over 8 years ago on June 20, 1936:

Right is not going to be forever on the scaffold, and wrong is not going to be forever on the throne. Sometime the Congress will take this monstrous evil of lynching in hand and suppress it. I will be happy if I may contribute toward that end.

LETTER FROM WALTER WHITE

Walter White, secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, wrote to me on January 20, 1941, as follows:

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN LUDLOW: We have received the copies of your antilynching bill and thank you for sending them. Introduction of this bill is further evidence of your magnificent and consistent interest in the difficulties the Negro is encountering.

Ever sincerely,

WALTER WHITE,
Secretary.

AUTHOR OF AMENDMENT TO PREVENT DISCRIMINATION AGAINST NEGROES IN TRAINING

(In the House of Representatives Monday, September 23, 1940. The House having under consideration H. R. 10539, the first supplemental civil functions bill, 1941)

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Amendment offered by Mr. LUDLOW: On page 10, after line 18, insert a new paragraph as follows:

" 'No trainee under the foregoing appropriations shall be discriminated against because of sex, race, or color, and where separate schools are required by law for separate population groups, to the extent needed for trainees of each such group, equitable provision shall be made for facilities and training of like quality.' "

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, the amendment I propose has the support and, in fact, was initiated by the Federal Security Agency, and has approval of the Council of National Defense and of the Budget Bureau. It would provide in respect of the trainees who are to be recruited under these two activities, the Office of Education and the National Youth Administration, the same freedom from discrimination that is contained in the conscription law. If this provision is not inserted in the present law you will have one provision with reference to the draftees under the conscription law and a lack of the same provision in its application to the training under this act.

I think the proposed amendment speaks for itself. As I say, it has the backing of the Federal Security Administration, and it also has the support and approval of the Advisory Commission of the Council of National Defense, which finds it to be in harmony with its labor policy; and of the Budget Bureau, which finds it to be in harmony with the program of the President. It injects no new policies into the administration of our laws but merely makes this act in respect of training conform to the policy already determined upon by Congress in respect to conscriptees under the new Conscription Act. I respectfully ask the committee to adopt the amendment.

I am happy to offer this amendment because it gives to the colored people of our country an assurance that there will be no discrimination against them in training for national defense. In every war in which our country has engaged Negroes have responded to the call of our country and have demonstrated their loyalty and devotion in every way. Now that our beloved country is face to face with another emergency, they are manifesting the same spirit of patriotism that has guided them in former crises of our national history, and the amendment I have offered would remove racial barriers and guarantee their right to serve. [Applause.]

The amendment was agreed to.

FOR FAIR EMPLOYMENT PRACTICE COMMITTEE

(In the House of Representatives, Friday, May 26, 1944)

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, on the whole, the evidence that has come to me through our committee hearings and from all other directions convinces me that the Fair Employment Practice Committee is doing an outstanding job in promoting national unity, in improving and sustaining the morale of the tenth or more of our people who comprise the minority groups, and in opening up reserves of manpower so much needed to win the war that would otherwise have remained untapped. Sincerely believing, as I do, that the Committee on Fair Employment Practice is a vital war agency, I hope that the amendment striking it down will not be adopted and that it will be implemented with the funds carried in this bill, which are the minimum to enable it to carry on its work.

LETTER FROM MALCOLM ROSS, CHAIRMAN, COMMITTEE ON FAIR EMPLOYMENT PRACTICE

PRESIDENT'S COMMITTEE ON FAIR EMPLOYMENT PRACTICE,
Washington, D. C., June 28, 1944.

Hon. LOUIS LUDLOW,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN LUDLOW: I cannot tell you how much I appreciate the kind words about F. E. P. C. which you inserted into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I confess to a large degree of institutional pride about F. E. P. C. I know that we intend to fight hard for the principles set down in our Executive order, but not to go beyond the duties laid upon us. With so much careless talk about the Committee's activities, a forthright expression of appreciation such as yours comes like a breath of fresh air, and I want to assure you that it was greatly appreciated.

I hope, when you return to Washington, that you will spare me some time to chat about this whole problem of minority rights in employment, for I know that your attitude toward it and your wisdom in tackling such problems could be of inestimable value to us.

Cordially yours,

MALCOLM ROSS,
Chairman.

FOR NATIONAL YOUTH ADMINISTRATION TRAINING PROGRAM

(In the House of Representatives, Monday, June 28, 1943)

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, in a short time Congress will determine the fate of the National Youth Administration. It will determine whether or not that Administration during the fiscal year 1944 shall train approximately 600,000 youths in industrial pursuits and thus make them effective contributors to our national war economy and useful and efficient members of society. I hope that Congress will say to the National Youth Administration: "You may continue your training program. You are doing a good work."

To the extent that I have a voice and influence, I am exercising the same in behalf of a continuation of the N. Y. A. training program.

I say this notwithstanding there is no one in Congress, I believe, who has a greater desire than I have to see that economy in government is effected and that in every possible instance duplication and overlapping are eliminated. It has been argued that since there are half a dozen agencies in the field of vocational training, the National Youth Administration might well be abolished and the trainees taken over under other agencies, but I find on very thorough investigation that there are two sound arguments against that proposal. One is that the N. Y. A. training program is a going program that is proceeding at full speed in turning out efficient trainees and constantly infiltrating them into plants all over the country where they are vitally needed and to disrupt that program now would slow up the war effort and do much harm. The other argument in favor of continuing the N. Y. A. training program is that there is no other program just like it. It enters into a different field and taps a potential source of timber for skilled manpower and womanpower that is not reached by any other training agency. I find that while it embraces persons of all races within the scope of its activities it is in many instances the only agency through which Negroes can obtain the technical and vocational training which they desire and to which they are entitled.

If the National Youth Administration training program is to be saved, it must be saved now. The situation requires immediate action. The bill is now pending in the Senate and will be voted on soon. I have had several conferences with the junior Senator from New York, in charge of the bill, and he tells me the vote will be very close. I take this occasion to suggest to Members of the House that you do not depend on letters, or even on the telephone, but that you go in person to the other end of the Capitol and see the Senators from your States and urge them to support the bill to continue the National Youth Administration's training program.

FOR COMMUNITY FACILITIES

(In the House of Representatives, Wednesday, March 8, 1944)

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, child delinquency has reached a peak never before realized nor dreamed of in this country. It has reached the all-time high. In its early stages the rapid growth of child delinquency created amazement and now it has become frightening.

All of us are voting without hesitation and without stint the billions to win the war so as to make civilization safe and secure in the ages to come. While we are doing that I think it is altogether right and proper that we should vote a few millions to cure instead of to kill. We are the guardians of posterity and we have a responsibility to see that the children of America do not suffer spiritual blight and decadence as a result of conditions which it is within our power to remedy.

We will be very derelict in duty if in the face of mounting juvenile crime which already has passed all known bounds we destroy the child-care projects of the community-facilities program by withdrawing the means necessary to enable them to carry them on. We could do no greater disservice to our children who will be our leaders of tomorrow and who need to be strong and reliant to cope with the momentous problems of posterity.

The appropriation of $127,500,000 carried in this bill for community facilities is not as much, in my opinion, as might wisely and judiciously be spent in providing the facilities on which the welfare of the Nation so much depends, but it will cover existing commitments and will provide $18,194,000 of new money to meet contingencies that will arise. The Budget estimate was $150,000,000, and we had definite assurance that if we granted that amount it would close the books and the agency would not return for more money. I voted in committee for the appropriation of the full Budget estimate, which would consume the balance of the authorization of $500,000,000. No one wants to see appropriations cut more than I do, but I do not want to cut them at the expense of our children.

FOR REPEAL OF POLL TAX

Mr. Speaker, by my voice and my votes I have done everything I possibly could to bring about the repeal of the iniquitous poll tax. It is unthinkable to me that our men who are fighting and dying on the battle fronts to preserve our free institutions should be denied the freedom of voting for candidates of their choice to manage those institutions.

LETTER TO REVEREND RICHARDS IN RE POLL TAX

APRIL 15, 1944.

Rev. S. C. RICHARDS,
Indianapolis, Ind.

DEAR REVEREND RICHARDS: This is to acknowledge receipt of your letter of April 12 expressing your views in regard to the anti-poll-tax bill.

I have supported from the beginning the bill to repeal the obnoxious poll tax, wherever that tax is imposed. The measure passed the House on May 25, 1943, and was referred to the Senate Committee on the Judiciary. That committee reported it to the Senate on November 12, 1943, and it now is on the Senate calendar.

I supported the bill and voted for it in the House and will continue my efforts until it becomes law. It seems to me a ridiculous travesty and miscarriage of justice when our boys who are offering their lives on the battle fronts for the perpetuation of freedom are denied in many instances one of the most precious of all freedoms—the freedom of casting their ballots for the men of their choice in uncontrolled elections.

I will continue to fight for that freedom as long as I have anything to fight with.

Thanking you for your views, and assuring you of my sympathetic interest,

Very sincerely yours,

LOUIS LUDLOW.

LETTER PROTESTING DISCRIMINATION IN ASSIGNING NEGROES TO COMBAT SERVICE

MARCH 20, 1944.

Hon. HENRY L. STIMSON,
Secretary of War,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I am receiving inquiries from Negro constituents and from representative Negroes throughout the country indicating a good deal of anxiety over reports that Negroes are not being given a fair show in fighting the battles of our country. It is felt that this is especially to be deplored in view of the fact that Negroes have acquitted themselves with honor and credit in every war in which our country has engaged. Specifically, there is an undercurrent of dissatisfaction based on reports that Negroes are being preponderantly assigned to service the Army and are being deprived of the opportunity which every true soldier covets to engage in combat.

If there is no basis for these reports, I think it would be reassuring if I could so inform our colored people, and whatever the facts may be I think our colored friends, whose patriotism cannot be challenged, are entitled to have the facts.

It is in the hope, therefore, of allaying dissatisfaction, which certainly bodes no good, that I respectfully ask you to advise me on the following points:

1. How many Negroes and how many whites are there in the total military forces?
2. How many Negroes are assigned to service the Army?
3. How many Negroes are assigned to combat duty?
4. How many Negro units are engaged in combat and what are they?
5. How many Negro units are assigned to service duties and what are they?
6. Is it contemplated that additional Negro units are to be placed in combat, and if so, what are the units that are to be so assigned?

7. Finally, from your comprehensive overall knowledge of the military service, what in your opinion are the facts as to whether or not there is discrimination against Negroes in the service, and is it your intention in your position of high responsibility to see that such discrimination is not permitted to exist in the future?

If you can see your way clear to send me a reply covering the above points it will be helpful, I hope, in resolving doubts which must inevitably be injurious to morale.

With kind regards.

Very sincerely yours,

LOUIS LUDLOW.

Address by Hon. David I. Walsh, of Massachusetts, Seconding the Nomination of Hon. Alben W. Barkley, of Kentucky, for Vice President

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DAVID I. WALSH

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 1, 1944

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a copy of the speech delivered by me at the Democratic National Convention at Chicago, July 21, 1944, seconding the nomination of Senator ALBEN W. BARKLEY, as the Democratic candidate for Vice President.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chairman and ladies and gentlemen, every delegate to this convention can agree upon the essential qualifications that the Democratic candidate for Vice President should possess. Second only to the Presidency itself, in this time of gravest crisis, this office assumes the utmost importance.

The man who occupies it must stand out from his fellow men in ability, experience, and those qualities of heart and mind that mark the exceptional and successful public leader.

Moreover, the nominee in addition to being liberal, humane, and forward looking, must be courageous enough to stand with conviction and determination for those principles and policies demanded by the times and the advance of our social and economic institutions.

He must be tolerant and just in his viewpoints, sound in his judgments and ever zealous to protect the rights of even the humblest of our citizens against encroachment and discrimination. Above all, he must be rigid and unyielding in his devotion to the American form of Government and the American way of life.

He must be a believer in free enterprise and unfettered opportunities for every group and individual in the Nation, regardless of class, race, creed, or station in life.

That the man whose nomination I proudly advocate is possessed of these basic qualities to a superlative degree no true American can challenge.

But more than that—if I may be permitted to strike a personal note and refer to my long association with him in the United States Senate—he is a man of nobility of purpose, gentility of spirit, and sincerity of conviction.

As the majority leader of our party in the Senate he commands the respect, the esteem, the confidence, and affection of every Senator, regardless of party affiliations.

His amiable personal qualities, his devotion to duty, his burning patriotism, his breadth of vision and tolerance of those who disagree with him have given him a rare position among his colleagues and fellow partisans.

A clear and sound thinker, a gifted speaker, a militant champion of any cause which commands his allegiance, he has never failed to demonstrate and exemplify the highest kind of statesmanship.

If the Democratic Party seeks a nominee for this office who has served his party and his country in the Halls of Congress and on every platform and in every forum in every section of the country and who has furnished sound, inspiring leadership in the party councils for over a quarter of a century, the man I am here to endorse meets that requirement beyond all question or doubt.

If our party seeks a nominee who is of democratic spirit, is approachable to every party worker, who has striven and sacrificed in the advocacy of democratic principles, he is ready to answer your call.

If our party seeks a broad minded, tolerant leader, one who recognizes that in this period when tremendously important and epoch-making decisions must be made, there are bound to be honest and conscientious differences of opinion even in our own party, and who respects the sincerity of those who differ with him, we have one who responds to that acid test of wise effective leadership. Such a man—and I emphasize the importance of these qualities if harmony and wise council are to continue in the Democratic Party—is available.

He has demonstrated these qualities again and again in his brilliant leadership in the Senate where he has maintained a unity of opinion and a spirit of understanding that has made possible the great legislative record, that we as a party have recited from this platform and are now submitting to the American public.

If we seek a candidate who is a tireless and unmatched debater with poise and calmness in the midst of contention, with freedom from sectionalism and with fairness and tolerance toward those who differ with him, one who has won for himself not only the loyalty and esteem of his colleagues but the admiration of all Americans, regardless of party, such leadership we can command.

I do not hesitate to say that his alert and versatile mentality, and his strong devotion to the toilers, the underprivileged, to the unfortunate and to the veterans and the dependents of all wars, have led him to make for himself and his party a legislative record which, for true liberalism and unflinching attachment to Democratic ideals, is unmatched by that of any statesman of our generation.

No man in all America, by reason of his long experience, his study and knowledge of public questions, possesses a surer and sounder grasp of the stupendous problem of this hour. He is, in my opinion, superbly fitted, certainly as abundantly as any other member of our party, for the office of Vice President, yes, for the Presidency itself.

If the estimate I have given you of this great leader appears fulsome and exaggerated, I merely ask that you turn to your United States Senators and Congressmen who know his sterling worth. Those who have labored with him and know him best will bear out every assertion I have made concerning his character, ability and fidelity to his country and party.

Mr. Chairman and delegates, it is my high privilege to urge my fellow Democrats, assembled here in this convention to support as your nominee for Vice President, a tested, experienced and faithful leader, a militant American whose record of 31 years of honorable, useful, and patriotic service has made his party and his country his debtor, and his availability for highest public office within your gift unquestioned and unexcelled. Such a man is Senator BARKLEY of Kentucky whose nomination I am honored to second.

The Thirty-third Senator

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALBEN W. BARKLEY

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 1, 1944

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, at the request of the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS], I ask to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, an article entitled "The Thirty-third Senator," by McNaughton, which appeared in the Pekin Daily Times of Pekin, Ill., on July 27, 1944.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE THIRTY-THIRD SENATOR

(By McNaughton)

Today's most important job is making sure that World War No. 3 does not happen.

The decision is up to America.

America's decision is up to the United States Senate.

The Senate's decision can be hamstrung by the thirty-third Senator—the one more than a third.

Sixty-three Senators may be for peace, but it takes two-thirds (64) to pass a treaty and if 33 Senators (32 who are a third, and the thirty-third) are against peace, there will be a World War No. 3.

Richard J. Lyons, the Chicago Tribune candidate for United States Senator, might be that thirty-third Senator. He is wishy-washy on peace.

Every Illinoisan knows that Senator SCOTT W. LUCAS is all out, 100 percent, unqualifiedly and unwaveringly for world peace.

Because of this the Times expects to reason with its Republican readers; and in the name of their sons who have died, or of those sons for whom they have present desperate fears, the Times expects to ask Republicans this year to put the fate of the world above politics, and vote this fall for SCOTT W. LUCAS.

Editorials presenting the reasons for this plea will appear in later issues.

Missouri Citizens Object to Enactment of Any Prohibition Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARENCE CANNON

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend remarks, am listing, by request, 26 numerously signed petitions against prohibition transmitted to me by Mr. A. J. Immell, of Washington, Mo., which I am filing with the Committee on the Judiciary:

WASHINGTON, MO., June 20, 1944.

Mr. CLARENCE CANNON,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CANNON: I am enclosing herewith petitions signed by approximately 660 citizens of Franklin, Gasconade, Warren, Osage, and Montgomery Counties protesting against any form of prohibition legislation.

I respectfully request of you that you insert these petitions, or as much of them as is permitted, in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Yours very truly,

A. J. IMMELL.

PETITION AGAINST PROHIBITION

We, the undersigned citizens of the State of Missouri, by this petition voice our objections to any prohibition legislation; we don't want any more prohibition with all of its attendant evils.

Address by the Vice President Seconding the Nomination of President Roosevelt

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH F. GUFFEY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 1, 1944

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have published in the RECORD the address delivered by the Honorable HENRY A. WALLACE, Vice President of the United States, seconding the nomination of Franklin D. Roosevelt, at the Democratic National Convention in Chicago, on July 20, 1944.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

As chairman of the Iowa delegation I am deeply honored to second the nomination of the greatest living American—Franklin D. Roosevelt.

The strength of the Democratic Party has always been the people—plain people like so many of those here in this convention—ordinary folks, farmers, workers, and businessmen along Main Street. Jefferson, Jackson, and Woodrow Wilson know the power of the plain people. All three laid down the thesis that the Democratic Party can win only if and when it is the liberal party.

Now, we have come to the most extraordinary election in the history of our country. Three times the Democratic Party has been led to victory by the greatest liberal in the history of the United States. The name Roosevelt is revered in the remotest corners in this earth. The name Roosevelt is cursed only by Germans, Japs, and certain American troglodytes.

The first issue which transcends all others is that complete victory be won quickly. Roosevelt, in a world sense, is the most experienced military strategist who has ever been President of the United States. Roosevelt is the only person in the United States who can meet on even terms the other great leaders in discussions of war and peace. The voice of our New World liberalism must carry on.

It is appropriate that Roosevelt should run on the basis of his record as a war leader. He is successfully conducting a war bigger than all the rest of our wars put together. We must finish this job before the Nation can breathe in safety. The boys at the front know this better than anyone else.

The future belongs to those who go down the line unswervingly for the liberal principles of both political democracy and economic democracy regardless of race, color, or religion. In a political, educational, and economic sense there must be no inferior races. The poll tax must go. Equal educational opportunities must come. The future must bring equal wages for equal work regardless of sex or race.

Roosevelt stands for all this. That is why certain people hate him so. That, also, is one of the outstanding reasons why Roosevelt will be elected for a fourth time.

President Roosevelt has long known that the Democratic Party in order to survive, must serve men first and dollars second. That does not mean that the Democratic Party is against business—quite the contrary. But if we want more small businessmen, as the Democratic Party undoubtedly does, we must modify our taxation system to encourage risk capital to invest in all rapidly growing small business. We want both a taxation system and a railroad rate structure which will encourage new business and the development of the newer industrial regions of the South and the West. Rate discrimination must go.

The Democratic Party in convention assembled is about to demonstrate that it is not only a free party but a liberal party. The Democratic Party cannot long survive as a conservative party. The Republican Party has a monopoly on the conservative brains and the conservative dollars. Democrats who try to play the Republican game inside the Democratic Party always find that it just can't work on a national scale.

In like manner Republicans who try to play the Democratic game inside the Republican Party find that while it may work on a State basis, it can never work nationally. I know because my own father tried it. Perhaps Wendell Willkie may have learned in 1944 a little of that which my own father learned in 1924. The old elephant never changes and never forgives.

By nominating Franklin Roosevelt the Democratic Party is again declaring its faith in liberalism. Roosevelt is a greater liberal today than he has ever been. His soul is pure. The high quality of Roosevelt liberalism will become more apparent as the war emergency passes. The only question ever in Roosevelt's mind is how best to serve the cause of liberalism in the long run. He thinks big. He sees far.

There is no question about the renomination of President Roosevelt by this convention. The only question is whether the convention and the party workers believe wholeheartedly in the liberal policies for which Roosevelt has always stood. Our problem is not to sell Roosevelt to the Democratic convention but to sell the Democratic Party and the Democratic convention to the people of the United States.

The world is peculiarly fortunate that in times like these the United States should be blessed with a leader of the caliber of Roosevelt. With the spirit of Woodrow Wilson but avoiding the pitfalls which beset that great statesman, Roosevelt can and will lead the United States in cooperation with the rest of the world toward that type of peace which will prevent World War No. 3. It is this peace for which the mothers and fathers of America hope and work.

Issues that will be with us for a generation—perhaps even for a hundred years, will take form at this convention and at the November election. The Democratic Party and the independent voters will give Roosevelt their wholehearted support because of his record in peace and war.

As head of the Iowa delegation, in the cause of liberalism, and with a prayer for prompt victory in this war, permanent peace, and full employment, I give you Franklin D. Roosevelt.

Independence Day Address of Hon. Philip J. Philbin, of Massachusetts

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PHILIP J. PHILBIN

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 1, 1944

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address delivered by me at Worcester, Mass., on July 4, 1944:

On this birthday of our country's independence I am constrained not to discuss political questions. Because I believe that this year, above all in our long history, on this memorable American holiday so full of deep meaning not only to the American people, but to all the liberty-loving people of the world, it is urgent that we should pause and consider the true significance of the Fourth of July.

Since that great hour when the American colonists, battling against the armed might of one of the greatest empires in history, threw off the shackles of tyranny and oppression and instituted a free government in this Nation, America has enjoyed a measure of freedom and happiness never given to the rank and file of the people of any other nation. Personal liberty has been so firmly enthroned here that succeeding generations have taken it for granted.

Through crisis after crisis, through struggle after struggle, through war after war, American liberty has been preserved from tyrants and dictators. Independence as a nation and independence as individuals have been the very soul of our beloved country where men are born free, live free so long as they obey the law, and transmit this freedom to their posterity.

The nation that does not possess independence is a slave nation. The individual that does not possess independence is himself a slave. The nation that is governed by another is a subject nation. The man whose will is controlled by another is a puppet and a minion. Yes, indeed; independence is the very soul of America, one of the most precious attributes of our Nation and individual character which from time immemorial our people have valued more than life. So we should thank God for this great and glorious Independence Day that made our people free.

Now we are facing the greatest crisis of all, which will determine whether we will continue to live as freemen and citizens or as slaves and subjects; whether we are to retain our matchless form of government and American way of life, or surrender them to domination by alien groups. Ruthless tyrannical enemies beset us on far-flung battlefields, on the sea, and in the air, and our noble sons are waging courageous warfare against them with an indomitable spirit and gallantry that makes victory certain.

While we are so engaged, and while the minds of our people are resolutely fixed upon winning this great and terrible world conflict, dangerous internal enemies are subtly attacking our liberties and security here at home.

Through stealth, subterfuge, deceit, and infiltration, these forces of revolution and subversion, cleverly organized, ably led, financed with a mysterious yet most abundant means deriving encouragement and support from the seats of the mighty are at work in almost every community of our land.

Their aim is the destruction of freedom, the suppression of the individual, the death of democracy. And they are well on their way toward the accomplishment of their dastardly purpose to nullify the American Constitution, stultify the immortal Declaration of Independence and fasten the tyranny of an alien radical bureaucratic dictatorship modeled on the principles of Karl Marx, upon the rank and file of the American people.

As Americans our duty is not only clear but sacred. Our boys are not failing us. They are willingly giving their all to save our country from the cruel fate of oppression. We cannot fail them, nor can we fail the immortal principles of liberty, equality, and justice upon which our Nation is based, and for which the brave, heroic boys so valiantly fight.

The aroused colonists of 1776 hailed the glorious Fourth—their Independence Day—as the day of deliverance—a day of deliverance from political tyranny. Let us, too, who have enjoyed the great heritage of freedom forged by the greatest statesmen the world has ever known, enunciated on the First Fourth, and immortalized by the suffering, sacrifices, and bloodshed of millions of our countrymen, let us, too, I repeat, be aroused to the gravest of dangers that surround our Nation in this present hour.

Let us awaken to the perils which threaten freedom, let us renounce, repudiate and smash, so they will never rise again in this country, the radical termites who seek the destruction of our priceless American institutions. Let us in our own day and age, true to the courageous traditions of the American founders, deliver our country from the curse of totalitarian tyranny which hangs over all the world today as a menace to ourselves and to all mankind. Not only eternal vigilance but determined action is the price of liberty. We can no longer take it for granted.

Let us, therefore, catch the spirit of those who have fought, bled, and died to perpetuate America. On this sacred birthday of our country, fully awakened and ready to act, let us pledge our efforts, our allegiance and like the patriots of old, our lives and our fortunes, if need be, to the destruction of tyranny, the preservation of freedom and the protection of our exalted and beloved American Independence for the Nation and for the free men and women who live under the shelter of our matchless Constitution. Let us say with the noble Thomas Jefferson, the author of the immortal Declaration of Independence we so solemnly commemorate today, "I have sworn eternal enmity toward every form of tyranny over the mind of man." Let us wage undying battle against the commissars of 1944 who like the mercenaries of the Revolution, seek to oppress us under a form of tyranny more cruel than death itself.

From this hour forward, let us strive, work and fight for speedy victory, the prompt return of our boys, and the effective extermination of the radical termites who would enslave America and destroy our hard-won freedom.

Thank you and good evening.

Sacrifices by Parents Incident to the War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GUY M. GILLETTE

OF IOWA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 1, 1944

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, in the Iowa Legionnaire of June 18 there appears one of the best-written and most moving articles or editorials on the matter of the sacrifices parents are making that I have ever read. It is entitled "Father's Day," and was written by Maj. Frank Miles. I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FATHER'S DAY

(By Maj. Frank Miles)

Father's Day, Sunday, June 18, will be sad for thousands of American fathers, as it will be for mothers and others who loved boys who have made the supreme sacrifice in the war.

It will be a day of compassion for fathers of those who are suffering from wounds inflicted by enemy weapons.

It will be a day of fear for the thousands of fathers whose sons are in action in the battle areas in Europe, the Pacific, and elsewhere.

It will be a day of concern for the fathers whose sons are in German and Japanese prisons.

It will be a day of worry for the fathers of those in uniform who are training for combat.

It will be a day of uneasiness for fathers of youths who must shortly don the uniform.

It will be a day of misgivings for all fathers who realize how difficult the future during the war and long after victory will be for all children.

Fathers may be incapable of loving sons and daughters as deeply as mothers do, but the good father loves a child to the very depths of his soul—and the loss of that loved one breaks his heart.

The true father strives to be brave when his son has been slain, maimed, or imprisoned, or is in or soon to be in grave danger. He will try to keep himself braced, with his chin up, and carry on because he knows that's the way his boy would want him to act. Only a coward unfit to have a courageous son will use artificial things to sustain himself.

When a loving father receives the tragic news, "Killed in action," he is stunned as if he had been struck a terrific blow at the base of his brain. Blackness envelops him. He gasps and mumbles. His head whirls. He is sick inside. He has never known such pain unless he has had like word about another child. He tries to make himself think there's a mistake.

Friends come to him. They are kind—so very kind. They may feel nothing they can say or do will help, but their earnest voices and handclasps do help immeasurably.

If the mother lives, the father goes to her in their home and takes her in his arms. They weep together.

Dear neighbors sit with them for a while. Conversation is hushed. Possibilities which might warrant reason for doubt are discussed.

Messengers deliver telegrams, each mail brings letters, the telephone rings often.

Darkness the first nights is depressing. Fitful sleep is broken with sobs.

If they are Christians, they pray—for it is comforting.

Gradually consciousness of the sympathy and prayers of friends, sweet and beautiful memories of the departed, and the knowledge that he knew what he was fighting for and fell valorously in a glorious cause lifts the awful chills. After a time, the father and mother can smile and laugh over incidents of the son's babyhood, childhood, boyhood, and young manhood. His pranks, his problems, his joys and griefs, his tender deeds—all pass before them in fond recollection. They read his "I'm okay, don't worry, see you soon" letters. They look at his pictures, snapshot and posed, which reflect his life from the cradle until a few weeks before he crossed the mortal divide, and somehow they feel that in spirit he is right there with them. Moreover, they grow more and more sure that sometime there will be a happy reunion.

How much better that a boy die in honor than live in disgrace.

How much better that he give his life for his country than that he lose it in crime or a drunken joy ride.

How much better that he sleep in a hero's grave than that he live behind prison walls.

How much better that he is at rest than that he live for years hopelessly and helplessly insane, perhaps realizing his plight at intervals.

How much better that he is out there in that great company of American noblemen who gave their all for human freedom than that he live despised as a slacker.

Robert Alexander, of Davenport, the second Hawkeye Boys State Governor, was killed in air conflict with the Japanese.

"It's not how long you live but how," was in a frame on a wall of his room at home.

Many a boy who will not come back did far more to glorify God and country than millions of men who have lived and will live past three score and ten.

Some of the youths gone left young widows and babies they bade affectionate, hopeful farewells.

Some left wives who will give birth to babes they will never see on earth.

"I thank God I shall be the mother of my precious husband's child," many a one smiles through her tears.

Fathers worthy of sons who have given their young lives that America may live will do their utmost to be the kind of dads they died for.

On Father's Day, may all fathers of sons living—in uniform and out—figuratively unite in determination to inspire them by lofty patriotic conduct.

May the fathers of the dead join hands and reverently pledge:

"Here's to you, sons—under God we shall not let you down."

May all Americans—fathers and all others—on that day reconsecrate and rededicate themselves to the greatest possible service in the ideals for which the sons of America are struggling, bleeding, and dying.

And here's a salute to all good fathers gone.

Statement by Hon. Esequiel Padilla, Secretary of Foreign Relations of the Republic of Mexico, Before the Inter-American Defense Board

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DENNIS CHAVEZ

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 1, 1944

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a statement made by the Honorable Esequiel Padilla, Secretary of Foreign Relations of the Republic of Mexico, before the Inter-American Defense Board on July 11, 1944.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. President, gentlemen, once more I enjoy the deep satisfaction of being in the midst of this representative body of the armed forces of our American republics.

It was indeed a fortunate inspiration of the third meeting of ministers of foreign affairs at Rio de Janeiro to create the Inter-American Defense Board. To integrate a united continent it was indispensable to think of common defense. For aggressions of ambition America represents one of the greatest temptations in history. Its wealth, its opportunities of abundant life, its hospitable and fertile territory, and its institutions of progressive liberty and harmony were for a long time defended by distances and wide oceans. But now only a concerted unity of action and a compact civil and military solidarity can be an invulnerable shield for its destinies. A world organization for the maintenance of a permanent peace shall offer a constructive answer to the global clamor to abolish war. But America has the duty, in the meantime, of creating not a machine of aggression but a defense system, coordinated by cooperation, by judgment, by techniques, and by the common devotion to an ideal shared by all.

I believe that from the somber years we have lived, so full of dangers and of threats ready to break loose at any one of the dramatic moments of the totalitarian aggression, one of the conclusions we can draw is that in this continent of liberty and international fraternity it is imperative to maintain an invulnerable defense.

It is of transcendental importance to state that this Inter-American Defense Board, studying the defense of the continent, is indeed a source of confidence. Because of the existence of this institution, no armed preparation can take place in the silence of the isolation of any of our republics. It is to the interest of all to guarantee that no egotism shall prevail. This center of military cooperation is an active laboratory of the sentiments of brotherhood of the peoples of the Americas. Nothing brings human hearts closer together than to be on guard, from the same watchtower, against the dangers that may come from all routes in the horizon; and that due to a felicitous continental doctrine, no matter where they threaten any of our republics, they are, in fact, threatening the whole hemisphere.

It is of no consequence that the military participation of our peoples should be so unequal. This is an institute of equality. The amount of the contribution offers contrasting differences; but the spirit with which it is extended is the same in each and every case: that of devotion due to the cause of the Americas. The undaunted valor of the peoples and the sum total of the patriotism of all, forge one single American patriotism. This institute, therefore, represents, and must continue to represent, the valor of the continent, never for aggression but always resolute to defend the spiritual treasure and the grandeur of the Americas.

The Slaughter of the Little Pigs

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. COCHRAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 1, 1944

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, in 1933 as well as the following years a great deal was said and printed concerning the slaughter of little pigs. It was a desirable subject for some during the campaign of 1934, as well as 1936, and even in 1940.

Strange as it may seem, it was not until 11 years later that the true story was told. Why those who urged the slaughter remained quiet all those years I do not know, for it remained for Lowell Mellett, the columnist, to break the story. I have failed to see where anyone involved challenged his statement or even commented on it.

Mr. Speaker, under the permission granted me I include as part of my remarks an editorial from the St. Louis Post-Dispatch on the subject as well as Mr. Mellett's article. They follow:

[From the St. Louis Post-Dispatch]

LITTLE PIGS AND MASTER MINDS

There is a certain type of incident in public affairs which is made to order for the enemies of everyone who had any connection with it. Of such an order was leaf-raking, which furnished political capital to the foes of W. P. A. right up to the finish. Of the same order was the celebrated cause of the little pigs and their slaughter in the summer of 1933.

Regardless of its merits or demerits, the incident of the piglets possessed just those qualities of incongruity that could be used with damning effect against a man. And it could be used just as well by those who had favored the measure as by those who had condemned it even as a desperate device for keeping farmers from bankruptcy in a year when there was not enough corn to bring the pig crop to maturity.

Whenever blame has been leveled for this proceeding, it has been laid upon the shoulders of one man—HENRY WALLACE, then Secretary of Agriculture. Mr. WALLACE has been ridiculed, he has been represented as an apostle of scarcity, he has been attacked both fairly and unfairly—and mostly the latter—as the man who killed the little pigs.

It is unusually interesting therefore, to read Lowell Mellett's report, 11 years afterward, that the program was devised at a conference of corn-hog farmers from 10 Midwestern States and approved by the American Farm Bureau Federation, the National Grange, the National Farmers' Union, the Corn Belt Meat Producers and the Central Cooperative Exchange.

All these other gentlemen have sat back in dignified silence and let Mr. WALLACE take all the panning, all these years, and Mr. WALLACE has taken it like a man, accepting responsibility fully, and leaving others to accept theirs or not, just as their dispositions might lead them.

It is not a very flattering commentary on the others, but it is another testimony to the courage and unshakable decency of HENRY WALLACE.

[From the Washington Evening Star]

ON THE OTHER HAND

SLAUGHTER OF THOSE LITTLE PIGS IN 1933 PROVIDED FOOD FOR HUNGRY, SAYS WRITER

(By Lowell Mellett)

During this campaign you will be hearing again the horror tale about the little pigs. You may also be interested in hearing the truth, which I've never yet seen in print. This is it:

In the summer of 1933 the farmers in what are known as the corn-hog States were faced with a desperate problem. The price of hogs was ruinously low. Corn to feed the hogs was growing scarce; the Northwestern corn belt was suffering from drought. The foreign market had largely disappeared because of retaliatory tariffs and other restrictions.

Unaware of this prospect and not believing much in birth control anyhow, the hogs in the spring had blessed the farmers with an unusually large crop of pigs. The farmers, as a result, had millions of hungry little mouths to feed, a dwindling supply of corn, and the prospect of selling the porkers at a heavy loss if they were held off the market until they reached the age at which pigs usually are killed.

Name committee to act

On July 18, 1933, representatives of corn and hog farmers from Nebraska, South Dakota, Minnesota, Iowa, Kansas, Missouri, Wisconsin, Illinois, Indiana, and Ohio met in Des Moines, Iowa. The 76 delegates present named a committee of 25 to act, with Earl Smith, president of the Illinois Agricultural Association (now vice president of the American Farm Bureau Federation), as its chairman, and Ralph H. Moyer, Iowa farmer, secretary. The committee met in the Union League Club of Chicago, July 24 and 25, and there unanimously agreed on a plan to raise the price of hogs and relieve the pig situation. This called for asking the Agriculture Department to contract with the packers to purchase and process pigs weighing from 50 to 110 pounds, the product to be disposed of to the Red Cross or other relief agencies.

A subcommittee—Ed O'Neal; Earl Smith; Mr. Moyer; Clifford Gregory, Illinois farmer and publisher; and Roswell Garst, Iowa farmer—was named to meet with the Agriculture Department. The meeting occurred in Washington on August 7 and the proposals of the farmers were fully discussed. On August 10 a conference was held at the Willard Hotel, attended by corn and hog producers, farm-organization executives, packers, and others. Those present included Mr. O'Neal; Mr. McCloskey, who spoke for Mr. Taber, master of the National Grange; and Mr. Kennedy, who spoke for Mr. Simpson, president of the National Farmers' Union; Mr. Sykes, of the Corn Belt Meat Producers; and Mr. Crandall, of the Central Co-operative Exchange. All strongly endorsed the program.

Following the conference the details of the program were worked out and it was put into operation.

Food for hungry

The result was that 6,000,000 surplus little pigs were turned into 100,000,000 pounds of pork and the pork was distributed by the Government to feed the hungry—of which, you remember, there were millions that summer. Some very small pigs that could not be handled as meat by the packers were turned into grease and tankage for fertilizer and eventually "plowed under."

If these pigs had been held until the usual marketing age, they would have eaten about 75,000,000 bushels of corn. That would have produced a bad situation the following year, since the 1934 corn crop, due to the drought, was about a billion bushels short.

The squeals of the little pigs, born to die that humans might live, were heard briefly that summer of 1933 and then were heard no more. The squeals of certain humans, including some, no doubt, who helped eat the little pigs, still echo on occasion.

I've often wondered why HENRY WALLACE, who, for aiding this effort to save the farmers on the one hand and feed the city folks on the other, has been labeled the exponent of an "economy of scarcity," hasn't spent a little time in explaining the facts to the people of America. I've wondered even more why farm leaders like Ed O'Neal, of the Farm Bureau Federation, and Albert Goss, of the National Grange, and Jim Patton, of the Farmers' Union, have been so silent on the subject.

Excerpts From Addresses Made on the Floor of Congress by Hon. J. Harry McGregor, of Ohio

---

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. HARRY McGREGOR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 1, 1944

Mr. McGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, since I have been a Member of Congress, I have earnestly endeavored to voice on the floor of the House of Representatives the opinions of the people whom I have the honor to represent. In accordance with these opinions I have advocated a strong defense program, and since the declaration of war an all-out effort for the winning of the war.

I, therefore, under unanimous consent, include the following summary excerpts of a few speeches I have made on the floor of Congress in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

NATIONAL DEFENSE

(January 16, 1941, 10 months before Pearl Harbor)

I believe American citizens who must do the fighting, the dying and the paying for any war we get into, still have a right to differ as to our methods of defense, as to how far we ought to get into this war, and as to what our course for the future ought to be. As for myself, I want to say to you that I believe the Nation ought to turn, with the same energy it would if Washington were being bombed, to produce a national defense. We ought to be able to produce that national defense and at the same time vastly aid Britain with munitions of war. We have the productive capacity to do that. Therefore, in conclusion, I want to say that for my own part I think we must strain every fiber of our being to produce a national defense, and that we will have to see this thing through as a united people wholeheartedly devoted to the cause of winning the war, and protecting ourselves against any and all dictators.

(February 4, 1941, 9 months before Pearl Harbor)

We, of Congress, are those individuals who should have the information that will give us the understanding of the international affairs that we might give to the people back home true representative government. I call upon the leaders of this administration, and of this Congress, to submit to this body that information and quit forever the secret chamber meetings of a select few. I learned from my people that they want three things: First, peace; second, a strong defense program; and, third, a decentralization of power. We can and we must extend full aid to those who are fighting aggression if only for our own defense, but we cannot, we must not, abandon our own free government in the process.

NONDEFENSE EXPENDITURE

(April 1, 1941, 8 months before Pearl Harbor)

The people of my district are heartily in accord with an adequate defense program and are willing to pay for it, but they insist that this vast unnecessary expenditure for departments other than national defense must be immediately stopped. I again call on the leaders of this administration with this statement: "We are willing at all times to spend and pay for a defense program, but please quit calling on Congress to appropriate money for every conceivable department, labelling it under the guise of national defense."

NATIONAL DEFENSE

(June 17, 1941, 6 months before Pearl Harbor)

If there are specific things the President deemed necessary to have further authority to achieve, he should say what these things are; remove all obstacles which are hindering our defense program.

WHEAT QUOTA

(July 15, 1941)

Many farmers in my district need this excess wheat which the Government wants to penalize them for raising. They need it to feed their own livestock and poultry. With this thought in mind and wanting to assist the American farmer, I introduced yesterday a bill, known as H. R. 5303, which would allow the farmer to feed the wheat which he raises above his quota, and in that way bring him a small semblance of aid.

GAG RULE—TAX BILL

(July 30, 1941)

I say to the Members of the House—each of us is entitled to submit to the entire membership such suggestion and changes as he thinks would make the bill more equitable, more workable, more feasible. If this is a good bill, it should stand on its merits, and if we have amendments and suggestions we should be allowed to present them and let them be adopted or defeated upon their own merits. The statement has been made—vote a "gag rule" to protect ourselves and keep the Members from "going out on a limb." We are all 21 years old, have faced many issues. Let us face the real issue of taxation and remove some of the irregularities of this bill. Vote down the gag rule. Give us a chance to amend the bill. Let our people know we will do our best to represent them and say to the world we will not be a rubber stamp.

UNNECESSARY EXPENDITURES

(March 13, 1942)

I think I am speaking for my people when I ask the President to insist that the heads of departments, bureaus, and independent establishments, as an act of patriotism take an active part in this program to curtail unnecessary activities and personnel. The excess of Government personnel in Washington is plainly evident. Those in the Government service admit that practically every Government agency could get along as well, if not better, with less personnel.

UNITY NECESSARY TO WIN WAR

(May 4, 1942)

The American people should have but one aim at this time—the swift defeat of Axis Powers. To blame the interventionists or the anti-interventionists, or isolationists, is to play the enemies' game and to cause them to shout with joy. Those who continue these arguments or stir up racial group prejudice are interfering with our real aim—the winning of the war. The idea that a man cannot be 100 percent behind a war President and at the same time criticize and suggest where improvements can be made is pure dictator thinking.

REDUCTION IN NONESSENTIAL FEDERAL SPENDING

(March 30, 1943)

If we contemplate taking nearly a third of the national income in taxation, it is most important that our tax program be studied carefully to make sure that (1) it is directed to cut down excessive spending power where it exists and (2) that it does not cut so deeply into the spending power of any group as to endanger health and wartime efficiency. An ideal program would be to cut out all the excessive spending, reduce all Federal personnel about one-half, which would include a reduction of our Federal bureaus, and then submit a pay-as-you-go tax program that treats the rich and poor alike.

THE FARMER, HIS TROUBLES AND HIS NEEDS

(April 15, 1943)

The necessary food required to feed our people cannot be produced until the Government reduces the red tape and rescinds a large percent of its rules and regulations which are now being enforced and which are causing the American farmer to become discouraged. They have been pushed from pillar to post. Who is to be blamed for this bungling? Is it Congress? Is it the farmer? Is it the bureaucrat, who is not at all familiar with farm conditions, and yet issues rules and regulations under which the farmer must operate? Most assuredly it is not Congress, nor the farmer. In my opinion, the farmers' needs can be analyzed under these three points: (1) Labor, (2) machinery, and

(3) the right to produce without Government interference. The farmers have been asked to produce even more food than last year, but little consideration has been given to making these increased goals possible. The farmers have been stripped of their skilled workers until farm employment is at the lowest point in history.

O. P. A.

(July 2, 1943)

Failure of the O. P. A. in its meat-control program, as well as numerous other programs, is caused by confusion, red tape, and at times contradictory O. P. A. regulations, all of which are the result of too many attempted practices of theorists, rather than the operations of practical, experienced personnel. What we need in O. P. A. are men who will issue regulations based on good common sense. We cannot afford to experiment any longer, especially when such experimentation is being done at the expense and is a direct threat to the livelihood of every American. We, here in Congress, want to put a stop to this bungling and confusion and I hope we can do it now.

DESIRES OF MY PEOPLE

(October 1943)

My people—

1. Want to make every necessary sacrifice to win the war, but they are opposed to any unnecessary sacrifices.

2. Want Congress to retain its rights and be a legislative body, and not yield its control to any individual or group. They don't want a rubber-stamp Congress.

3. Want politics, jealousy, selfishness, greed, and profiteering taken out of our war program.

4. Want to know the truth about our war production, war policy, our gains and losses on the battle fronts. They want the news to come from our Government. They don't want to be dependent upon some of our allies for this information.

5. Want immediate dismissal of all on the Federal pay roll who are not needed and who are not giving performance comparable to their pay. Those not needed should be placed in armed service, on essential production lines, or on the farms.

6. Want the Federal Government to recognize State and local rights and the right of private and individual initiative.

7. Want policy-forming departments to be headed by individuals with practical experience, not theorists.

8. Want the right to work and the right to produce without unnecessary governmental red tape and interference.

9. Want Congress to establish a definite post-war policy, guaranteeing to the boys and girls when they return home, employment and a lasting peace.

Mr. Speaker, I am in complete accord with the above wants of my people, and I believe them to be the desires of the majority of the people of our Nation. I, therefore, respectfully urge and request that the leadership, as well as my colleagues in Congress, cooperate with me in every possible way in order that these wishes be fulfilled, all of which I am certain will be determining factors in bringing this war to an early and successful conclusion.

LET'S INVESTIGATE BEFORE WE TAX

(October 28, 1943)

Let's investigate our Federal bureaus, find out which are needed and which are not needed, how many people can be removed from the Federal pay roll without hindering our war effort, determine how much money is absolutely needed before we burden the people with additional taxes and pour more money into the Federal Treasury. Experience has proved to me if you give Federal bureaus and departments the money they will spend it. So, let us see if they actually need any more money; and if so, how much.

It is not my desire to prevent the necessary departments from having everything they need to carry on the war, but inefficiency and waste has never yet won a war. There definitely is a tremendous amount of waste and unnecessary expenditure, and the production and purchase of unnecessary goods, and the hiring of thousands of totally unnecessary people in our Government agencies. Why is it that the United States is spending more money on this war than all of our allies combined? Why this swarm of Federal employees, these unnecessary rules and expenditures which are increasing our taxes, while we preach economy and sacrifice?

We are ready to spend any amount of money actually needed to save a single life or shorten the war 1 minute, but we want these expenditures to be based upon actual needs, and not upon mere unfounded recommendations. Let us again reflect the thrift and common sense of our forefathers who founded this country. Let us all be champions of economy and good judgment and enemies of extravagance and waste.

VOTE FOR ARMED FORCES

(December 8, 1943)

Give to the men and women of our fighting units the right to vote, as well as legislation that will give a cash payment at the time of their discharge. The legislation relative to voting should allow them the franchise with a minimum of red tape and trouble. Since they are fighting to save our country, they want to vote to save our country. Thousands of men are being discharged practically penniless. Let's give them immediate financial assistance to help them get readjusted to civilian life. These are obligations that we cannot conscientiously postpone any longer.

MC GREGOR OBJECTS TO ADJOURNMENT

(December 20, 1943)

I want to go home—so do the boys and girls of our military units. But they cannot go, and we should not go. Let us all remain on the job every day, fight and work as one unit and in this way bring victory at an early date.

VOTE FOR ARMED FORCES

(February 2, 1944)

I am glad to take the floor and fight for the right of those who are wearing the uniform of our country. I will say unequivocally that I want our armed forces to vote, but I don't want them to be penalized or discriminated against because they are wearing the uniform. They certainly are entitled to the same ballot you and I have. They are American citizens giving their lives that you and I might live and vote for all those we want in public office. Let's give them that same privilege.

MC GREGOR SPEAKS IN BEHALF OF VETERANS

(March 28, 1944)

It is our duty as a Congress to develop a program to assure just and equal benefits for those of our armed forces.

Being a veteran of World War No. 1, I fully realize the difficulties encountered when we attempt to rehabilitate ourselves to civilian life after service in the armed forces.

The records will show that I have consistently supported all equitable legislation providing just and reasonable benefits for our fighting men and women of all wars, as well as for their dependents, and I hope that when the committee has hearings on these two bills—S. 1767 and H. R. 4357—relative to veterans of World War No. 2, the committee will also give some consideration to the needs of veterans and their dependents of World War No. 1. Let us give immediate aid for these groups of patriotic citizens.

MC GREGOR OPPOSES BUREAUCRATIC CONTROL

(May 25, 1944)

Mr. Speaker, we find that we now have scores of agencies set up by Executive directive, and, to a great extent, government by bureaucratic decree instead of government by legislation. Under this management, Government bureaus have the power of life and death over practically every individual and private business enterprise in the country.

The people are aroused, Congress should be aroused, and at once put a stop to the power of these Government bureaus which are practically destroying private business through the imposition of penalties. These bureaus have a control over industry, business and civilian life, and by directives make our laws and then serve as prosecutor, judge, and jury.

Certainly, Mr. Speaker, while we are fighting the greatest war in history, to preserve our freedom, we don't want to lose our own constitutional form of government. If we continue to allow bureaucratic control and government by Executive decrees, it will not be long until the legislative branch will be so stripped of authority and the executive department so entrenched that any attempt to recover constitutional government will be doomed for defeat.

So again I say, Mr. Speaker, we, as Members of Congress, can and must stop bureaucratic control or government by Executive directives. We represent the people and we stand between government by representation on one hand and government by bureaucracy and dictatorship on the other. We must lead the fight for the survival of our American institutions, our American people, and our American form of government.

The President's Speech at Boston, October 30, 1940

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EARL R. LEWIS

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 1, 1944

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of keeping the record straight and preventing any confusion as to what the facts are with respect to the President's Boston speech, made on October 30, 1940, I include herein an editorial contained in the Washington Times-Herald of Wednesday, July 26, 1944, which I believe gives the facts as they occurred:

P. S.—YOU CAN TAKE IT OFF YOUR INCOME TAX

When Mr. Roosevelt made his "again and again and again" speech at Boston on October 30, 1940, he spoke as follows:

"And while I am talking to you mothers and fathers, I give you one more assurance. I have said this before, but I shall say it again, and again, and again: Your boys are not going to be sent into any foreign wars.

"They are going into training to form a force so strong that, by its very existence, it will keep the threat of war far away from our shores. The purpose of our defense is defense."

Since calling attention to this statement by Mr. Roosevelt, which is what clinched the defeat of Wendell Willkie that year, we have had a great deal of mail declaring that we did not give the full quotation.

The letter writers—on the Roosevelt side, of course—generally assert that the President added the words:

"Unless we are attacked."

We reiterate that the quotation given above is the full quotation, and that nowhere in the record of that speech, nor in the recording of his voice on that occasion, do the words "unless we are attacked" appear.

As an evidence of our sincerity we will bet—no, pardon us, we are not supposed to bet on elections—we will offer to an organized charity the sum of $5,000, provided any party who questions the actuality of Mr. Roosevelt's words can prove we are wrong. This is on the understanding that the challenger will put up $5,000 if he is wrong, the charity to be designated by the winner.

"PUT NOT YOUR TRUST IN PRINCES"

While we are on the subject we might spring a few more direct quotes from Mr. Roosevelt, taken from more talks made just prior to the last election. On November 2, in Cleveland, he said, among other things:

"There is a great storm raging. It makes things harder for the world. And that storm, which did not start in this land of ours, is the true reason why I would like to stick by these people of ours until we reach the clear, sure footing ahead.

"We will make it—make it before the next term is over. We will make it and the world, we hope, will make it, too.

"When that term is over there will be another President, and many more Presidents in years to come."

Two days later, on November 4, while going up the Hudson Valley to Hyde Park, Mr. Roosevelt stopped to address some "old neighbors" on what he described as his sixth visit on the day before election.

"It is the last time, very obviously," he said, "that I will do that as a candidate for office, but you can be sure that in the years to come my heart will be in Dutchess County, where it always has been."

HERE WE LOSE QUOTATION MARKS

On November 8, 1940, Mr. Roosevelt held his first press conference after his reelection. We are not privileged to present direct quotations, because he long ago established a rule that reporters must beat around the bush and avoid the President's words within quotation marks.

So we can only give the gist of what passed at the press conference, although it is reasonably accurate, as all those who reported the occasion agree on it.

The room was crowded, and Mr. Roosevelt was in a victorious mood. One of the reporters, seizing the first chance, asked him whether he would he would stand by his assurances that he would not seek another term.

Mr. Roosevelt, possibly tired out by the campaign that was just over, turned snappish, and even angry.

The reporter, he said, had better return to grade school and learn the English language; the statement the President had issued before the election had been perfectly clear to the President and to everyone else as well.

At this point the assembled press laughed. The reporter blushed and started to ask another question. Mr. Roosevelt cut in again and said he was not there to teach the reporter English; the statement had been in English, perfectly clear English, and the reporter had better read it again.

The conference then passed on to other matters.

The moral of all this seems to be contained in Psalms cxvi: 3:

"Put not your trust in princes."

Acceptance Speech by Gov. Thomas E. Dewey

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT A. TAFT

OF OHIO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 1, 1944

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the acceptance speech delivered by Gov. Thomas E. Dewey, to the Republican National Convention at Chicago on June 28, 1944.

There being no objection, the speech was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I am profoundly moved by the trust you have placed in me. I deeply feel the responsibility which goes with your nomination for President of the United States at this grave hour of our Nation's history.

That I have not sought this responsibility, all of you know. I told the people of my State, 2 years ago, that it was my intention to devote my full term as Governor exclusively to their service. You have decided otherwise. In accordance with the principles of our republican form of government you have laid upon me the highest duty to which an American can be called. No one has a right to refuse that call. With the help of God. I shall try to be worthy of the trust. I accept the nomination.

I am happy and proud to be associated in this effort with my good friend the distinguished Governor of Ohio—John W. Bricker.

For many months John Bricker has gone from State to State telling people what the real issues are and telling them the need for better government and what great good will come with election of Republicans.

MADE NO PLEDGES

Never before in the history of our party has any man displayed such fine sportsmanship as he did this morning, and I am proud to be associated with him.

I come to this great task a freeman. I have made no pledges, promises, or commitments, expressed or implied, to any man or woman. I shall make none, except to the American people.

These pledges I do make:

To men and women of the Republican Party everywhere I pledge my utmost efforts in the months ahead. In return, I ask for your support. Without it, I cannot discharge the heavy obligation you lay upon me.

To Americans of every party I pledge that on January 20 next year our Government will again have a Cabinet of the ablest men and women to be found in America. Its members will expect and will receive full delegation of the powers of their office. They will be capable of administering those powers. They will each be experienced in the task to be done and young enough to do it. This election will bring an end to one-man government in America.

To Americans of every party I pledge a campaign dedicated to one end above all others—that this Nation under God may continue in the years ahead a free nation of freemen.

At this moment on battlegrounds around the world Americans are dying for the freedom of our country. Their comrades are pressing on in the face of hardship and suffering. They are pressing on for total victory and for the liberties of all of us.

Everything we say or do today and in the future must be devoted to the single purpose of that victory. Then, when victory is won, we must devote ourselves with equal unity of purpose to rewinning at home the freedom they have won at such desperate cost abroad.

To our allies let us send from this convention one message from our hearts: The American people are united with you to the limit of our resources and our manpower, devoted to the single task of victory and the establishment of a firm and lasting peace.

To every member of the Axis powers let us send this message: By this political campaign, which you are unable to understand, our will to victory will be strengthened, and with every day you further delay surrender the consequences to you will be more severe.

NO DOUBT OF VICTORY

That we shall win this war none of us and few of our enemies can now have any doubt. But how we win this war is of major importance for the years ahead. We won the last war, but it did not stay won. This time we must also win the purposes for which we are fighting. Germany must never again nourish the delusion that she could have won. We must carry to Japan a defeat so crushing and complete that every last man among them knows that he has been beaten. We must not merely defeat the armies and navies of our enemies. We must defeat, once and for all, their will to make war. In their hearts as well as with their lips let them be taught to say: "Never again."

The military conduct of the war is outside this campaign. It is and must remain completely out of politics. General Marshall and Admiral King are doing a superb job. Thank God for both of them. Let me make it crystal clear that a change of administration next January cannot and will not involve any change in the military conduct of the war. If there is not now any civilian interference with the military and naval commands, a change in administration will not alter that status. If there is civilian interference, the new administration will put a stop to it forthwith.

But the war is being fought on the home front as well as abroad. While all of us are deeply proud of the military conduct of the war, can we honestly say that the home front could not bear improvement? The present administration in Washington has been in office for more than 11 years. Today it is at war with Congress and at war with itself. Squabbles between Cabinet members, feuds between rival bureaucrats, and bitterness between the President and his own party members, in and out of Congress, have become the order of the day. In the vital matters of taxation, price control, rationing, labor relations, manpower, we have become familiar with the spectacle of wrangling, bungling, and confusion.

Does anyone suggest that the present national administration is giving either efficient or competent government? We have not heard that claim made, even by its most fanatical supporters. No, all they tell us is that in its young days it did some good things. That we freely grant. But now it has grown old in office. It has become tired and quarrelsome. It seems that the great men who founded this Nation really knew what they were talking about when they said that three terms were too many.

PEACE MUST BE BUILT

When we have won the war, we shall still have to win the peace. We are agreed, all of us, that America will participate with other sovereign nations in a cooperative effort to prevent future wars. Let us face up boldly to the magnitude of that task. We shall not make secure the peace of the world by mere words. We cannot do it simply by drawing up a fine-sounding treaty. It cannot be the work of one man or of a little group of rulers who meet together in private conferences. The structure of peace must be built. It must be the work of many men. We must have as our representatives in this task the ablest men and women America can produce, and the structure they join in building must rest upon the solid rock of a united American public opinion.

I am not one of those who despair of achieving that end. I am utterly confident we can do it. For years, we have had men in Washington who were notoriously weak in certain branches of arithmetic but who specialized in division. They have played up minor differences of opinion among our people until the people of other countries might have thought that America was cleft in two.

But all the while there was a large, growing area of agreement. Recently the overwhelming majority of that broad area of agreement has become obvious. The Republican Party can take pride in helping to define it and broaden it. There are only a few, a very few, who really believe that America should try to remain aloof from the world. There are only a relatively few who believe it would be practical for America or her allies to renounce all sovereignty and join a superstate. I certainly would not deny those two extremes the right to their opinions; but I stand firmly with the overwhelming majority of my fellow citizens in that great wide area of agreement. That agreement was clearly expressed by the Republican Mackinac declaration and was adopted in the foreign policy plank of this convention.

No organization for peace will last if it is slipped through by stealth or trickery or the momentary hypnotism of high-sounding phrases. We shall have to work and pray and be patient and make sacrifices to achieve a really lasting peace. That is not too much to ask in the name of those who have died for the future of our country. This is no task for men who specialize in dividing our people. It is no task to be entrusted to stubborn men, grown old and tired and quarrelsome in office. We learned that in 1919.

The building of the peace is more than a matter of international cooperation. God has endowed America with such blessings as to fit her for a great role in the world. We can only play that role if we are strong and healthy and vigorous as Nature has equipped us to be. It would be a tragedy after this war if Americans returned from our armed forces and failed to find the freedom and opportunity for which they fought. This must be a land where every man and woman has a fair chance to work and get ahead. Never again must free Americans face the specter of long-continued, mass unemployment. We Republicans are agreed that full employment shall be a first objective of national policy. By full employment I mean a real chance for every man and woman to earn a decent living at a decent wage.

NEW DEAL FAILED UNEMPLOYED

What hope does the present administration offer here? In 1940, the year before this country entered the war, there were still 10,000,000 unemployed. After 7 years of unequaled power and unparalleled spending, the New Deal had failed utterly to solve that problem. It never solved that problem. It was left to be solved by war. Do we have to have a war in order to get jobs?

What are we now offered? Only the dreary prospect of a continued war economy after the war, with interference piled on interference and petty tyrannies rivaling the very regimentation against which we are now at war.

The present administration has never solved this fundamental problem of jobs and opportunity. It never can solve this problem. It has never even understood what makes a job. It has never been for full production. It has lived in chattering fear of abundance. It has specialized in curtailment and restriction. It has been consistently hostile to and abusive of American business and American industry, although it is in business and industry that most of us make our living.

In all the record of the past 11 years is there anything that suggests the present administration can bring about high-level employment after this year? Is there any reason to believe that those who have so signally failed in the past can succeed in the future? The problem of jobs will not be easily solved; but it will never be solved at all unless we get a new, progressive administration in Washington—and that means a Republican administration.

For 150 years America was the hope of the world. Here on this great broad continent we had brought into being something for which men had longed throughout all history. Here all men were held to be free and equal. Here government derived its just powers from the consent of the governed. Here men believed passionately in freedom, independence—the God-given right of the individual to be his own master. Yet, with all of this freedom—I insist, because of this freedom—ours was a land of plenty. In a fashion unequaled anywhere else in the world, America grew and strengthened; our standard of living became the envy of the world. In all lands, men and women looked toward America as the pattern of what they themselves desired. And because we were what we were, goodwill flowed toward us from all corners of the earth. An American was welcomed everywhere and looked upon with admiration and regard.

FORWARD WITH VIGOR

At times we had our troubles, made our share of mistakes, but we faltered only to go forward with renewed vigor. It remained for this past 11 years, under the present national administration, for continuing unemployment to be accepted with resignation as the inevitable condition of a nation past its prime.

It is the New Deal which tells us that America has lost its capacity to grow. We shall never build a better world by listening to those counsels of defeat. Is America old and worn out? Look to the beaches of Normandy for the answer. Look to the reaches of the wide Pacific—to the corners of the world where American men are fighting. Look to the marvels of production in the war plants in your own towns. I say to you: Our country is just fighting its way through to new horizons. The future of America has no limit.

True, we now pass through dark and troubled times. Scarcely a home escapes the touch of dread anxiety and grief; yet in this hour the American spirit rises, faith returns—faith in our God, faith in our fellowman, faith in the land our fathers died to win, faith in the future, limitless, and bright of this, our country.

In the name of that faith we shall carry our cause in the coming months to the American people.

Kill the Japs!

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. H. H. CARSON
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 1, 1944

Mr. CARSON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following poem by James Francis Thierry, of Canton, Ohio:

KILL THE JAPS!

(By James Francis Thierry)

On an afternoon one Sunday
Came the news upon the air:
"Japs have knifed us at Pearl Harbor
From their Asiatic lair"—
Kill the Jap rats! Kill the Japs!

Many a month of war has seared us,
And another story comes
Of the fiendish crimes committed
By those bloody little bums—
Kill the Jap rats! Kill the Japs!

They have killed and tortured thousands
In the death traps of the east—
And we'll wreak a fearful vengeance
For their brutal vulture feast—
Kill the Jap rats! Kill the Japs!

We must blast and beat and batter
Every rotten little Jap!
We must smash their savage empire—
We must wipe them off the map.
Kill the Jap rats! Kill the Japs!

Cries of vengeance ride the storm-wings
Of a nation's bitter wrath.
Through Japan's corrupted cities
Bombs will blast a blazing path.
Kill the Jap rats! Kill the Japs!

By our martyrs at Manila,
Bataan and Corregidor.
We'll avenge our fallen heroes
When we win this fearful war.
Kill the Jap rats! Kill the Japs!

In New Guinea stands MacArthur
In the sunset's golden gleam—
Sworn to wield the Sword of Vengeance,
And the Philippines redeem.
Kill the Jap rats! Kill the Japs!

Send our bombers over Tokio—
Speeded by our cold disgust.
Wipe it out like ancient Carthage,
Smashed completely into dust.
Kill the Jap rats! Kill the Japs!

O'er Balboa's mighty ocean
Swim the rats of black Japan.
To the brute Mikado's rat-tail
Uncle Sam will tie a can.
Kill the Jap rats! Kill the Japs!

Death to that unclean Mikado,
And to all his evil crew.
While the Eagle screams defiance
O'er the heaven's vault of blue:
Kill the Jap rats! Kill the Japs!

Franco, Farrell, and De Gaulle

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EMANUEL CELLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 1, 1944

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by me over Station WOR, July 12, 1944:

Two devastating wars within 25 years have taught us at least one lesson. Freedom cannot be maintained in any one country without regard to what happens to freedom in other countries. As was wisely stated by Mr. Joseph M. Jones in Fortune magazine, we have paid a horrifying toll "to learn that unless the democratic principle is maintained in a vigorous, living, and growing state, protected and extended in the world, it will either wither away and die or be destroyed in its citadel." The United States not only have the greatest stake in protecting and extending the democratic principle, but as world leader, symbol of freedom in the world, is the only country that is in a position to take the lead in that great task.

To that end America must nurture and encourage the spread of that democracy with its free elections, freedom of speech, religion, and press, and protection of rights of the individual with equality before the law and freedom from arbitrary search and arrest.

Concomitantly any force that traduces that democracy must be destroyed, whether it be fascism in Italy, Falangism in Spain or Argentina, nazi-ism in the Reich, or Japanism in Asia and the Pacific.

Therefore, the democracy of a French Committee of National Liberation under a De Gaulle must be encouraged, while the despotism of Franco in Spain must be eliminated and the fascism of a Farrell in Argentina must be discouraged.

You cannot confine or isolate fascism any more than you can confine a stink in a closet. It seeps through and befouls the air. Our own freedom is correspondingly contaminated with Franco flourishing to our east and Farrell to our south.

The world cannot exist half free and half Fascist, half liberated, half coerced and cowed.

What shall be our policy, for instance, toward Franco after we shall have beaten Hitler? Certainly we cannot accept this tyrant in the family of respectable nations. Franco and his Falange crushed democracy in Spain because the United States, England, and France (at England's bidding) failed to aid the Republicans. Our tragic nonintervention helped sustain this foe of democracy.

Shall we aid him again as we did another Fascist monster—Mussolini—and offer him money to make his trains run on time?

Shall we continue to recognize Franco? No. Shall we, in common parlance, give the "hot foot" to the Fascist Farrell regime in Argentina? Yes.

Why? Because it is the only way we can use our great powers and influence to restore the conditions of freedom in these benighted lands; otherwise another Schickelgruber on horseback or a howling dervish on a cannon top will again so entrench himself as to require a third world war to dislodge him.

Franco has rightfully been called "appeasement's child." If it were left to me, I might say "brat." Since the end of the Spanish civil war, the history of Allied Nations' negotiation with Spain reveals one appeasement after another, and the tragedy of it all was that the one-way concessions by England and the United States yielded naught. They merely served to increase Franco's already voracious appetite. He has never taken the trouble to disguise his community of interest and purpose with Hitler and Mussolini.

With utter spinelessness, we accorded Franco a credit of $13,350,000 through our Export-Import Bank to supply him with much-needed cotton.

Our objective, of course, was good will. But our gifts proved as useless as water going down a drain. We did not even wait for Franco to ask for favors. We coddled him. We actually sought him out and bestowed our largesse upon him. We delivered to him at bargain prices two 12,600-ton ships. In return, our embassy at Madrid was stoned by Falangists from the University of Madrid with the open connivance of the Government.

We gave Franco half a million dollars' worth of flour, dried and condensed milk, and medicines, paid for out of a congressional appropriation, to the Red Cross for the relief of the war stricken. The American food remained in Spain all right, but equivalent amounts were exported to Hitler. It was not generally advertised among the Spanish people that the American Government had been so generous to them.

Regardless, he sent his evil-reeking Blue Division of Fascist Spaniards to fight against Russia, our ally, on the eastern front. Then adding insult to injury, he sent a congratulatory message to José Laurel, puppet Quisling of the Japan-sponsored government of the Philippines. At this moment Franco continues to ship wolfram, so valuable and strategic a metal in airplane manufacture, to Hitler.

He continues to permit Spain to be a happy hunting ground for Axis spies. Many an American merchant ship and transport has been sunk by Axis subs because Madrid was a veritable pipe line of intelligence as to ship movements passing Gibraltar and Tangier, Spanish Morocco.

If we so desire we certainly have the power to bend El Caudillo to our will. He must depend upon us for gasoline, raw materials, and machinery. He must depend upon England for coal and for the navicerts to forward much-needed corn, wheat, and meat from the Argentine.

He no longer presents a military danger to us. He cannot now imperil our supply lines. Even Gibraltar is no longer menaced by Franco. The Rock is safe, with the Allies in complete control of north Africa and the Mediterranean. The Azores, too, are in Allied possession. Portugal's threat has been immunized. D-day has come and is now a date in history.

At best, Franco can only thrust a paper sword at us. All is not well with him at this juncture in Spain. Uneasy lies his head with its thorny crown. Despite the fact that thousands of Republican militiamen are still held without bail in Franco's jails, many patriots and loyalists are ready to band together to fight Franco.

More than 100,000 Spanish Republicans—refugees in South and Central America—are being organized for the liberation of Spain from Generalissimo Francisco Franco's fascism.

Let's get rid of him fast. We should oust the Spanish Ambassador from Washington and recall permanently our Ambassador, the Francophile Carlton Hayes, at once, and then sever diplomatic relations.

Finally we must employ all possible economic sanctions with complete encirclement and blockade of Spain. That would bring El Caudillo cringing to his knees immediately. It would break the pseudo backbone of Spanish fascism at once.

There is another Fascist nation that needs quarantining and that is Argentina. It is proving a cat's paw for Hitler and apes his techniques. Its President, Gen. Edelmiro Farrell, its Col. Juan Domingo Peron recently made the Vice President, need money for rearmament. They confiscate Jewish bank accounts. Newspapers brave enough to speak the truth are taken over and their editors jailed. All political parties have been dissolved. This means the complete collapse of the machinery through which democracy can function. Charters have been taken away from all religious minority groups, thus effectively stamping out freedom of religion. Liberals, radicals, and labor leaders have been placed in internment camps.

Peron delivered an unparalleled jingoistic speech on June 10. He said an Axis or Allied victory would make no difference to Argentina. He boasted that a totalitarian state is the only solution to Argentine needs. A war economy and a warlike life are utterly essential for his country.

Secretary Hull has wisely and none too soon recalled Norman Armour, our Ambassador. This has thrown Farrell and Peron and their cabinet into a state of agitation. Newspapers were ordered to make no mention of Armour's recall. Britain too has recalled her envoy. The simultaneous departure of the Ministers of Peru, Paraguay, and Chile was a severe jolt to the militarists.

Strongest economic sanctions should follow and Farrell and Peron must be brought to book.

We have at long last realized that the military clique that rules Argentina represents a complete triumph for Hitler and Franco in that there has been set up a pure Fascist state in the Western Hemisphere.

Ecuador is threatened with reprisals unless it goes Fascist. Farrell refuses to allow Ecuador to ship quinine to the United States. On Paraguay's border, Argentine Fascist troops threaten to prevent Paraguay's Government from following a firm inter-American Good-neighbor policy. Peron and Farrell place burdensome restrictions against Uruguayan travel and commerce unless Uruguay steps in line. The threat to little Uruguay became so serious that we had to send a squadron down to Montevideo and Admiral Ingram announced that the United States would defend its friend Uruguay against Farrell's totalitarianism.

Farrell knows that aggression is essential to Fascist success. He lost no time in training his guns on Bolivia as well and overthrew the existing government and set up a Fascist regime.

Buenos Aires is a rendezvous of Axis spies.

Argentine presents a most dangerous threat to the future of democracy in South America. Argentine has been flooded with posters and placards denouncing the damned Yankees. Farrell is using Argentine's belated and spurious break with the Axis as an excuse for suppressing all the constitutional rights of the people.

We should blockade the ports of Argentina, embargo essential gasoline, and terminate a most lucrative export trade of hides, corn, meat, and wheat. The Farrell-Peron militarist-Fascist government would then collapse.

While we successfully fight gangsterism, nazi-ism and fascism abroad we cannot let it flourish in our own hemisphere's back yard.

De Gaulle is truly representative of France and the French people. The world hails him as the one general in the entire French Cabinet who absolutely refused to surrender. Now all America has welcomed and cheered him.

In my humble opinion, the President errs in withholding complete recognition from De Gaulle and the French Committee as the provisional government of France. This organization, with De Gaulle at its head, is the spontaneous creation of French patriotism, French resistance, and French democracy.

General De Gaulle has no competitor. This gallant soldier has been received at the White House with full diplomatic pomp and ceremony. Apparently he has been accorded every honor save the one he most covets—that of full recognition for his committee and for himself as chief of metropolitan and Empire France. Yet, in France's darkest hour, he refused obeisance to Vichy. It was De Gaulle who escaped to snatch up the flag of France and bid her people rise from paralyzing defeat—and utter despair. He rallied the weary, war-torn French with his cry, "France has lost a battle—but France has not lost the war!" He spat upon Laval and his collection of French Quislings. His bravery caused the most staunch hearts of France to gather around him, to organize the famous underground, the Maquisards, popularly known as the Maquis, and to supervise their resistance so that today, despite Nazi threats and actual reprisals, they control much of France and menace to a great extent Hitler's lines of supply.

As we penetrate deeper into the parts of Normandy liberated by Allied arms, it will be De Gaulle's provisional government that will restore civil authority. Until such time as the free French people, under the Constitution of the Third Republic, shall be enabled to reconstitute their government, this provisional committee is the guardian of all French rights and the trustee of the power and sovereignty of the French people. De Gaulle is their democratic choice. He should not be fed recognition with an eye-dropper.

I hope that the culmination of De Gaulle's visit will be a full understanding between President Roosevelt and the provisional government of the French Republic, ending finally in complete recognition. De Gaulle represents 50,000,000 Frenchmen of metropolitan and colonial France, with an army, navy, and an air force operating in Africa, Italy, Russia, Great Britain, Normandy, and the Pacific Ocean.

It is difficult to understand our continued recognition of the worthless, hollow Fascist regimes of Franco and Farrell and Peron and our resistance to complete recognition of the democratic free France under De Gaulle. The contradiction does not make any sense to me.

A Poem of a Father to His Son

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RICHARD F. HARLESS

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 1, 1944

Mr. HARLESS of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have included in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a poem written by Mr. E. B. Wallace, of Bisbee, Ariz., to his son, relative to his oath of loyalty to the United States. At the time the verse was written the boy was attending a secret radio activities school somewhere in these United States.

FOR MY SON BILLY, SEAMAN FIRST CLASS, UNITED STATES NAVY

I pledge allegiance to my flag,
May God my witness be;
No tyrant foe can ever drag
Its furls on land or sea.

My heart will thrill with joy and pride
As thy stars and stripes unfold,
Exalted reverence from inside,
Its glories yet untold.

May I be mindful of my trust;
Dear God, direct my way
To know at all times that I must Look up to Thee and pray.

Oh, my America, I am proud
To be one of thy sons;
To serve thee well, if I'm allowed
To man thy ships and guns.

I swear by all that I hold dear,
By all I do or say;
My sacred trust, be ever near
My heart, my U. S. A.

No reservations will I hold,
My pledge, my oath, to thee;
My strength, my all, till I am old,
My land of Liberty.

From Dad,

E. B. WALLACE.

BISBEE, ARIZ.

Republican Platform, 1944

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT A. TAFT

OF OHIO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 1, 1944

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the Republican platform of 1944, adopted by the Republican National Convention on June 27, 1944, in Chicago, Ill.

There being no objection, the platform was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REPUBLICAN PLATFORM 1944

The tragedy of the war is upon our country as we meet to consider the problems of government and our people. We take this opportunity to render homage and enduring gratitude to those brave members of our armed forces who have already made the supreme sacrifice, and to those who stand ready to make the same sacrifice that the American course of life may be secure.

Mindful of this solemn hour and humbly conscious of our heavy responsibilities, the Republican Party in convention assembled presents herewith its principles and makes these covenants with the people of our Nation.

THE WAR AND THE PEACE

We pledge prosecution of the war to total victory against our enemies in full cooperation with the United Nations and all-out support of our Armies and the maintenance of our Navy under the competent and trained direction of our General Staff and Office of Naval Operations without civilian interference and with every civilian resource. At the earliest possible time after the cessation of hostilities we will bring home all members of our armed forces who do not have unexpired enlistments and who do not volunteer for further overseas duty.

We declare our relentless aim to win the war against all our enemies: (1) For our own American security and welfare; (2) to make and keep the Axis powers impotent to renew tyranny and attack; (3) for the attainment of peace and freedom based on justice and security.

We shall seek to achieve such aims through organized international cooperation and not by joining a world state.

We favor responsible participation by the United States in post-war cooperative organization among sovereign nations to prevent military aggression and to attain permanent peace with organized justice in a free world.

Such organization should develop effective cooperative means to direct peace forces to prevent or repel military aggression. Pending this, we pledge continuing collaboration with the United Nations to assure these ultimate objectives.

We believe, however, that peace and security do not depend upon the sanction of force alone, but should prevail by virtue of reciprocal interests and spiritual values recognized in these security agreements. The treaties of peace should be just; the nations which are the victims of aggression should be restored to sovereignty and self-government; and the organized cooperation of the nations should concern itself with basic causes of world disorder. It should promote a world opinion to influence the nations to right conduct, develop international law and maintain an international tribunal to deal with justiciable disputes.

We shall seek, in our relations with other nations, conditions calculated to promote world-wide economic stability, not only for the sake of the world, but also to the end that our own people may enjoy a high level of employment in an increasingly prosperous world.

We shall keep the American people informed concerning all agreements with foreign nations. In all of these undertakings we favor the widest consultation of the gallant men and women in our armed forces who have a special right to speak with authority in behalf of the security and liberty for which they fight. We shall sustain the Constitution of the United States in the attainment of our international aims; and pursuant to the Constitution of the United States any treaty or agreement to attain such aims made on behalf of the United States with any other nation or any association of nations, shall be made only by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur.

We shall at all times protect the essential interests and resources of the United States.

WESTERN HEMISPHERE RELATIONS

We shall develop pan-American solidarity. The citizens of our neighboring nations in the Western Hemisphere are, like ourselves, Americans. Cooperation with them shall be achieved through mutual agreement and without interference in the internal affairs of any nation. Our policy should be a genuine good-neighbor policy commanding their respect, and not one based on the reckless squandering of American funds by overlapping agencies.

POST-WAR PREPAREDNESS

We favor the maintenance of post-war military forces and establishments of ample strength for the successful defense and the safety of the United States, its possessions, and outposts, for the maintenance of the Monroe Doctrine, and for meeting any military commitments determined by Congress. We favor the peacetime maintenance and strengthening of the National Guards under State control with Federal training and equipment as now provided in the National Defense Act.

DOMESTIC POLICY

We shall devote ourselves to re-establishing liberty at home.

We shall adopt a program to put men to work in peace industry as promptly as possible and with special attention to those who have made sacrifice by serving in the armed forces. We shall take Government out of competition with private industry and terminate rationing, price-fixing, and all other emergency powers. We shall promote the fullest stable employment through private enterprise.

The measures we propose shall avoid federalization of Government activities, to the end that our States, schools, and cities shall be free; shall avoid delegation of legislative and judicial power to administrative agencies, to the end that the people's representatives in Congress shall be independent and in full control of legislative policy; and shall avoid, subject to war necessities, detailed regulation of farmers, workers, businessmen, and consumers, to the end that the individual shall be free. The remedies we propose shall be based on intelligent cooperation between the Federal Government, the States, and local government, and the initiative of civic groups—not on the panacea of Federal cash.

Four years more of New Deal policy would centralize all power in the President, and would daily subject every act of every citizen to regulation by his henchmen; and this country could remain a republic only in name. No problem exists which cannot be solved by American methods. We have no need of either the communistic or the fascist technique.

SECURITY

Our goal is to prevent hardship and poverty in America. That goal is attainable by reason of the productive ability of free American labor, industry, and agriculture, if supplemented by a system of social security on sound principles.

We pledge our support of the following:

1. Extension of the existing old-age insurance and unemployment insurance systems to all employees not already covered.

2. The return of the public employment-office system to the States at the earliest possible time, financed as before Pearl Harbor.

3. A careful study of Federal-State programs for maternal and child health, dependent children, and assistance to the blind, with a view to strengthening these programs.

4. The continuation of these and other programs relating to health, and the stimulation by Federal aid of State plans to make medical and hospital service available to those in need without disturbing doctor-patient relationships or socializing medicine.

5. The stimulation of State and local plans to provide decent low-cost housing properly financed by the Federal Housing Administration, or otherwise, when such housing cannot be supplied or financed by private sources.

LABOR

The Republican Party is the historical champion of free labor. Under Republican administrations American manufacturing developed, and American workers attained the most progressive standards of living of any workers in the world. Now the Nation owes those workers a debt of gratitude for their magnificent productive effort in support of the war.

Regardless of the professed friendship of the New Deal for the workingman, the fact remains that under the New Deal American economic life is being destroyed.

The New Deal has usurped selfish and partisan control over the functions of Government agencies where labor relationships are concerned. The continued perversion of the Wagner Act by the New Deal menaces the purposes of the law and threatens to destroy collective bargaining completely and permanently.

The long series of Executive orders and bureaucratic decrees reveal a deliberate purpose to substitute for contractual agreements of employers and employees the political edicts of a New Deal bureaucracy. Labor would thus remain organized only for the convenience of the New Deal in enforcing its orders and inflicting its whims upon labor and industry.

We condemn the conversion of administrative boards, ostensibly set up to settle industrial disputes, into instruments for putting into effect the financial and economic theories of the New Deal.

We condemn the freezing of wage rates at arbitrary levels and the binding of men to their jobs as destructive to the advancement of a free people. We condemn the repeal by Executive order of the laws secured by the Republican Party to abolish "contract labor" and peonage. We condemn the gradual but effective creation of a labor front as but one of the New Deal's steps toward a totalitarian state.

We pledge an end to political trickery in the administration of labor laws and the handling of labor disputes; and equal benefits on the basis of equality to all labor in the administration of labor controls and laws, regardless of political affiliation.

The Department of Labor has been emasculated by the New Deal. Labor bureaus, agencies, and committees are scattered far and wide, in Washington and throughout the country, and have no semblance of systematic or responsible organization. All governmental labor activities must be placed under the direct authority and responsibility of the Secretary of Labor. Such labor bureaus as are not performing a substantial and definite service in the interest of labor must be abolished.

The Secretary of Labor should be a representative of labor. The office of the Secretary of Labor was created under a Republican President, William Howard Taft. It was intended that a representative of labor should occupy this Cabinet office. The present administration is the first to disregard this intention.

The Republican Party accepts the purposes of the National Labor Relations Act, the Wages and Hours Act, the Social Security Act, and all other Federal statutes designed to promote and protect the welfare of American working men and women, and we promise a fair and just administration of these laws.

American well-being is indivisible. Any national program which injures the national economy inevitably injures the wage earner. The American labor movement and the Republican Party, while continuously striving for the betterment of labor's status, reject the communistic and New Deal concept that a single group can benefit while the general economy suffers.

AGRICULTURE

We commend the American farmers, their wives and families, for their magnificent job of wartime production and their contribution to the war effort, without which victory could not be assured. They have accomplished this in spite of labor shortages, a bungled and inexcusable machinery program, and confused, unreliable, impractical price and production administration.

Abundant production is the best security against inflation. Governmental policies in war and in peace must be practical and efficient with freedom from regimentation by an impractical Washington breaucracy in order to assure independence of operation and bountiful production, fair and equitable market prices for farm products, and a sound program for conservation and use of our soil and natural resources. Educational progress and the social and economic stability and well-being of the farm family must be a prime national purpose.

For the establishment of such a program we propose the following:

1. A Department of Agriculture under practical and experienced administration free from regimentation and confusing Government manipulation and control of farm programs.

2. An American market price to the American farmer and the protection of such price by means of support prices, commodity loans, or a combination thereof, together with such other economic means as will assure an income to agriculture that is fair and equitable in comparison with labor, business, and industry. We oppose subsidies as a substitute for fair markets.

3. Disposition of surplus war commodities in an orderly manner without destroying markets or continued production and without benefit to speculative profiteers.

4. The control and disposition of future surpluses by means of (a) new uses developed through constant research, (b) vigorous development of foreign markets, (c) efficient domestic distribution to meet all domestic requirements, and (d) arrangements which will enable farmers to make necessary adjustments in production of any given basic crop only if domestic surpluses should become abnormal and exceed manageable proportions.

5. Intensified research to discover new crops, and new and profitable uses for existing crops.

6. Support of the principle of bona fide farmer-owned and farmer-operated cooperatives.

7. Consolidation of all Government farm credit under a nonpartisan board.

8. To make life more attractive on the family-type farm through development of rural roads, sound extension of rural electrification service to the farm, and elimination of basic evils of tenancy wherever they exist.

9. Serious study of and search for a sound program of crop insurance with emphasis upon establishing a self-supporting program.

10. A comprehensive program of soil, forest, water, and wildlife conservation and development, and sound irrigation projects, administered as far as possible at State and regional levels.

BUSINESS AND INDUSTRY

We give assurance now to restore peacetime industry at the earliest possible time, using every care to avoid discrimination between different sections of the country, (a) by prompt settlement of war contracts with early payment of Government obligations and disposal of surplus inventories, and (b) by disposal of surplus Government plants, equipment and supplies, with due consideration to small buyers and with care to prevent monopoly and injury to existing agriculture and industry.

Small business is the basis of American enterprise. It must be preserved. If protected against discrimination and afforded equality of opportunity throughout the Nation, it will become the most potent factor in providing employment. It must also be aided by changes in taxation, by eliminating excessive and repressive regulation and Government competition, by the enforcement of laws against monopoly and unfair competition, and by providing simpler and cheaper methods for obtaining venture capital necessary for growth and expansion.

For the protection of the public, and for the security of millions of holders of policies of insurance in mutual and private companies, we insist upon strict and exclusive regulation and supervision of the business of insurance by the several States where local conditions are best known and where local needs can best be met.

We favor the reestablishment and maintenance, as early as military considerations will permit, of a sound and adequate American merchant marine under private ownership and management.

The Republican Party pledges itself to foster the development of such strong privately owned air-transportation systems and communications systems as will best serve the interests of the American people.

The Federal Government should plan a program for flood control, inland waterways and other economically justifiable public works, and prepare the necessary plans in advance so that construction may proceed rapidly in emergency and in times of reduced employment. We urge that States and local governments pursue the same policy with reference to highways and other public works within their jurisdiction.

TAXATION AND FINANCE

As soon as the war ends the present rates of taxation on individual incomes, on corporations, and on consumption should be reduced as far as is consistent with the payment of the normal expenditures of government in the postwar period. We reject the theory of restoring prosperity through government spending and deficit financing.

We shall eliminate from the budget all wasteful and unnecessary expenditures and exercise the most rigid economy.

It is essential that Federal and State tax structures be more effectively coordinated to the end that State tax sources be not unduly impaired.

We shall maintain the value of the American dollar and regard the payment of government debt as an obligation of honor which prohibits any policy leading to the depreciation of the currency. We shall reduce that debt as soon as economic conditions make such reduction possible.

Control of the currency must be restored to Congress by repeal of existing legislation which gives the President unnecessary and dangerous powers over our currency.

FOREIGN TRADE

We assure American farmers, livestock producers, workers and industry that we will establish and maintain a fair protective tariff on competitive products so that the standards of living of our people shall not be impaired through the importation of commodities produced abroad by labor or producers functioning upon lower standards than our own.

If the post-war world is to be properly organized, a great extension of world trade will be necessary to repair the wastes of war and build an enduring peace. The Republican Party, always remembering that its primary obligation, which must be fulfilled, is to our own workers, our own farmers and our own industry, pledges that it will join with others in leadership in every cooperative effort to remove unnecessary and destructive barriers to international trade. We will always bear in mind that the domestic market is America's greatest market and that tariffs which protect it against foreign competition should be modified only by reciprocal bilateral trade agreements approved by Congress.

RELIEF AND REHABILITATION

We favor the prompt extension of relief and emergency assistance to the peoples of the liberated countries without duplication and conflict between Government agencies.

We favor immediate feeding of the starving children of our allies and friends in the Nazi-dominated countries and we condemn the New Deal administration for its failure, in the face of humanitarian demands, to make any effort to do this.

We favor assistance by direct credits in reasonable amounts to liberated countries to enable them to buy from this country the goods necessary to revive their economic systems.

BUREAUCRACY

The national administration has become a sprawling, overlapping bureaucracy. It is undermined by executive abuse of power, confused lines of authority, duplication of effort, inadequate fiscal controls, loose personnel practices and an attitude of arrogance previously unknown in our history.

The times cry out for the restoration of harmony in Government, for a balance of legislative and executive responsibility, for efficiency and economy, for pruning and abolishing unnecessary agencies and personnel, for effective fiscal and personnel controls, and for an entirely new spirit in our Federal Government.

We pledge an administration wherein the President, acting in harmony with Congress, will effect these necessary reforms and raise the Federal service to a high level of efficiency and competence.

We insist that limitations must be placed upon spending by Government corporations of vast sums never appropriated by Congress but made available by directives, and that their accounts should be subject to audit by the General Accounting Office.

TWO-TERM LIMIT FOR PRESIDENT

We favor an amendment to the Constitution providing that no person shall be President of the United States for more than two terms of 4 years each.

EQUAL RIGHTS

We favor submission by Congress to the States of an amendment to the Constitution providing for equal rights for men and women. We favor job opportunities in the post-war world open to men and women alike without discrimination in rate of pay because of sex.

VETERANS

The Republican Party has always supported suitable measures to reflect the Nation's gratitude and to discharge its duty toward the veterans of all wars.

We approve, have supported and have aided in the enactment of laws which provide for reemployment of veterans of this war in their old positions, for mustering-out pay, for pensions for widows and orphans of such veterans killed or disabled, for rehabilitation of disabled veterans, for temporary unemployment benefits, for education and vocational training, and for assisting veterans in acquiring homes and farms and in establishing themselves in business.

We shall be diligent in remedying defects in veterans legislation and shall insist upon efficient administration of all measures for the veteran's benefit.

RACIAL AND RELIGIOUS INTOLERANCE

We unreservedly condemn the injection into American life of appeals to racial or religious prejudice.

We pledge an immediate congressional inquiry to ascertain the extent to which mistreatment, segregation, and discrimination against Negroes who are in our armed forces are impairing morale and efficiency, and the adoption of corrective legislation.

We pledge the establishment by Federal legislation of a permanent Fair Employment Practice Commission.

ANTI-POLL TAX

The payment of any poll tax should not be a condition of voting in Federal elections and we favor immediate submission of a constitutional amendment for its abolition.

ANTILYNCHING

We favor legislation against lynching and pledge our sincere efforts in behalf of its early enactment.

INDIANS

We pledge an immediate, just, and final settlement of all Indian claims between the Government and the Indian citizenship of the Nation. We will take politics out of the administration of Indian affairs.

PROBLEMS OF THE WEST

We favor a comprehensive program of reclamation projects for our arid and semiarid States, with recognition and full protection of the rights and interests of those States in the use and control of water for present and future irrigation and other beneficial consumptive uses.

We favor (a) exclusion from this country of livestock and fresh and chilled meat from countries harboring foot-and-mouth disease or Rinderpest; (b) full protection of our fisheries, whether by domestic regulation or treaties; (c) consistent with military needs, the prompt return to private ownership of lands acquired for war purposes; (d) withdrawal or acquisition of lands for establishment of national parks, monuments, and wildlife refuges, only after due regard to local problems and under closer controls to be established by the Congress; (e) restoration of the long-established public-land policy which provides opportunity of ownership by citizens to promote the highest land use; (f) full development of our forests on the basis of cropping and sustained yield; cooperation with private owners for conservation and fire protection; (g) the prompt reopening of mines which can be operated by miners and workers not subject to military service and which have been closed by bureaucratic denial of labor or material; (h) adequate stock piling of war minerals and metals for possible future emergencies; (i) continuance, for tax purposes, of adequate depletion allowances on oil, gas, and minerals; (j) administration of laws relating to oil and gas on the public domain to encourage exploratory operations to meet the public need; (k) continuance of present Federal laws on mining claims on the public domain, good-faith administration thereof, and we state our opposition to the plans of the Secretary of the Interior to substitute a leasing system; and (l) larger representation in the Federal Government of men and women especially familiar with western problems.

HAWAII

Hawaii, which shares the Nation's obligations equally with the several States, is entitled to the fullest measure of home rule looking toward statehood; and to equality with the several States in the rights of her citizens and in the application of all our national laws.

ALASKA

Alaska is entitled to the fullest measure of home rule looking toward statehood.

PUERTO RICO

Statehood is a logical aspiration of the people of Puerto Rico who were made citizens of the United States by Congress in 1917; legislation affecting Puerto Rico, insofar as feasible, should be in harmony with the realization of that aspiration.

PALESTINE

In order to give refuge to millions of distressed Jewish men, women, and children driven from their homes by tyranny, we call for the opening of Palestine to their unrestricted immigration and land ownership, so that in accordance with the full intent and purpose of the Balfour Declaration of 1917 and the resolution of a Republican Congress in 1922, Palestine may be constituted as a free and democratic commonwealth. We condemn the failure of the President to insist that the mandatory of Palestine carry out the provision of the Balfour Declaration and of the Mandate while he pretends to support them.

FREE PRESS AND RADIO

In times like these, when whole peoples have found themselves shackled by governments which denied the truth, or, worse, dealt in half-truths or withheld the facts from the public, it is imperative to the maintenance of a free America that the press and radio be free and that full and complete information be available to Americans. There must be no censorship except to the extent required by war necessity.

We insistently condemn any tendency to regard the press or the radio as instruments of the administration and the use of Government publicity agencies for partisan ends. We need a new radio law which will define, in clear and unmistakable language, the role of the Federal Communications Commission.

All channels of news must be kept open with equality of access to information at the source. If agreement can be achieved with foreign nations to establish the same principles, it will be a valuable contribution to future peace.

Vital facts must not be withheld.

We want no more Pearl Harbor reports.

GOOD FAITH

The acceptance of the nominations made by this convention carries with it, as a matter of private honor and public faith, an undertaking by each candidate to be true to the principles and program herein set forth.

CONCLUSION

The essential question at trial in this Nation is whether men can organize together in a highly industrialized society, succeed, and still be free. That is the essential question at trial throughout the world today.

In this time of confusion and strife, when moral values are being crushed on every side, we pledge ourselves to uphold with all our strength the Bill of Rights, the Constitution, and the law of the land. We so pledge ourselves that the American tradition may stand forever as the beacon light of civilization.

Benefits of Veterans and Their Dependents and Their Rights Under Existing Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. EARL R. LEWIS
OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 1, 1944

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker, there is no subject of more widespread interest throughout the Nation than the benefits of veterans and their dependents under existing law. There is scarcely a family in this Nation that does not have some member in the armed forces of the United States and, for the purpose of enabling the dependents of veterans and returning veterans when they return from the wars to obtain quickly information as to their rights and benefits provided by existing law, I wish to herewith submit the following brief digest of existing statutes passed in their behalf.

G. I. BILL

The act of June 22, 1944, known as the Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944, provides:

TITLE I. HOSPITALIZATION, CLAIMS, AND PROCEDURES

First. Adequate organization of the Veterans' Administration to administer all veterans' benefits except employment.

Second. Adequate hospital facilities for the care and treatment of veterans for non-service-connected disabilities or diseases as well as for disabilities or diseases incurred in service.

Third. The right to have explained to him, before discharge or release from active service, all rights and benefits to which the veteran may be entitled, and an opportunity, if he so desires, to file a claim therefor.

Fourth. The right to adequate prosthetic appliances—artificial limbs, eyes, and teeth—and necessary training to effect the greatest possible benefits in the use of such appliances.

Fifth. Adequate safeguards—as against forced statements against the interests of the veteran.

Sixth. Adequate contact facilities in Army and Navy discharge centers, including those furnished by the services of the American Red Cross, by national veterans organizations and by the Veterans' Administration.

Seventh. Prompt transfer of the essential records of service departments to the Veterans' Administration and prompt adjudication of claims for benefits.

Eighth. The right of review in cases of irregular discharge or release from active service—

(a) By the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, to determine whether the person, at time of committing the offense, was insane, in event of which determination benefits to which the person would otherwise be entitled shall not be forfeited;

(b) Except in case of separation by sentence of general court martial, any enlisted man or officer may have a review by an authorized board to determine the correctness of such discharge or dismissal;

(c) Any officer retired or released to inactive status without pay may, likewise, have a review by an authorized board to determine retirement rights.

Under both (b) and (c) above, the claim for review must be filed within 15 years after discharge or dismissal or within 15 years after the effective date of the act, whichever is later.

TITLE II. EDUCATION OF VETERANS

First. One year, or the equivalent thereof, in continuous or part-time study, of education or training—

(a) At any school or institution of the veteran's choice.

(b) In any subject or subjects desired for which he is fitted.

Second. Not to exceed 3 additional years of education and training, depending upon—

(a) Length of service.

(b) Satisfactory progress in studies or training.

(c) The condition that the person was not over 25 years of age at the time of entrance into service, or, if over such age, that his education or training was impeded, delayed, interrupted, or interfered with by reason of entrance into service.

Third. Payment of all tuition and other fees, cost of books, supplies, equipment, and other necessary expenses, not to exceed a maximum of $500 per school year.

Fourth. Subsistence allowance while pursuing education or training in the amount of $50 per month if the veteran is without dependents, or $75 per month if he has a dependent or dependents.

Fifth. Part-time attendance in a course of education or training at a reduced subsistence allowance or without allowance but the payment of tuition and other expenses.

Sixth. The right to have released to him books and equipment furnished if he satisfactorily completes his course of education or training.

Seventh. The right to vocational education for service-incurred disabilities is extended to those who served during the period from September 16, 1940, to December 6, 1941.

TITLE III. LOANS FOR THE PURCHASE OR CONSTRUCTION OF HOMES, FARMS, AND BUSINESS PROPERTY

First. Loans for the purposes stated or for the alteration or improvement of buildings or equipment may be guaranteed not to exceed 50 percent of the loan. The total amount guaranteed as to any one person not exceeding the aggregate of $2,000.

(a) Loans may be made by an individual or by private or public—State or Federal—lending agencies or institutions;

(b) The proceeds of the proposed loan must be used for one or more of the purposes specified and the circumstances must meet the specifications prescribed;

(c) Interest rate must not exceed 4 percent per annum;

(d) The loan must be practicable and suitable to the veteran's circumstances;

(e) The loan must be repaid within 20 years;

(f) The Government must have the right of subrogation to the extent of any guarantee paid;

(g) The liability under the guarantee must decrease or increase with the decrease or increase of the amount of unpaid obligation;

(h) The agreement must permit the Government to protect itself in case of default through the right to bid on foreclosure proceedings or to refinance.

Second. In the event a principal loan is made or guaranteed or insured by a Federal agency, a loan for all or part of the balance or the purchase price or cost may be guaranteed—

(a) If it does not exceed $2,000;

(b) If it does not exceed 20 percent of the cost or purchase price;

(c) If the interest rate does not exceed by more than 1 percent the interest rate on the principal loan;

(d) If the conditions otherwise meet those prescribed under 1 above.

Third. Any veteran eligible under title III shall also be eligible for the benefits of the Bankhead-Jones Farm Tenant Act, as amended, to the same extent as if he were a farm tenant. Eligibility must be determined—

(a) By Administrator of Veterans' Affairs;

(b) By the Secretary of Agriculture.

TITLE IV. EMPLOYMENT OF VETERANS

First. The right to registration for employment with or for placement in employment by the Veterans' Employment Service through—

(a) The United States Employment Service,

(b) Any State employment agency cooperating with the United States Employment Service.

It should be noted also that this right applies to any veteran of any war, discharged or released from active service under conditions other than dishonorable discharge; and it should also be noted that, while the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs is made responsible for veterans' employment, that is not a function of the Veterans' Administration but is retained in the United States Employment Service.

TITLE IV. READJUSTMENT ALLOWANCES FOR FORMER MEMBERS OF THE ARMED FORCES WHO ARE UNEMPLOYED

First. Unemployment allowances of $20 per week while unemployed, subject to the following conditions:

1. The week of unemployment must have begun—

(a) After the first Sunday of the third calendar month after the effective date of the act;

(b) Not later than 2 years after discharge or release from active service, or the termination of the war, whichever be the later date.

2. That the veteran shall not receive subsistence allowance for education or training under title II of the act or increased pension for vocational training under Public Law No. 16, Seventy-eighth Congress.

3. To be eligible, the person must—

(a) Reside in the United States;

(b) Be completely unemployed—or if partially unemployed, at wages less than $23 per week;

(c) Be registered with and reporting to a public employment office;

(d) Be able to work and available for suitable work.

4. Any person will be disqualified from receiving an allowance if—

(a) He leaves suitable work voluntarily, without good cause or is suspended or discharged for misconduct;

(b) He, without good cause, fails to apply for suitable work or to accept suitable work offered;

(c) He fails, without good cause, to attend an available free training course;

(d) He is participating in a strike or labor dispute causing a work stoppage;

(e) Added penalties apply to successive disqualifying offenses.

5. Within the 52 weeks limit the total eligibility is determined by allowing 8 weeks of allowances for each of the first 3 months of service and 4 weeks of allowances for each month or major fraction thereof of service thereafter.

6. The allowance of $20 per week will be reduced by any Federal or State unemployment or disability compensation other than pension, compensation or retired pay paid by the Veterans' Administration, received by the veteran for the same period of time.

Second. Any person self-employed for profit in an independent establishment, trade, business, profession, or other vocation is eligible for readjustment allowances—

(a) If net earnings are less than $100 for the previous calendar month.

(b) The amount of allowance to be the difference between the net earnings and $100 per month.

(c) The conditions as to eligibility otherwise as provided in title V, except the qualifications and disqualifications.

Third. Severe penalties are provided for fraud and misrepresentation in connection with claims for readjustment allowances.

Fourth. Readjustment allowance claims are to be serviced by State agencies or, as to railway employees, by the Railroad Retirement Board.

Fifth. Right of appeal from any such agency to the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs is preserved.

TITLE VI. GENERAL ADMINISTRATIVE AND PENAL PROVISIONS

First. By definition "veterans" include those who reside within the continental United States, the several States, territories and possessions, and the District of Columbia.

Second. A discharge or release from active service under conditions other than dishonorable is made a prerequisite to entitlement to benefits under Public Law No. 2, as amended, as well as this act. This will apply to—

(a) Pensions.

(b) Compensation.

(c) Hospitalization.

(d) Domiciliary care.

(e) Vocational training;

(f) Benefits provided by this act.

Declaration is made that benefits received under this act shall be deducted from any benefit afforded by subsequent legislation, if any, in the nature of adjusted pay or compensation for service.

VETERANS' BENEFITS UNDER OTHER LAWS—ALLOTMENTS AND ALLOWANCES ADMINISTERED BY THE WAR AND NAVY DEPARTMENTS

The following amounts are paid for the support of soldiers' dependents:

A wife only, $50.

Wife and one child, $80.

Wife and two children, $100.

For each additional child, an additional $20.

One child but no wife, $42.

For each additional child, an additional $20.

If the parents are dependent upon the soldier:

One parent will receive $50.

Two parents, $68.

One parent and one dependent brother or sister, $68.

Two parents and one dependent brother or sister, $79.

One brother or sister but no parent, $42.

For each additional dependent brother or sister, an additional $11.

DOMICILIARY CARE

The United States Soldiers' Home, under jurisdiction of the War Department, or Naval Home, under jurisdiction of the Navy Department. This is in addition to that provided by the Veterans' Administration.

EMPLOYMENT

Return to his job after discharge under jurisdiction of Selective Service; placing in other jobs, War Manpower Commission; veterans' preference, administered by United States Civil Service Commission and various departments and agencies; job training, rehabilitation (nonservice disability), administered by the Federal Security Agency.

INSURANCE

Old-age and survivors insurance administered by the Social Security Board, Federal Security Agency.

UNEMPLOYMENT BENEFITS

Social Security Board, Federal Security Agency.

RETIREMENT PAY

Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard administered for officers and enlisted personnel of the regularly established and reserve components of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard.

TAXES

Bureau of Internal Revenue: All veteran benefits under laws administered by the Veterans' Administration are exempt from all taxation.

MUSTERING-OUT PAY

Act of February 3, 1944, Public Law No. 225, Seventy-eighth Congress: Mustering-out pay of $300 for persons who have performed active service for sixty days or more, have served outside the continental limits of the United States or Alaska; $200 for persons who have performed active service for sixty days or more and have served no part thereof outside the continental limits of the United States or Alaska; $100 for persons who have performed active service for less than sixty days.

PENSIONS FOR SPANISH-AMERICAN WAR, BOXER REBELLION, AND PHILIPPINE INSURRECTION VETERANS

Act of March 1, 1944, Public Law No. 242, Seventy-eighth Congress: Pensions were increased for these veterans, based upon total disability or age 65, from $60 to $75 per month. Previous law was liberalized with respect to the limiting of marriage and governing eligibility of widows of deceased veterans for service pension purposes by changing the limiting date of marriage from September 1, 1922, to January 1, 1938; and provided for increased pension to widows of this group by granting $40 per month to a widow when the age of 65 years is attained, or $50 per month if the widow or former widow was the wife of a veteran during the period of his service in the war.

VETERANS OF INDIAN WARS

Act of March 3, 1944, Public Law No. 245, Seventy-eighth Congress: Increased the rate for total disability or age 65 to $60 per month; and authorized the rate of $100 per month where the veteran is in need of regular aid and attendance of another person. The act also liberalized the marriage date previously limited to March 3, 1917, by including additional widows married after that date if 60 years of age and if married to the veteran 10 or more years prior to his death, with the requirement of continuous cohabitation with the veteran from date of marriage to date of death; and increased the service pension from $30 to $40 per month upon the attainment by the widow of age 70 years and $50 per month if the widow was the wife of the veteran during the period of his service in the Indian wars.

NATIONAL GUARD AND SELECTIVE SERVICE MEN'S PENSION BENEFITS UNDER CERTAIN CONDITIONS

Act of May 11, 1944, Public Law 300, Seventy-eighth Congress: Provided for volunteers, National Guard men, and selectees pension benefits based upon disability resulting from injury or disease incurred in the line of duty while reporting under orders of the local draft board and prior to acceptance or rejection from service. This act provides benefits similar to those which were provided for World War No. 1 cases.

SEEING-EYE DOGS, ETC., FOR BLIND VETERANS

Act of May 24, 1944, authorized the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to provide seeing-eye dogs trained for the aid of blind veterans who are entitled to disability compensation under laws administered by the Veterans' Administration and to provide such veterans with mechanical and electronic equipment for aiding them to overcome their handicap of blindness.

INCREASED PENSION RATES

Act of May 27, 1944, Public Law No. 312, Seventy-eighth Congress: Increased by 15 percent the service-connected disability rates of compensation or pension payable to the veterans of World War No. 1 and World War No. 2 and veterans entitled to wartime rates based on service on or after September 16, 1940, for service-connected disabilities; increased the rates for widows and children under Public Law No. 484, Seventy-third Congress, as amended, which provides compensation to the widow and children where any World War No. 1 veteran dies of non-service-connected cause but at the time of death had a service-connected disability and included widows and children of World War No. 2 veterans for benefits under the said Public Law No. 484, as amended.

PENSION BASED UPON NON-SERVICE-CONNECTED DISABILITY

Act of May 27, 1944, Public Law No. 313, Seventy-eighth Congress: Increased the pension payable for non-service-connected disability of permanent and total degree applicable to veterans of World War No. 1 and the Spanish-American War, including the Boxer Rebellion and the Philippine Insurrection, from $40 to $50 per month, and increased the rate to $60 per month where such veterans shall have been rated permanently and totally disabled and in receipt of pension for a continuous period of 10 years, or reached the age of 65 and are permanently and totally disabled. The act also made the benefits above described available to World War No. 2 veterans.

RETIRED PAY

Act of May 27, 1944, Public Law No. 314, Seventy-eighth Congress: Provides for the payment of pension or compensation to certain persons receiving retired pay by permitting a waiver of so much of the retired pay and allowances as is equal in amount to the pension or compensation to which the retired person is otherwise entitled. Inasmuch as pensions and compensation are exempt from income tax and retired pay other than that for disability incurred in line of duty, is not so exempt. The effect of this act is to permit exemption of so much of the retired pay as is waived in order to receive pension or compensation.

COMPENSATION AND PENSION FOR DISABILITY OR DEATH

Service-connected disability: Under the Veterans' Regulations promulgated by the act of March 20, 1933, as amended, honorably discharged veterans of World War No. 1 and World War No. 2 are entitled to compensation or pension for disabilities incurred in or aggravated by such service in line of duty. The rates range from $10 per month for 10-percent disability to $100 per month for total disability. Special rates are payable for specific losses, such as hand, foot, or eye, and so forth, the highest rate being $250 per month. While the World War No. 2 veterans were entitled to these rates following the act of December 19, 1941, they were placed on complete parallel under the Veterans' Regulations promulgated under the act of July 13, 1943, Public Law 144, Seventy-eighth Congress, with reference to the requirements governing proof of service connection of disability. The later act also liberalized the regulation concerning the presumption of soundness upon entry into service. Under Public Law 312, Seventy-eighth Congress, approved May 27, 1944, the monthly rates of compensation or pension payable to veterans of World War No. 1 and World War No. 2 include veterans entitled to wartime rates based upon service on or after September 16, 1940, for service-incurred disability, not including special awards and allowances fixed by law, were increased by 15 percent.

In lieu of such pension or compensation, Reserve officers called to active duty and officers appointed in the Army of the United States meeting the requirements of the Army regulations pertaining to the retirement of officers of the Regular Establishment, are retired by the War Department, certified to the Veterans' Administration, and their retired pay, equal to 75 percent of their base pay, is paid by the Veterans' Administration out of the pension appropriation.

NON-SERVICE-CONNECTED DISABILITY

Public Law No. 313, Seventy-eighth Congress, approved May 27, 1944: The rate of pension for permanent and total non-service-connected disability applicable to veterans of the Spanish-American War, including the Boxer Rebellion, the Philippine Insurrection, and World War No. 1, was increased to $60 per month where such veterans have been rated permanent and total, in receipt of pension for a continuous period of 10 years or reached the age of 65 and are permanently and totally disabled. This act also provides that the above pension for non-service-connected disability shall apply to both veterans of World War No. 1 and World War No. 2.

SERVICE-CONNECTED DEATH

The rates of compensation or pension for widows, children, and dependent parents of World War No. 1 and World War No. 2 veterans, based upon death in service or service-connected death are as follows:

Widow, no child, $50.

Widow, one child—with $13 for each additional child—$65.

No widow, but one child, $25.

No widow, but two children—with $10 for each additional child, the total not to exceed $100—$38.

Dependent father and mother, each $25; or one only, $45.

The above rates are contained in Public Law 144, Seventy-eighth Congress, July 13, 1943, and constitutes a material liberalization of the prior rates.

NON-SERVICE-CONNECTED DEATH

The widow, children, or child of any deceased veteran of World War No. 1 or World War No. 2 are entitled to the following rates of compensation if the veteran at the time of death from a non-service-connected cause had a disability incurred in or aggravated by such war service:

Widow, but no child, $35.

Widow, with one child—with $5 for each additional child—$45.

No widow, but one child, $18.

No widow, but two children—equally divided—$27.

No widow, but three children—equally divided—$36, with $4 for each additional child—the total amount to be equally divided.

Payments are limited to an aggregate in any one case.

The same law, Public Law 312, Seventy-eighth Congress, May 27, 1944, also included widows and children of World War No. 2 veterans—previously the provision had applied only to World War No. 1 veterans.

CLAIMS AND EFFECTIVE DATE OF AWARDS

Except in cases of members of the military or naval service transferred to a veterans' facility, and except in cases of enlisted men discharged for disability whose claims with essential service and medical records are forwarded to area offices for adjudication, the applicant shall file claim on proper form which will be supplied upon inquiry addressed to any Veterans' Administration facility or regional office or to the local representative of the local Red Cross or veterans' service organization.

HOSPITALIZATION OF DISCHARGED PERSONNEL

Under interagency agreement, when a person who is to be discharged from military or naval service is in need of further hospital care, prior arrangements are made by the commanding officer to afford him opportunity to file all necessary claims, supply necessary clinical and service data, and send the veteran to the Veterans' Administration facility designed to receive him—C. AR 615–360, change No. 4, April 16, 1943. If the disabled person is insane or incompetent, the manager of the Veterans' Administration facility will fill all necessary claims for him.

DEATH IN THE SERVICE

Upon death in the service, the service department notifies the Veterans' Administration and claims forms are sent immediately to all known dependents.

GROUPS POTENTIALLY ELIGIBLE FOR PENSIONS

All members of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, and the Women's Army Corps, the Women's Reserve of the Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard, members of the Public Health Service or of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, when ordered to active service with the Army or Navy or as to United States Public Health Service while service outside the continental limits of the United States or in Alaska, and as to Coast and Geodetic Survey when assigned during present war to duty on business of War or Navy Departments in areas outside continental United States or in Alaska or coastal areas of the United States as determined by the War and Navy Departments to be of immediate military hazard, are potentially eligible for pensions.

THE WOMEN'S ARMY AUXILIARY CORPS

The Women's Army Auxiliary Corps was not in the active service and while the several Women's Reserve Corps of the Navy, Marine Corps and Coast Guard originally were in the active service, they were by statute precluded from pension eligibility; in lieu thereof, being subject to laws pertaining to employees compensation. Legislation was subsequently enacted making the Women's Army Corps, the Women's Reserve of the Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard components eligible potentially for pension benefits (Public Law 110, 78th Cong., approved July 1, 1943; Public Law 183, 78th Cong., approved November 8, 1943; and Public Law 214, approved December 23, 1943).

MEDICAL AND HOSPITAL CARE, PROSTHETIC APPLIANCES AND DOMICILIARY CARE

Eligibility is extended to any veteran of World War No. 1 or World War No. 2 honorably discharged, having a service-connected disability requiring such care, treatment, or appliance, or one who was discharged for disability and not dishonorably; also one not dishonorably discharged who is unable to defray his expenses, has tuberculosis or a neuropsychiatric ailment or disability which requires hospital care.

Dependent upon availability of facilities, eligibility includes any veteran of World War No. 1 and World War No. 2 not dishonorably discharged, suffering from disability, disease, or defect, and who is in need of such care and is unable to defray the expenses therefor—regardless of whether the disability, disease, or defect was due to service.

The service groups included are all components of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, the respective Women's Reserve thereof, and United States Public Health Service and Coast and Geodetic Survey under the conditions stated for pension purposes.

The Veterans' Administration maintains at present 94 facilities and has contract facilities with a total of 92,019 beds, distributed as follows—as of March 23, 1944:

Tuberculosis	6,212
Neuropsychiatric	39,417
General medical and surgical	25,658
Domiciliary	16,117
Contract—other governmental	4,227
State and private	388
Total	92,019

LOCATION OF DIAGNOSTIC CENTERS

Diagnostic centers with expert specialists available are maintained at Hines, Chicago, Ill.; San Francisco, Calif.; and Mt. Alto, Washington, D. C. Cancer clinics: Bronx, N. Y.; Hines, Chicago, Ill.; Mt. Alto, Washington, D. C.; Atlanta, Ga.; Portland, Oreg.; and Los Angeles, Calif.

The present building program will raise this total to more than 100,000 beds. The Veterans' Administration anticipates an eventual need of 300,000 beds to enable veterans of World War No. 2 and of prior wars to receive hospital and domiciliary care to the same extent as is now provided. However, this estimated maximum should not be needed until a considerable period of time after the war, or require eventual additional construction of more than 100,000 beds since there will be, under present plans, 100,000 beds in Veterans' Administration facilities and it is anticipated that it should be possible to obtain the same number from the Army and Navy shortly after the termination of the war.

CLAIMS

Any person who is to be discharged from active service and who is in need of and entitled to hospitalization by the Veterans' Administration shall transfer directly to the Veterans' Administration facility designated to receive him. Claim for all benefits and necessary clinical and service data accompany him or are filed by the manager if the veteran is insane or incompetent.

All others should file claim for treatment or hospitalization directly with the nearest Veterans' Administration facility or regional office. (One or more are in each State in the Union except Delaware.)

While domiciliary care cannot be said to be a part of the rehabilitation process, it is a valuable benefit for those who have reached a permanent state of disability and have no other means of support.

VOCATIONAL REHABILITATION

Public Law 16, Seventy-eighth Congress, approved March 24, 1943: This law provides: First, that any person who served in the active military or naval service at any time after December 6, 1941, and prior to the termination of the present war; second, and who was honorably discharged; third, and who has a disability incurred in or aggravated by such service for which pension is payable under laws administered by the Veterans' Administration or would be but for the receipt of retirement pay; four, who is in need of vocational rehabilitation to overcome the handicap of such disability shall be entitled to such vocational rehabilitation as may be prescribed by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to fit him for employment consistent with the degree of disablement. There are 53 such facilities which, generally speaking, are bounded by State boundary lines. The course of training prescribed by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to fit the veteran for employment may not exceed 4 years and may not extend beyond 6 years after the termination of the present war.

PURPOSE OF REHABILITATION

The purpose of rehabilitation is to restore employability lost by reason of a handicap due to service-incurred disability. In performing the functions imposed upon the Administration by Public Law 16, it will be the purpose of the Veterans' Administration to utilize educational institutions and establishments of recognized standing in the training of these disabled veterans into employment and to train each person as near his home as may be possible. Employment of veterans has been accomplished to a considerable extent through the United States Employment Service. It will be the purpose to correlate all Federal and State facilities to the end that those vocationally trained will be graduated into employment opportunities.

While the disabled veteran is in training his pension, unless it equals or exceeds such amount, will be increased to $80 per month if single; $90 per month if married; with $5 additional for each child and $10 for each dependent parent. All expenses of training, including necessary transportation, are paid. Medical care is given as required.

CLAIMS

Those persons discharged from the service directly to the Veterans' Administration facilities for hospitalization will have their claims filed and processed and the question of need for and entitlement to vocational rehabilitation may be given consideration as soon as the individuals' physical and mental condition make training feasible. Any other person honorably discharged from the service may make claims for vocational rehabilitation in the claim for pension which may be filed at the nearest Veterans' Administration facility or regional office.

INSURANCE

National service life insurance was provided under the act of October 8, 1940, Public Law 801, Seventy-sixth Congress, and liberalizing amendments thereto were enacted during the Seventy-seventh and Seventy-eighth Congresses. A number of other liberalizing proposals are pending in the present Congress and the Veterans' Administration has submitted certain proposed changes found to be justified by studies conducted.

Application may be made for not less than $1,000 nor more than $10,000 without physical examination prior to the expiration of 120 days from entrance into active service. Thereafter, any such person in the active military or naval service may apply if the application be accompanied by acceptable evidence of good health.

APPLICATIONS

Application forms are supplied the service departments, and may be obtained from the commanding officer or designated insurance officer. The applicant may elect to pay premiums in cash or by allotment of pay. Policies are not issued during the war, but insurance certificate is mailed to the address designated by applicant.

The insurance is against death only, but includes waiver of premiums during total disability existing for more than 6 months, and commencing prior to the insured's sixtieth birthday. The policy is a 5-year level premium term policy with rate based upon the American experience table of mortality and 3 percent interest—the Government assuming the extra hazard of the military and naval service and the administrative expense. The insurance is payable only to a widow—widower; child—including a stepchild or illegitimate child, if designated as beneficiary by the insured; parent—including person in loco parentis; brother, and sister of the insured, and is payable only in monthly installments. The insured may change the beneficiary designation at any time.

After the policy has been in effect for at least 1 year, while in force it may be converted to an ordinary life, 20-payment life, or 30-payment life policy upon application to the Veterans' Administration, without medical examination.

In cases where the person in service died or became totally disabled or was captured or isolated by the enemy prior to April 20, 1942, and had less than $5,000 insurance in effect, the law provides that gratuitous insurance to an aggregate of $5,000 shall be deemed in effect. Claims for such gratuitous insurance should be filed as soon as possible, because of limitations. In most of these death cases only a widow, child, or dependent parent can claim such insurance.

The insurance is payable in the event of the death of the insured while the policy is in force to a beneficiary or beneficiaries, which may be designated by the insured, only within the relationship of widow or widower, child, parent, brother, or sister. The proceeds of the policy are payable as an annuity in 240 equal monthly installments of $5.51 for each $1,000 of insurance to any beneficiary who is under 30 years of age at the time of the death of the insured; otherwise, in continuous monthly installments throughout the lifetime of the beneficiary, with a guarantee of the payment of 120 monthly installments to the surviving relatives of the insured who are within the permitted class of beneficiaries. The amount of the monthly installment under the latter mode of payment is dependent upon the age of the beneficiary at date of death of insured. For example, if the beneficiary is then 40 years old, the monthly installment is $4.50 for each $1,000 of insurance; if 50, $5.39; if 60, $6.81; if 70, $8.51.

The beneficiary would receive under a policy of $5,000 or $10,000, for example: Monthly payments, beginning at the stated ages, in the following amounts: $27.55, $55.10; $22.50, $45; $26.95, $53.90; $34.05, $68.10; and $42.55, $85.10.

CLAIMS

All claims for insurance benefits should be addressed to the Veterans' Administration, Washington, D. C., but necessary forms may be secured from the nearest Veterans' Administration Facility.

UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT LIFE CONVERTED INSURANCE

Life converted insurance can be applied for only by those who served in World War No. 1.

No one may have more than $10,000 National Service Life Insurance and Government Converted Insurance combined. Insurance premiums are guaranteed by the Government under Soldiers and Sailors Civil Relief Act of 1940, as amended. Any person in the active service having a commercial life policy or policies meeting the requirements of said law, article IV, may, upon application to the Veterans' Administration on forms supplied the Army and Navy, secure guarantee of premiums, on amount of insurance not in excess of $10,000, while he is in the service during the present war. The insurance premiums so guaranteed by the Government constitute a lien against the policy and must be paid by the company out of any settlement thereof. In the event of the insured's discharge from service, he has a period of 2 years within which to pay the premiums with interest so guaranteed, or otherwise such indebtedness constitutes a loan on the policy with interest, and if the amount of such indebtedness exceeds the cash surrender value, the policy is automatically canceled and the Government pays the insurer the difference between such cash surrender value and the indebtedness. Forms for making application for such insurance protection are supplied to the War and Navy Departments, and may be secured in person or from his commanding officer or other designated official by any person entitled thereto.

VETERANS' PREFERENCE

Public Law No. 359—Seventy-eighth Congress—approved June 27, 1944, known as the Veterans' Preference Act of 1944, provides that certain preferences be given to veterans for employment in governmental agencies, either temporary or permanent, and in—

(a) the classified civil service;

(b) the unclassified civil service;

(c) any temporary or emergency establishment; and

(d) the civil service of the District of Columbia.

The veterans who are to be thus preferred are designated as—

(1) those ex-servicemen who have served on active duty in any branch of the armed forces of the United States and have been honorably discharged and who have established the present existence of a service-connected disability, or who are receiving compensation, disability retirement benefits, or pension by reason of public laws administered by the Veterans' Administration, the War Department, or the Navy Department;

(2) the wives of such service-connected disabled ex-servicemen as have themselves been unable to qualify for any civil-service appointment;

(3) the unmarried widows of deceased ex-servicemen who served on active duty in any branch of the armed services of the United States during any war or in any campaign or expedition for which a campaign badge has been authorized and who were honorably discharged; and

(4) those ex-service men and women who have served on active duty in any branch of the armed forces of the United States during any war or in any campaign or expedition for which a campaign badge has been authorized and have been honorably discharged.

In all civil-service examinations for entrance into the service 10 points shall be added to the earned ratings of veterans suffering a service-connected disability and their wives and the unmarried widows, and 5 points shall be added to the earned ratings of all other ex-service men and women; provided that examinations for the positions of guards, elevator operators, messengers, and custodians competition shall be restricted to persons entitled to preference under this act as long as such are available and during the present war and for a period of 5 years thereafter. Also providing for the waiver of certain qualifications and restrictions on civil-service appointments and providing for certain other preferences for veterans.

Report by Fred S. McCargar on the Salinas, Calif., Guayule-Rubber Project

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. W. LEE O'DANIEL

OF TEXAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 1, 1944

Mr. O'DANIEL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD a splendid report on the guayule-rubber project at Salinas, Calif., prepared by Fred S. McCargar, secretary of the Salinas Chamber of Commerce, in cooperation with Lt. W. A. Borkhuis, special service officer of the Salinas Army Air Base.

I wish to call attention to a statement contained in the latter part of the report, reading as follows:

No; the Salinas Valley is not the best place to grow guayule. They seem to get about twice the production around Bakersfield, Calif., and the experimental plots in Texas indicate that the results there are far better than in California.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TOUR OF THE GUAYULE RUBBER PROJECT—SUB-DEPOT CONFERENCE OF MATERIAL OFFICERS AT THE SALINAS ARMY AIR BASE, JULY 13, 1944

(Statement prepared by Fred S. McCargar, secretary Salina Chamber of Commerce, in cooperation with Lt. W. A. Borkhuis, special service officer of the Salinas Army Air Base.)

The emergency rubber project under the United States Department of Agriculture is being handled by three departments—the Forest Service, the Bureau of Plant Industry, and the Bureau of Agricultural and Industrial Chemistry. The Forest Service with J. C. Campbell as director has charge of the growing of the rubber plant. B. P. I. with Dr. A. C. Hildreth as director has charge of the research work on the development of new plants. B. A. I. C. with Mr. Francis McDonald in charge has to do with the development of new and better methods of plant milling.

The project when it was started anticipated growing 200,000 acres and they developed nurseries and produced seed for that acreage but recent curtailment of finances has cut the project down to 30,000 acres, discontinuing all further expansion and abandonment of the nurseries; but continuing the actual growing and harvesting the 30,000 acres planted, as well as continuing the research work, both by the B. P. I. and the B. A. I. C. It, of course, is unfair and illogical to charge to the amount of rubber that has been produced (about a million and a half pounds) or to the amount of rubber that will be produced on the 30,000 acres (about 30,000 tons) now growing, of which about 10,000 are in the Salinas valley, 10,000 around Bakersfield, and the other 10,000 are near Los Banos, Woodland, Patterson, all in California, the entire cost of the project which was planned and developed with much of the machinery bought for 200,000 acres. However, it is not all wasted, because there is approximately 400,000 pounds of seed on hand, which in comparison to the 20,000 pounds on hand at the time the Government took the project over, would mean that if again put into full operation would speed up the project at least 1 year.

You will first visit the industrial area, where you will go to the seed house, which is under the direction of Carl Taylor, who has developed various new methods of treating the seed. Because of the coating on the seed husks, it was necessary to wash the seed in a chlorine solution and to pre-sprout the seed for 4 or 5 days in a pre-sprouting room. Mr. Taylor first developed the process of eliminating the pre-sprouting method and now has developed a method of thrashing the seed out of the husks, eliminating all of this very expensive and very technical process, thereby making it possible for a farmer to harvest, thrash, and prepare his own seed for the next crop.

From there you will go to the Bureau of Plant Industry, under the direction of Dr. A. C. Hildreth, where you will first be shown the methods of laboratory extracting the exact amount of rubber in each sample after grinding up carefully a weighed amount of the shrub. Acetone is dripped through it to dissolve out the resin, after which benzine is dripped through it to dissolve the rubber, which is then evaporated, leaving the amount of rubber on the bottom of the glass. The percent of rubber runs all the way from 3 percent in very young shrubs up to 18 or 20 percent of pure rubber in the more mature shrub.

You will then go through the greenhouses, where Dr. Robbins will explain to you his crossing of various members of the same plant family to which guayule belongs. One particular plant, mariola, is very hardy, and it appears that the successful crosses will have an equal amount of rubber or more, and it can probably be grown much further north in the United States. He is crossing it with one of the related plants that grows from 15 to 16 feet high. You will also see the laboratories, where the study is made of how the rubber is formed in the plant.

From there you will go to the B. A. I. C. Laboratories, which are under the general direction of Mr. McDonald, first going through the laboratory where the testing of vulcanized rubber is under the direction of Dr. Place, and visiting the laboratory where Dr. Jones is working on the process of extracting the rubber as a milk latex, the same as rubber is extracted from trees. This is done by first grinding the plant up under water and diffusing the rubber into the water and then taking it out of the water by centrifugal force, the same as cream is separated from milk in a cream separator.

Then you will go to the Pilot Mill under the direction of Mr. James M. Cummings where you will see various new methods being perfected and improvements being made on the old milling methods of first drying the rubber plant and then grinding it up under water after which small particles of rubber float to the surface and the wood silt sinks.

From there you will go to the nursery where you will see the seed beds 4 feet wide by 400 feet long, each growing enough seedlings to be transplanted to from 2½ to 3 acres. Until the abandonment of the expansion program, they had 40,000 seed beds. The seed is first laid on the ground in 2-inch-wide strips, then covered with sand and watered by an overhead sprinkling system. At the end of 5 or 6 months, they are ready for transplanting to the fields. Dr. Hildreth's department has developed a method of planting the seed directly in the fields which gives promise of being a much cheaper and better method of growing the guayule plant. It has been stated that this will cut the over-all cost of production of guayule rubber at least 22 percent.

You will then visit fields of guayule rubber 1 and 2 years old, noting the difference in growth between guayule grown on irrigated land and nonirrigated land, there being considerable difference of opinion as to which will be the ultimate, most economical way of growing rubber. Under irrigation it shows at least four times as much rubber in the same length of time, but of course the land values are much greater and the cost of irrigation added probably will more than offset the increased amount of production, but of course as a war effort that cannot be taken into consideration.

From there you will visit the 5-year-old plots (and some experimental plots even as old as 13 years) which is believed to be the most economical period in which is harvested guayule rubber on nonirrigated land. If time permits we will visit the fields where the seed is planted direct in the field, eliminating the necessity of nurseries. This promises to be a very satisfactory way for the individual farmer to produce rubber and even this method of growing the seedlings for transplanting may be further developed at a much lesser cost than the overhead watering nursery bed system.

You will next visit the mill where you will first see the storage room where the bales of shrubs come in after which it is chopped, then goes through the drier, then through three sets of rollers (some of the new methods developed indicate that very fine choppers will be used instead of rollers in future construction). Then you will see the battery of four tubular mills where the shrub is ground under water by small rocks the size of a fist rolling against each other. Then it goes into the first settling tank where the rubber, together with some cork, floats to the top and the wood silt sinks; then it goes into piler tanks where under 550 pounds of pressure water is forced into the air cells of cork so that in the next settling tank the cork sinks. (NOTE.—Mr. Cummings at the B. A. I. C. has recently developed a method of giving the shrub a 2,000 pound pressure for about 10 seconds instead of the 90 minutes in the piler tanks and getting the same results, making it a much quicker, easier, and cheaper process.) The rubber is then placed in trays and dried in vacuum driers after which it is pressed in 100 pound cakes and boxed ready for shipment. Dr. D. Spence, probably the best versed man in guayule rubber, some years ago developed a process of retting the rubber shrub before milling, which is the same process that corn goes through in a silo and which tends to lessen the resin in the rubber and the B. A. I. C. is developing new methods along this line.

If time permits, we will visit the Jordan pilot mill which is a modification of the paper-making machine process, and which according to some has great promise as the proper milling method. Instead of grinding the shrub under water for 90 minutes or more, it is run through this shredding paper-mill process for about 10 minutes, securing say its proponents a greater percentage of rubber than the other process.

You ask, "What's the future of guayule?" Only time will tell. If you would like to get a pro and con view of it, get ahold of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for June 20 and read pages 6284 to 6290, inclusive. You can get this at any library, newspaper office, chamber of commerce, etc.

The difficulty with guayule has been that because of the high resin content, about 20 percent, and because the resin also picked up about 10 percent additional dirt, 100 pounds of guayule rubber only had about 60 pounds of pure rubber in it; but for certain usages such as in the sticky part of the cord manufacturing process of tires, it was equal or more valuable than the purer Hevea rubber and, hence, little was done during the past 30 years trying to purify it. Now with the new methods, particularly Dr. Jones' latex method, the tensile strength is even better than Hevea; so that particular hurdle seems to be already surmounted. Then the question of whether it can be raised in competition with tree rubber from the Orient or in competition with synthetic rubbers produced here. From the best information we can get, tree rubber will never again be imported into this country on an average of less than 14 cents a pound and those best informed on guayule believe that guayule can be produced for less than 10 cents a pound under private enterprise. Whether it can compete with synthetics, of course, depends upon how cheaply synthetics can be produced. Some believe that synthetics will be produced as low as 12 or 14 cents a pound, but all agree that, at present, synthetics require some pure rubber to mix with it to make it 100 percent usable for heavy-duty tires and guayule appears to be the best pure rubber to mix with it. No, the Salinas Valley is not the best place to grow guayule. They seem to get about twice the production around Bakersfield, Calif., and the experimental plots in Texas indicate that the results there are far better than in California.

As Army men, I suggest that you get hold of General Eisenhower's report made on guayule in 1931, in which he advocated the planting of several hundred thousand acres of guayule rubber as an insurance against our getting into the difficulties that we did and certainly if we had followed his advice we wouldn't have been caught with our rubber pants down.

As many Congressmen are misinformed on the guayule project, your cooperation will be appreciated in disseminating the true picture.

What Every Disabled Veteran Should Know

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM H. STEVENSON

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 3, 1944

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, if a veteran is discharged or separated from the service with a disability due to service, he may be entitled to disability benefits, including a pension.

THE VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION

As you probably know, benefits and pensions for veterans are the responsibility of the Veterans' Administration. It is this Government agency that will handle your claims, will decide the amount of the pensions, and will handle all details of this and other benefits to which you and your dependents may be entitled. You should always write to the Veterans' Administration direct about these matters.

FILING YOUR CLAIM

If you are being discharged because of a disability, you will be advised of your right to file a claim for pension and, if you wish, assisted in making application for this benefit before you leave the service.

The proper form for making application for disability pension is V. A. 526. You can make a claim on this form at any time after discharge or release from active duty. Copies can be obtained at any service installation, from any Red Cross office, or from any office of the Veterans' Administration. At any of these places you can obtain whatever help you need in filling out the form.

Even though you sign a statement, at the time of your discharge, saying that you do not desire to file application for pension, this will not prevent you from filing a claim at any later date.

Officers released because of disability and not entitled to retirement pay have the right to file a claim for disability pension and have their rights to this benefit determined by the Veterans' Administration.

HANDLING YOUR CLAIM

It is not necessary to hire a lawyer to secure benefits. Nevertheless, it is your right to employ legal assistance if you want to. Fees for legal services on pension claims are limited by law.

You may consult your local chapter of Red Cross, the nearest office of the Veterans' Administration, or other organizations approved by the Veterans' Administration, for advice and aid in connection with your claim for benefits. This will be furnished to you free.

YOUR C NUMBER

The first claim filed by a veteran is assigned a claim number. This is commonly referred to as a C number. It never changes. All later claims will come under this C number regardless of when the disability arises. The Veterans' Administration thus maintains a continuous record in one file. Further claims should never be submitted as if they were original proceedings, but all should bear the first C number assigned. To save time and trouble in handling your papers, keep a record of your C number just as you should do with your serial number.

VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION MAKES FINAL DECISION—NOT THE ARMY

Your medical board makes a report on your disability, but the final decision as to pension or other benefits rests with the Veterans' Administration. Even though a medical board had decided against you, you have the privilege of filing a claim directly with the Veterans' Administration if you disagree and believe that you are entitled to disability benefits. Do not hesitate to make application when you believe that your claim is fair and proper.

PENSIONS BASED ON DEGREE OF DISABILITY

Pensions are based upon the percentage of disability and run from 10 percent to 100 percent in multiples of 10. For instance, a veteran with 10-percent disability will receive a monthly sum equal to 10 percent of that granted for total disability. In addition, there are special rates and allowances for specific injuries and more serious disabling conditions. No additional disability pension is payable for dependents.

PENSIONS BASED ON PERMANENT AND TOTAL DISABILITY

Should a veteran of this war become disabled to a degree where he cannot become gainfully employed he is entitled to a pension, although this is not in any way related to his service. This pension amounts to $50 per month.

HOSPITAL TREATMENT, MEDICAL SERVICE, VETERANS' HOMES, ETC.

If you should ever need further hospital care for a disability incurred in line of duty in the service it will be provided upon request to the Veterans' Administration. You will be given proper hospitalization and free transportation to the appropriate hospital. Your own ability to pay has no bearing on this service.

If you need medical service or dental care not requiring hospitalization this, too, will be provided. This service includes medicine, appliances, bridgework, and so forth; but, of course, the condition must have been caused or aggravated in line of duty by your military service.

Any veteran who is so disabled as to be unable to earn a living, and is without adequate means of support, may apply for admission to one of the numerous veterans' homes located throughout the country.

FREE TRAINING FOR A NEW JOB

If your disability prevents you from working at your old job, you can be taught a new occupation in which your disability will not hinder you. This teaching is called vocational training. It is enabling thousands of veterans to overcome physical handicaps, to adjust themselves to civil life, and to regain their earning power. You may even be trained to return to your old job in spite of your disability.

While getting this special training you may receive compensation in addition to your pension; and there are added allotments for dependents. Expenses for tuition, books, supplies, and equipment are paid by the Government.

In the various offices of the Veterans' Administration there are advisers who will aid and guide you, who will prepare a program to fit your needs, and make the necessary arrangements for your training. Never hesitate to ask their advice.

PENSIONS FOR DEPENDENTS

Where death occurs after discharge, from a disability due to service, the widow, children, and dependent parents may make a claim for pension. The Veterans' Administration naturally requires proper proof of relationship with such claims. This again emphasizes the wisdom of keeping your records, including birth and marriage certificates, all together, and in a safe place where they can always be found.

PENSIONS ARE SAFEGUARDED

Pension payments to you or to your beneficiaries are not assignable and are exempt from taxation—including income tax—attachment, levy, or seizure, either before or after receipt. These provisions, of course, do not apply to property purchased with these payments.

EMERGENCY RELIEF

Should you need emergency assistance between the time of your discharge and the time when your case can be adjudicated by the Veterans' Administration, it may be obtained through the Red Cross. Assistance may be by grant or by loan, depending upon apparent ability to repay, and is made for such needs as shelter, food, clothing, and fuel, and for help with securing benefits to which you or your family may be entitled. Application for such assistance should be made through the local chapter of Red Cross. If there is need for assistance previous to your discharge, you should consult the Red Cross field director at your station.

If veterans have any questions about these aids, see your Red Cross or veterans' service officer. If you have any further questions or need any more help, write to your Congressman, WILLIAM H. STEVENSON, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

VETERAN HAS RIGHT TO APPEAL DISABILITY RATING

In quite a number of cases the first disability rating handed down by the Veterans' Administration is too low. In this case the veteran has the right to appeal the decision, but this appeal must be made within 1 year. This is important. If the appeal is not filed within 1 year, the veteran loses his right to appeal.

If for any reason any veteran has just cause for complaint regarding the disability rating, it is advisable that he appeal at once. In appealing this decision it is wise to get a doctor's statement that he believes that the disability rating given is too low. It is wise also to get a letter from your Red Cross chairman or county veterans' service officer that the rating is too low.

Send these letters together with your appeal blank filled out completely to Congressman WILLIAM H. STEVENSON, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C. I will be very glad to contact the Veterans' Administration and appeal the case for you.

The Democratic National Platform, 1944

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SAMUEL D. JACKSON

OF INDIANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 3 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 1), 1944

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the platform of the National Democratic Party adopted at its 1944 convention held in Chicago, Ill.

There being no objection, the platform was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The Democratic Party stands on its record in peace and in war.

To speed victory, establish and maintain peace, guarantee full employment and provide prosperity—this is its platform.

We do not here detail scores of planks. We cite action.

II

Beginning March 1933, the Democratic Administration took a series of actions which saved our system of free enterprise.

It brought that system out of collapse and thereafter eliminated abuses which had imperiled it.

It used the powers of government to provide employment in industry and to save agriculture.

It wrote a new Magna Carta for labor.

It provided social security, including old-age pensions, unemployment insurance, security for crippled and dependent children and the blind. It established employment offices. It provided Federal bank-deposit insurance, flood prevention, soil conservation, and prevented abuses in the security markets. It saved farms and homes from foreclosure and secured profitable prices for farm products.

It adopted an effective program of reclamation, hydroelectric power, and mineral development.

It found the road to prosperity through production and employment.

We pledge the continuance and improvement of these programs.

III

Before war came, the Democratic administration awakened the Nation in time to the dangers that threatened its very existence.

It succeeded in building, in time, the best trained and equipped army in the world, the most powerful navy in the world, the greatest air force in the world, and the largest merchant marine in the world.

It gained for our country, and it saved for our country, powerful allies.

When war came, it succeeded in working out with those Allies an effective grand strategy against the enemy.

It set that strategy in motion, and the tide of battle was turned.

It held the line against wartime inflation.

It insured a fair share-and-share alike distribution of food and other essentials.

It is leading our country to certain victory.

The primary and imperative duty of the United States is to wage the war with every resource available to final triumph over our enemies and we pledge that we will continue to fight side by side with the United Nations until this supreme objective shall have been attained and thereafter to secure a just and lasting peace.

IV

That the world may not again be drenched in blood by international outlaws and criminals, we pledge:

To join with the other United Nations in the establishment of an international organization based on the principle of the sovereign equality of all peace-loving states, open to membership by all such states, large and small, for the prevention of aggression and the maintenance of international peace and security.

To make all necessary and effective agreements and arrangements through which the nations would maintain adequate forces to meet the needs of preventing war and of making impossible the preparation for war and which would have such forces available for joint action when necessary.

Such organization must be endowed with power to employ armed forces when necessary to prevent aggression and preserve peace.

We favor the maintenance of an international court of justice of which the United States shall be a member and the employment of diplomacy, conciliation, arbitration, and other like methods where appropriate in the settlement of international disputes.

World peace is of transcendent importance. Our gallant sons are dying on land, on sea, and in the air. They do not die as Republicans. They do not die as Democrats. They die as Americans. We pledge that their blood shall not have been shed in vain. America has the opportunity to lead the world in this great service to mankind. The United States must meet the challenge. Under divine providence, she must move forward to her high destiny.

V

We pledge our support to the Atlantic Charter and the "four freedoms" and the application of the principles enunciated therein to the United Nations and other peace-loving nations, large and small.

We shall uphold the good-neighbor policy and extend the trade policies initiated by the present administration.

We favor the opening of Palestine to unrestricted Jewish immigration and colonization, and such a policy as to result in the establishment there of a free and democratic Jewish commonwealth.

We favor legislation assuring equal pay for equal work regardless of sex.

We recommend to Congress the submission of a constitutional amendment on equal rights for women.

We favor Federal aid to education administered by the States without interference by the Federal Government.

We favor Federal legislation to assure stability of products, employment, distribution, and prices in the bituminous-coal industry to create a proper balance between consumer, producer, and mine worker.

We endorse the President's statement recognizing the importance of the use of water in arid-land States for domestic and irrigation purposes.

We favor nondiscriminatory transportation charges and declare for the early correction of inequalities in such charges.

We favor enactment of legislation granting the fullest measure of self-government for Alaska, Hawaii, and Puerto Rico, and eventual statehood for Alaska and Hawaii.

We favor the extension of the right of suffrage to the people of the District of Columbia.

VI

We offer these post-war programs:

A continuation of our policy of full benefits for ex-service men and women with special consideration for the disabled. We make it our first duty to assure employment and economic security to all who have served in the defense of our country.

Price guaranties and crop insurance to farmers with all practical steps:

To keep agriculture on a parity with industry and labor.

To foster the success of the small independent farmer.

To aid the home ownership of family sized farms.

To extend rural electrification and develop broader domestic and foreign markests for agricultural products.

Adequate compensation for workers during demobilization.

The enactment of such additional humanitarian, labor, social, and farm legislation as time and experience may require, including the amendment or repeal of any law enacted in recent years which has failed to accomplish its purpose.

Promotion of the success of small business.

Earliest possible release of wartime controls.

Adaptation of tax laws to an expanding peacetime economy, with simplified structure and wartime taxes reduced or repealed as soon as possible.

Encouragement of risk capital, new enterprise, development of natural resources in the West and other parts of the country, and the immediate reopening of the gold and silver mines of the West as soon as manpower is available.

We reassert our faith in competitive private enterprise free from control by monopolies, cartels, or any arbitrary private or public authority.

VII

We assert that mankind believes in the "four freedoms."

We believe that the country which has the greatest measure of social justice is capable of the greatest achievements.

We believe that racial and religious minorities have the right to live, develop, and vote equally with all citizens and share the rights that are guaranteed by our Constitution. Congress should exert its full constitutional powers to protect those rights.

We believe that without loss of sovereignty, world development, and lasting peace are within humanity's grasp. They will come with the greater enjoyment of those freedoms by the peoples of the world, and with the freer flow among them of ideas and goods.

We believe in the world right of all men to write, send, and publish news at uniform communication rates and without interference by governmental or private monopoly, and that right should be protected by treaty.

To these beliefs the Democratic Party subscribes.

These principles the Democratic Party pledges itself in solemn sincerity to maintain.

Finally this convention sends its affectionate greetings to our beloved and matchless leader and President, Franklin Delano Roosevelt.

He stands before the Nation and the world the champion of human liberty and dignity. He has rescued our people from the ravages of economic disaster. His rare foresight and magnificent courage have saved our Nation from the assault of international brigands and dictators. Fulfilling the ardent hope of his life, he has already laid the foundation of enduring peace for a troubled world and the well-being for our Nation. All mankind is his debtor. His life and service have been a great blessing to humanity.

That God may keep him strong in body and in spirit to carry on his yet unfinished work is our hope and prayer.

Nomination of General Stilwell To Be a Four-Star General

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES O. ANDREWS

OF FLORIDA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 3 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 1), 1944

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an Associated Press dispatch entitled "President Nominates Stilwell To Be Four-Star General; Will Hold Rank With Marshall, MacArthur, Eisenhower, Arnold."

General Stilwell is a son of my native State of Florida. His home is in Palatka, Fla. He graduated from West Point in 1904. His record in China and wherever he has been assigned to duty has been an inspiration to the youth of our Nation, and to all those who compose the great Army and Navy of our country. Florida takes great pride in the fact that one of her native sons has made good.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PRESIDENT NOMINATES STILWELL TO BE FOUR-STAR GENERAL—WILL HOLD RANK WITH MARSHALL, MACARTHUR, EISENHOWER, ARNOLD

President Roosevelt today nominated Lt. Gen. Joseph Warren Stilwell, American commander of Chinese forces in Burma, to be a full general in the Army of the United States.

The proposed promotion, raising General Stilwell to a rank held by Gen. George C. Marshall, Gen. H. H. Arnold, Gen. Douglas MacArthur and Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower, suggested the probability of new and more important work for General Stilwell in the Burma-China area.

In the American military organization, he holds the assignment of commanding general of the United States Army Forces in the Burma-China theater. He also holds a top-flight position under Generalissimo Chiang Kai-Shek of China and has certain staff duties under the Allied commander in chief in Southeast Asia, Lord Louis Mountbatten.

Authorities here foresaw in the nomination an intensification of Allied war effort in the Southeast Asia area, particularly by strengthening the organization of Chinese armies. The problems in this connection are twofold: Initially, the job is to keep a maximum amount of supplies flowing into China by air while clearing a land route through Burma which must serve until such time as the naval forces driving across the Pacific from Guam and New Guinea can open a China seaport on the Asiatic mainland.

Secondly, it is to bring about the full training, and, so as far as necessary, the reorganization of Chinese military forces into a powerful combat team.

One of the main concerns of the Allied war leaders here has been how to use China's vast manpower resources in finally crushing the Japanese.

OTHERS PROMOTED

In recognition of outstanding leadership and courage on the field of battle, the President also sent to the Senate nominations of nine other Army officers for temporary promotion, two to major general and 7 to brigadier general.

To be major generals, temporary—Brig. Gen. Robert T. Frederick, San Francisco, and Brig. Gen. Jens A. Doe, Chicago.

To be brigadier generals, temporary: Col. Gerald J. Higgins, Infantry, Burl, Idaho; Col. Maurice W. Daniel, Field Artillery, New Albany, Ind.; Col. James A. Van Fleet, Infantry, Coytesville, N. J.; Col. George A. Taylor, Infantry, Portland, Oreg.; Col. Charles D. W. Canham, Infantry, Kolo, Miss.; Col. Hugh F. T. Hoffman, Cavalry, Fort Smith, Ark., and Col. John H. Church, Infantry, Frederick, Md.

The officers are engaged in current operations in the China-Burma-India, the Southwest Pacific, the Mediterranean and the European theaters.

WISE IN ORIENTAL WAR LORE

Wise in jungle and mountain fighting and versed in the language and customs of the Far East, Gen. Stilwell has lived up to a prophecy made by a Chinese Army organ in 1942 that his appointment as chief of staff to Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek was equivalent to adding 100,000 troops to China's fighting forces.

The general never forgot for a minute the "hell of a beating" which he admitted he and his men took from the Japs in Burma in the spring of 1942, nor the bitter lessons they learned on the 140-mile retreat on foot to India through the wild Burmese jungles.

At the end of the retreat he declared Burma could be retaken and immediately set out to prove his words.

The lanky American, whose troops knew him as "Uncle Joe," became a familiar figure at jungle outposts, where his outnumbered and outgunned troops were being conditioned for the long road back.

SPEAKS CHINESE FLUENTLY

Shirt-sleeved, chewing gum and puffing a cigarette in a long holder, he discussed tactics in fluent Chinese with unit commanders within range of enemy machine guns, helped to organize withdrawals, to plan feints, or to throw troops into combat at strategic points.

With other Allied leaders General Stilwell attended conferences in Washington in the spring of 1943 between President Roosevelt and Prime Minister Churchill. He said then that it would be a hard job to defeat the Japanese.

"We have a savage enemy and there's plenty of him," he said. "There'll be a lot of hard fighting, but we are thoroughly determined to get after him."

In January of 1943 General Stilwell received the Distinguished Service Cross at a surprise ceremony in Chungking where his son, Lt. Col. Joseph W. Stilwell, Jr., pinned the decoration on his breast.

General Stilwell held the temporary rank of major when he went to France in December 1917 with the American Expeditionary Forces of the World War.

He participated in the engagements at La Fere, Verdun, and Toul, and in the St. Mihiel offensive, and received the Distinguished Service Medal.

He was with the American Army of Occupation in Germany, returning to the United States in the summer of 1919.

Born at Palatka, Fla., March 19, 1883, General Stilwell graduated from the United States Military Academy at West Point in 1904. While there he was an all-around athlete and helped to install basketball as a sport.

He married Winifred Alison, and to this union were born five children—Joseph W., Jr.; Nancy, Winifred, Alison, and Benjamin.

Benefits for Veterans Under G. I. Bill of Rights

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM H. STEVENSON

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 3, 1944

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, veterans of this war can do these things with Government help:

First, they can buy or repair a home; second, buy and stock up a farm; third, start a new business; fourth, get a high-school or college education; fifth, draw special unemployment benefits if unable to find work; sixth, be assured of free and adequate hospitalization.

Benefits extend to men and women of the armed services who have other than dishonorable discharges and who have served 90 days since September 15, 1940; or less than 90 days, if they have service-connected disabilities.

It is important to know exactly what the Government now offers, and what the terms, the conditions, the opportunities are in each field.

First, take the opportunity for home buying or for buying a farm. A qualified veteran will be able to get the Veterans' Administration to arrange for a Government-guaranteed loan for buying or building a home or for making repairs, alterations, and improvements on a home. Such loans also may be obtained by a veteran to pay off back taxes or delinquent debts on homes. The Government will guarantee 50 percent of the loan up to $2,000 and will pay the first year's interest on the part of the loan that it guaranties. Thus, a veteran can borrow up to $4,000, with the Government standing behind half of it.

These loans can be made by a bank, loan association, or any other lending agency, including an individual or friend of the veteran. If you are a veteran who obtains such a loan, you would have to satisfy the lender as to collateral on your share. But, in the case of buying a home, the home could be used as collateral. Interest on these loans cannot exceed 4 percent, and they must be repaid in full within 20 years.

In addition, the Government will guarantee fully a secondary loan up to 20 percent of the cost of the property. But the total amount guaranteed by the Government in both loans cannot exceed $2,000. This provision makes it possible for veterans to get cash for original down payments on homes. Veterans have until 2 years after the war or 2 years after their discharge, whichever is later, to take advantage of the loan opportunities.

Loans on the same basis are available for veterans who want to buy farms. Money from the loans may be used to purchase land, buildings, livestock, machinery, or other equipment or for making repairs and improvements. But if you are a veteran and want to buy a farm, you must show that you know something about farming and are likely to make a success of the undertaking.

Suppose a veteran wants to set up his own business: Here the procedure and conditions for getting loans are about the same as those for buying homes or farms. The money may be used to buy an established business or land, buildings, supplies, equipment, machinery, and so forth. Secondary loans also are available for down payments. But if you are getting a loan for this purpose, the Veterans' Administration will want to know something about your background and experience in this business. In other words, you will have to show that there is a reasonable likelihood that you will make a success of it. Even so, it is expected that many veterans will want to start their own business and will be helped.

If it is a matter of education or training: When a veteran qualifies for a college, school, or training course, the Government will pay up to $500 a year to cover tuition, laboratory fees, cost of books, and so forth. The veteran also will get $50 a month living allowance, plus $25 a month if he has a wife or other dependents. He may choose his school.

If a veteran was under 25 when he entered the service he may return to school even though his education was not interrupted. That is, he may have left school and been working when he entered service. But anyone who was 25 or over when he went into service must show, in order to qualify, that his education was impeded, delayed, interrupted, or interfered with. However, any veteran who desires a refresher or retraining course may take such a course for 1 year.

A veteran who qualifies for college or other schooling will be able to remain at Government expense for 1 year. Then, if he qualifies for further education, he can remain for the length of time, up to a total of 4 years, that he served between September 15, 1940, and the end of the war. He has until 2 years after his discharge or after the war ends to return to school. This Government-paid education program stops 7 years after the war ends.

Next, as to unemployment benefits: Ex-service men and women will be able to claim unemployment benefits of $20 a week for up to 52 weeks if they cannot find jobs. They will be entitled to 4 weeks of unemployment benefits for each month of service, plus additional time allowance for the first 90 days of service. But they are supposed to register with a public employment agency, such as the United States Employment Service, and accept suitable work if offered. Unemployment benefits will be available to a veteran until 2 years after his discharge or 2 years after the war, whichever is later.

Cash benefits also are provided for self-employed veterans who make less than $100 a month. They can have the Government make up the difference between their net earnings and $100 a month. Like the unemployment payments, these benefits are allowed up to 52 weeks according to length of service.

If a veteran has any questions about these aids, see your Red Cross, veteran-service officer, or any officer of your local American Legion or Veterans of Foreign Wars post; or see the veterans' representative of the War Manpower Commission of the United States Employment Service. If you have any further questions or need any more help, write to your Congressman, WILLIAM H. STEVENSON, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

The Baltimore Sun Editorial on a Fourth Term

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALLACE H. WHITE, JR.

OF MAINE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 3 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 1), 1944

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "No Fourth Term," appearing in this morning's Baltimore Sun.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NO FOURTH TERM

Mr. Roosevelt's decision to run for a fourth term makes it necessary for the Sun to oppose him in order to do what it can to forestall the evils which such a decision brings into view. Fortunately, the Republicans have nominated an able candidate in Governor Dewey. Good Democrats and good citizens generally can support Mr. Dewey with few reservations and no misgivings.

There was no good reason, even with reference to the war, why Mr. Roosevelt should have chosen to do violence to the profound beliefs of his party and the most cherished tradition of the country by seeking to hold on to his office. The American people know, deep in their hearts, that long tenure of office corrupts the soul of the officeholder and breeds therein contempt of the people and their institutions. Such disintegration has been in evidence in the Roosevelt administration for a long time. It reached its distasteful climax at the Chicago convention, when Mr. Roosevelt, with sententious doubletalk, tossed his most devoted follower, Mr. WALLACE, into the discard. Today, in its organization, the Democratic Party is little more than a shaky alliance between the President's personal followers and official dependents, the disgruntled South and the unsavory big city bosses, all for the purpose of holding on to power and the perquisites of power for 4 years longer. No good for the country can come out of such a combination of forces.

It is possible to say that a change in administrations can be made without reference to the war for several definite and unassailable reasons. Mr. Roosevelt's record, both in the pre-war period and during the great national effort, is spotty, to say the least.

The claim made that only Mr. Roosevelt can guide the country into an effective international organization is not borne out by the facts. It is true that, as President, Mr. Roosevelt has moved in important respects toward future collaboration. But it is also true that in so moving, Mr. Roosevelt has received the almost unanimous applause of spokesmen of both parties. So close have we come to unanimity in our belief in international organization as essential for maintaining peace, that he would be a hair splitter indeed who could point out a major difference between the platforms of the two parties on this issue. The debate on such a subject could be prolonged, but the essential fact is that which we have stated. And we need no deep student of history to remind us that the convictions of a President on foreign policy are no guaranty that the country will follow him.

The most promising international effort to avoid world disintegration was that of the London Economic Conference of 1933. Mr. Roosevelt, in person, wrecked that conference. So little did he understand the forces at work that, with debonair indifference to the tragic results of his attitude, he committed this country to a course which signified extreme economic isolationism.

The indomitable spirit of Mr. Hull, his wise Secretary of State, fortunately was not crushed by this irresponsible manifestation of muddled thinking, and the United States did not lose wholly its reputation for disinterested international action. The reciprocal trade program was allowed to proceed, but Mr. Roosevelt confirmed his lack of understanding by agreeing to and even praising the so-called Neutrality Act (1935) which made it difficult for us to aid our proven friends and almost obligatory for us to help our potential enemies. The effective criticism of this foolish law came not from Mr. Roosevelt, but from Representative WADSWORTH, a Republican.

That is not the record of a farseeing statesman; it is the record of an adroit politician seeking to follow the profitable way. Even as late as 1940, Mr. Roosevelt, still misjudging the course of events, was telling the country that we could keep out of war. It was not he, but the same Mr. WADSWORTH who initiated the Selective Service Act.

Finally, thanks chiefly to the efforts of private citizens, the people of the country came to understand our stake in the war and the dangers to us of an Axis victory. Only then did Mr. Roosevelt seek to catch up with the current. He deserves all credit for the amendments to the Neutrality Act, for the destroyer-bases deal with Great Britain, and for the inauguration of the lend-lease system. He took good advice, also, in the preparation and enforcement of the various acts imposing economic controls, though, as we all know, some of his own decisions, particularly in the matter of wages, have made it extremely difficult to hold the line against inflation. But it is worthy of note that in the very girding for war which is implied in such undertakings, another of his weaknesses caught up with him.

So little did he comprehend the workings of the American economic machine that he set up the futile Office of Production Management, presided over by the synthetic dual personality he called Mr. Knudsen-Hillman. The administrative ignorance implied in this arrangement had its humorous aspects, but it delayed the meshing of our productive machine and brought confusion into the industrial world at the very time precision and order were essential.

Ultimately, we worked ourselves out of the difficulties thus thrown in our way by Mr. Roosevelt's muddled improvisations. But we did not and could not work ourselves out of the difficulties thrown in our way by a still more fundamental gap in his understanding. This weakness had been displayed all through his long battle (never truly won) with the depression. It expressed itself in his notion that a primary function of the Federal Government is to distribute money. From this, it is only a small step to the belief that the beneficiaries of such largesse are the proper components of a political machine. If Mr. Roosevelt himself has not overtly subscribed to this belief, his henchmen have acted on it. The Federal Government, thanks to Mr. Roosevelt's theory of its function, has become a partisan in the economic struggle rather than an umpire.

We all know how this strange attitude of Mr. Roosevelt's worked out finally in the court-pack plan, beaten with the greatest difficulty. We know what it has done to the concept of law as interpreted by the new Supreme Court. We know how it has made a mockery of the enforcement of some of our laws. We know, too, how it has emboldened the less responsible labor leaders to make grotesque demands and how the machinery of the Federal Government has been manipulated so that those demands could be gratified.

The theory of government thus evolved is destructive. An administration which uses its power and the substance of the people to win over the labor vote or the vote of any organized pressure group is a corrupting administration. Its moral basis is as bad as that of an administration which bids for the support of monopolists or any other vested interest.

Such a government is especially obnoxious in time of war. For its practices mean that production is kept going in many of our factories only with the greatest difficulty and in the face of constant strikes and threats of strikes. Favoritism in government tends to destroy national unity at the very time national unity is our greatest asset. That we have done as well as we have with war production is a tribute not to Mr. Roosevelt's policy but to the inherent strength and patriotism of the American people in all ranks. The industrialists and the workers have shown that this is not Mr. Roosevelt's war but a war of the American people.

If all goes well, the war will come to an end in the next 2 years, no matter who is elected in November. In the opinion of qualified observers, Germany will be defeated in an even shorter time. With Hitler's downfall, the problems of returning to peacetime ways will crowd upon us. The strains put upon our economy during the first 8 or 9 years of Mr. Roosevelt's tenure have not been dissipated but intensified by the new strains of warfare. We should not deceive ourselves by failing to recognize this fact.

Our fiscal difficulties were severe enough before December 7, 1941. Since then we have multiplied our debt manyfold and we have not begun even to think about repayment. Our tax structure is such that almost no provision is made for massing those aggregations of capital without which industrial reconversion and industrial development after the war will be impossible. We shall have many millions of men and women under the necessity of shifting to new jobs if they can find them. We shall have other millions of service men and women who will have to be absorbed into our social structure.

Therefore, in considering the election of next November, we have to bear in mind not only the conduct of the war effort, but also the return of the country to its new peace basis. Even if it were correct to say that Mr. Roosevelt has been a good war leader, we should still have to ask ourselves what sort of a leader he would make in the early post-war years.

There is nothing in the record to show that Mr. Roosevelt comprehends the nature of the difficulties we shall face. There is nothing in the platform on which he is running which shows more than a verbal concern for those difficulties. The one reconversion program which has been laid before him—that of Mr. Baruch—has been all but ignored.

Nor is it any answer to say that Mr. Roosevelt has been too absorbed in his duties as Commander in Chief to have time for such matters. Even in wartime the Commander in Chief is still President and as such responsible for the civil affairs of the country.

The alternative to Mr. Roosevelt is Mr. Dewey. To say that Mr. Dewey should be elected is not to insist that the choice is between black and white. The Governor of New York despite the orators at the convention which nominated him, is no white-plumed knight. He is, on the contrary, a practical, level-headed man with a mind more like that of a scientist than that of a warrior on horseback. His passion is for orderly procedure. His hatred is for negligence and disorder. His inspiration is not intuition but reason. He does not orate, he discusses. He would hardly make an exciting President but he would certainly make a competent one.

The question of his liberalism or his conservatism can hardly arise, save in the minds of special interests seeking Government favors. A monopolist, finding him unapproachable, might well call his distastefully liberal. A labor leader, applying in vain the sort of pressure which the C. I. O. applies so fruitfully to Mr. Roosevelt, might call him a reactionary. Most people, not seeking favors and judging him solely on the basis of his public acts, would describe him as an aloof, understanding administrator and not worry their heads about meaningless labels.

He has another quality, akin to that we have been discussing, which Mr. Roosevelt notoriously lacks. He chooses his advisers and subordinates not on the basis of personal predilection but on the basis of their capacity. Whimsy played no part in the selection of the men who have helped him give New York State the best government it has had in years. His experts have not been political manipulators or one-idea economists. They have been clear-eyed, cool-headed administrators, like himself.

It is quite obvious from this description, which we believe to be accurate, that Mr. Dewey will never raise the national temperature to the boiling point. There will be few brilliant improvisations, few inspired pronunciamentos. Those seeking a leader with a capital L had best not vote for him. On the other hand, those who feel that 12 years of government by ear are enough, and want a return to stability, will find in him something almost unique in the way of vigor, conscientiousness, understanding, and clarity of thought.

In thus comparing the relative merits of the two men who are now appealing to the American people for their votes in November and in making its own choice of Governor Dewey known, the Sun is conscious that it has not said here all that needs to be said. Nearly every assertion herein about both Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Dewey needs to be amplified and documented. That will be our task as the campaign progresses. Moreover, there are differences in the platforms on which the two candidates are running. In some matters the Democratic platform is superior to the Republican. In some the Republican is superior. In both there is much muddled thinking and writing. The candidates and their spokesmen, we may assume, will endeavor to clarify and interpret these confusing passages. The Sun will be obligated to face these differences frankly and make a judgment between them.

But the primary issue will remain. Three terms for a President are one too many. In a fourth term, with the unifying ties of wartime emotion removed, the evil forces of disintegration which we all know exist would be free to do their worst. The national safety would be compromised. Mr. Roosevelt's record could be much better than it is and Mr. Dewey's much worse and still the public interest would demand a change.

Suppose Governor Dewey Had Been Our President?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH F. GUFFEY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 3 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 1), 1944

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Suppose Governor Dewey Had Been Our President?" published in the Philadelphia Record of July 2, 1944.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SUPPOSE GOVERNOR DEWEY HAD BEEN OUR PRESIDENT?

In his acceptance speech, Governor Dewey denounced President Roosevelt for "wrangling, bungling, and confusion." His constant implication was that he and the Republican Party would have done a much better job.

The Roosevelt record is so bad, insists Dewey, that our President is not to be entrusted with the task of securing peace after victory is won.

That is quite an indictment and quite a claim. Fortunately, we can check up.

We have Mr. Dewey's record for those years. We have the Republican Party's record of those years.

So let us go back only 4 years. Let us suppose that on January 1, 1940, Thomas E. Dewey was sitting in the White House and the G. O. P. had a majority in Congress.

What kind of a job would have been done?

1. Great Britain would not have received the 50 over-age destroyers when U-boats almost cut her lifeline to America.

2. Russia probably would not be an ally today.

3. There would have been no lend-lease program.

4. We would have been caught on December 7, 1941, with almost the tiniest army in the world.

5. We would have had almost no air force.

6. We would have been committed to a policy of isolation.

All this is on the record. Here it is:

ISOLATION?

On March 30, 1940, Dewey declared, "We must elect a Republican administration which will keep * * * completely out of European affairs."

DESTROYERS FOR BRITAIN?

Even after France had fallen, and 2 days before Winston Churchill's famous "blood, sweat, and tears" speech, Dewey opposed any further aid to Britain because it "might lead to involvement."

RUSSIA?

It was in January 1940 that Dewey called recognition of Russia by the United States "a conspicuous and unfortunate departure" from our foreign policy, and Russia itself "a perversion of government abhorrent to the conscience of mankind."

LEND-LEASE?

As late as January 15, 1941, after Britain had barely survived the blitz, Dewey said the lend-lease bill would "bring an end to free government in the United States," and added that it would permit the President to "give away the whole Navy."

PREPAREDNESS?

If the Republican Party had been in control, the bill to build an army through the Selective Service Act would have been beaten. The Republicans in the House voted more than 2 to 1 against it. The count was 112 against, 52 for.

OUR AIR FORCE?

When the President, in 1940, called for an air force of 50,000 planes and an annual production of 50,000 planes, Dewey said in a speech at Dallas, Tex., May 27, 1940:

"What is the good of talking about 50,000 planes unless we know what we are talking about? To produce 50,000 planes a year it will take a plant four and a half times as large as our present plant, including all plant capacity under construction. Experts estimate it would take 4 years to accomplish this."

Within 3 years, it turned out, America was producing 100,000 planes a year.

With this record, anyone can see where this Nation would have been on December 7, 1941, had Dewey and the G. O. P. been in power.

It is highly probable that our mainland would have been attacked.

True, Dewey later changed his mind on all these points—after the President proved their rightness. He changed his mind on lend-lease. He says he has changed his mind on isolation. He changed his mind on aid to Britain, on conscription, on air power.

But anybody can be a second guesser.

The Presidency demands a man who can be right the first time.

Yet today Dewey by implication denounces the vision and courage of Franklin Roosevelt, who recognized the danger and had to fight Dewey's own party in order to prepare the country to meet that danger.

That "tired old man" was wide awake when Thomas E. Dewey was fast asleep.

Keynote Address by Governor Kerr at the Democratic National Convention

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ELMER THOMAS

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 3 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 1), 1944

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a copy of the keynote address delivered by Hon. Robert S. Kerr, Governor of the State of Oklahoma, before the Democratic National Convention held in Chicago, on July 19, 1944.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Democrats of this great convention and my fellow Americans, in this solemn hour, as representatives of the common people of every State and Territory in this Nation we meet again to reaffirm our faith in Democratic principles and to give an accounting of our stewardship. But in this greatest crisis in history, America and the world have a right to ask more of us. They are entitled to know where we stand and what our aims and purposes as a great political party are. We are here to answer.

Our aim is complete and speedy victory.

Our goal is a just and abiding peace.

Our promise to a world at peace is responsibility and cooperation.

Our pledge to America at peace is a government responsive to the needs and hopes of every citizen, even the humblest, a government which will not shirk or fail, but will fulfill, with gratitude and fidelity, our sacred obligation to our returning service men and women.

The keynote of this convention and of America's heart and mind is not being sounded here tonight. It is being thundered by our fighting men around the world, by those at home who provide the food for them and us, by the workers who provide the munitions of war, by the rank and file of our citizens who, through taxes and bond purchases, provide the money required to pay our part of the cost of this global war. This keynote is being sounded loud and clear by the roaring, swirling thousands of our fighter planes—our slashing bombers and our mighty superfortresses of the air. It comes from the deadly throats of the many, many guns on the battle units of our powerful fleets—all seven of them. It comes from the blazing firepower set and kept in motion by our men who fight on the ground, the Infantry—yes, and the invincible marines. May God bless them and keep them—all of them, our fighting men and women—and give them the sustaining strength to match their glorious spirit. It is they who, since Pearl Harbor, have been and now are sounding the keynote of America's unyielding purpose, of democracy's aims and hopes.

AN ALL-AMERICAN ANSWER

Let us be in tune with the spirit of that keynote.

Hitler, in his blind ignorance and fury, called us a "decadent, soft democracy." Our fighting men have given him his answer—the greatest all-American team of all times—the team of all Americans, Democrats and Republicans alike, has given him his answer. The farmers, the workers, the rank and file of our citizens, the armed forces of our Nation, democratic but not decadent, are marching, tramping, and climbing with our Commander in Chief to victory.

There is no easy way to win this greatest of all wars either at home or abroad. As our fighting men battle and slash their way closer and closer to Berlin and Tokyo, they will meet harder and sterner tasks. The same is true where we fight.

Our sacrifices will be harder and sterner. We know that in the long shadows we yet must travel there will be, in the words of the mighty Churchill, "Blood, toil, tears, and sweat." That is our portion—that we can and will endure—but wouldn't it really be terrible if in addition to all of these we should be compelled to suffer the affliction and disaster of another Hoover administration?

In this hall last month the Republicans nominated as their candidate for President the man selected for them 4 years ago by Herbert Hoover. As America looked on she saw the mantle of Herbert Hoover not falling upon but being placed upon the shoulders of his cherished disciple, Thomas E. Dewey. What she did not see, but what will become more and more apparent, is that the mantle has become the shroud.

When that same convention snubbed and sidetracked Wendell Willkie the last vestige of liberal leadership of the Republican Party was buried under an avalanche of reactionary sentiment from which it cannot soon emerge.

SHALL WE INVITE DISASTER?

Talleyrand said: "The Bourbons were incapable either of learning anything or of forgetting anything." To give these modern Bourbons, these Republican leaders, control of the Nation for the next 4 years would bring about the certain return of 1932. It would be to invite disaster without even the chance of "coming in on a wing and a prayer."

The old guard is again in the saddle in the G. O. P., hoping to run rampant over liberalism in America in November as they did over their own ranks here 3 short weeks ago.

In their blindness the Republicans have charted a course America will not follow.

In their hatred they have matched a fight they cannot win.

The forces of Democracy will accept their challenge and defeat them—either on the issue of what they did not do and cannot do, or on the issue of what we have done and will do.

Do you remember the 12 long years from 1920 through 1932, when America hardened under Harding, cooled under Coolidge, and hungered under Hoover? The Republican Party had no program to prevent economic disaster then. It had no program in the dangerous years preceding Pearl Harbor to prevent war or to meet it if it came. Most of the Republican Members of the National Congress fought every constructive move designed to prepare our country in case of war.

They fought and voted against the naval-expansion bill in 1938.

In March 1939 they voted against a bill to increase our air force to a total of 6,000 planes.

In June 1939, in the House, they voted 144 to 8 to reduce the appropriation for the Army Air Corps.

In September 1939, after war started in Europe, they voted 6 to 1 against the repeal of the arms embargo.

In September 1940, after France had fallen and the blitzkreig against England had begun, the Republicans in the House voted 112 to 52 against the Selective Service Act.

In February 1941 the Republicans in the House voted 135 to 24 against lend-lease.

In August 1941, 4 months before Pearl Harbor, the Republicans in the House voted 133 to 21 to disband that part of the armed forces built from selective-service personnel.

They fought every person who came forward with courage to declare the danger that threatened the world and us, and every person who sought to prepare this Nation to meet the conflict that loomed across the world's horizon.

THE REPUBLICAN ROLE

The Republican Party has no program today except to oppose. Let us limit them to that role.

They have played partisan politics with one of the most deadly dangers confronting our Nation—the danger of inflation. They have offered no program to prevent it. Yet with reckless abandon they sought to destroy the one adopted.

Our Republican opponents are not even united among themselves. Millions of them favored Willkie and deeply resent his being driven from the party.

Confidentially, my fellow Democrats, real battles are being fought among the tall timbers of the Republican Party. I have never seen a group more keenly suspicious of each other, nor have I ever seen suspicions better founded.

Most Americans, Democrats and Republicans alike, agree that our President has done a great job as a war leader. Our opponents attack him and seek to defeat him on domestic issues.

I take it that none here is too young to remember the tragic years of 1929 through 1932. The awful depression and Republican unemployment of those 4 years, brought on by the unsound policies of Coolidge's administration and intensified by Hoover's inadequacy and insufficiencies, created more suffering in this Nation, destroyed more wealth, caused more poverty, and left our Nation in the most weakened and hopeless condition ever known.

THE DEMOCRATIC RECORD

What American is not grateful for the gains our people have made since those dark days? A prosperous Nation now demonstrates its mighty power as its factories, mills, and farms, year after year, set new records of production. They are the wonders of the world. I share your pride in the unparalleled peacetime advances won under the matchless leadership of our great President, Franklin Delano Roosevelt.

If you truly favor private enterprise and equal opportunity to all, can you support the Republican Party, under which these suffered most and came the nearest to destruction?

Do you remember when the president of the National Chamber of Commerce publicly urged that the President revive and restore the crushed and broken structure of private enterprise?

Do you remember when the captains of industry throughout the land, struggling to free themselves from the quicksand in which they were sinking, pled for the National Government to save them? How often must they be saved from the flames of depression and bankruptcy brought on by the short-sighted policy of the Republican Party when in power before they will seek to avoid the cause of their trouble with as much vigor as they strive to be relieved of its consequences? How many whirlwinds must they reap before they learn the folly of sowing the wind? If we truly favor private enterprise how can we fail to support the Democratic President, under whom the greatest advance in material prosperity by the largest percentage of our people in all of the Nation's history has been achieved?

I know a few whose prosperity is exceeded by their pessimism. Their howls are louder in the midst of the most prosperous times they have ever known than their groans were in the bottom of Hoover's black depression. And this when so many are suffering and sacrificing so heroically and without complaint!

WHICH WOULD YOU CHOOSE?

If Americans truly favor prosperity for our farmers, can they support the Republican Party, under which the farmers suffered the most, or oppose the present Democratic administration, under which they have prospered the best?

If Americans truly favor labor, can they support the Republican Party, under which labor fared the worst, or oppose the present administration, under which it has enjoyed the greatest progress?

If you truly favor old-age assistance to give our honored aged citizens freedom from want and starvation, can you support the Republican Party, under which this security was never known, or can you oppose the present administration, which originated it in spite of the Republicans' bitter opposition?

THE REPUBLICANS WERE "AGIN' IT"

If America truly favors a social security program giving American workers security from starvation when conditions beyond their control temporarily prevent their employment, can we restore the party to power that fought the legislation providing it? Or can we afford to remove the party from power that erected this great milestone of progress?

If we in America truly favor a sound banking system providing profit to its owners and safety to its depositors, could we restore the party to power, under which in 12 years more banks failed than in all the rest of our Nation's history with the greatest loss to depositors ever known, or could we remove from power the Democratic administration, under which the depositors have suffered the smallest loss and the stockholders received the fairest percentage of profit ever had during any similar period?

If we favor economic conditions permitting small business to prosper, could we vote to restore the Republican Party to power, under which in 1932 alone 32,000 small businesses failed, or could we vote to remove from power the Democratic administration, under which small business has enjoyed its most profitable years?

If we in America truly favor the opportunity for the average family to own its home, can we vote to restore to power the party under which more homes and farms were lost and more mortgages foreclosed than during any other similar period, or could we vote to remove the Democratic Party from power when more millions of American homes, both on the farms and in the cities and towns, were saved, than during any other time?

THE DEMOCRATS DID IT

If we in America truly favor conservation of our greatest natural resource, the soil; the reclamation of badly eroded or abandoned lands; the provision for irrigation of millions of acres, can we vote to remove from power the administration under which the most progress ever made has been brought about, or could we vote to return to power the Republican administration under which these matters were either forgotten or ignored?

If we favor winning an abiding peace after our magnificent fighting men and women have defeated our enemies—if we do not want to compel each succeeding generation of America's sons to leave their homes and firesides and families to go yonder where the ravages of war maim and disable and kill, can we vote to restore to power the political party whose leadership, after World War No. 1, willfully and wickedly sabotaged every effective vehicle for keeping the peace?

Shall we restore to power the party whose national leadership under the domination of isolationists scrapped and sank more of our fleet than was destroyed by the Japanese at Pearl Harbor? Or can we fail to support the Democratic administration under which America has become the greatest naval power on earth?

WHAT KIND OF POST-WAR?

If we in America truly love these sons and daughters of ours who today fight for us and who tomorrow will achieve the victory for which they fight today, and if it is our resolve that they shall have the opportunity for profitable peacetime employment when they return from the wars to take their place as the most respected and best loved among us, can we vote to return to power the political party whose national leaders were so indifferent to the welfare of the veterans of World War No. 1? You saw those veterans compelled to sell apples and pencils on the streets of our cities because no jobs were available anywhere in the land. You saw them go to Washington to petition their Government, for which they had fought—at Chateau-Thierry, at Belleau Wood, in the Meuse-Argonne, and on a dozen other battlefields. You saw that same Republican administration turn a deaf ear to their petition, and order its military forces to drive those veterans from the streets of the Capital of the Nation they and their battle-killed comrades had saved. You saw the military armament—machine guns, rifles, and tanks—of the Government for which they had offered their lives turned on them by the unwilling hands of their own comrades because of the stupid and brutal orders of a Republican President. You saw some of them killed; you saw their pitiful personal belongings, evidences of their poverty, taken from them and burned.

If you oppose this kind of bitter ingratitude, and I know you do, can you oppose the Democratic administration which has already recommended and helped to bring about legislation providing lasting and constructive benefits to the returning service men and women of this war? Can you fail to support this Democratic administration that has declared so unequivocally its purpose of providing the opportunity for profitable peacetime employment to our returning service men and women?

The American fighting man aims to win this war and then come home to Mom and Dad and to Mary and the kids, and he wants a job—the opportunity for honorable and profitable employment. Where is the American who would deny him this blessed privilege? Where is the American who would give him less? The Republican administration gave him much less after the other war.

The Republicans made some vague promises to our fighting men here in this hall last month about what they will do for them after the war. That's pretty good from a bunch that wouldn't even give them the opportunity to vote during the war. I've seen the Constitution used for a lot of fine purposes, but that is the first time I ever saw it misused as a cudgel to drive millions of fighting Americans away from their own ballot boxes.

Many Republican leaders, sounding the real keynote and purpose of the Republican Party in this fateful year, say: "There has not been a single constructive accomplishment brought about by the Roosevelt administration." Reactionary Republicans have resisted every progressive measure of this administration and bitterly oppose them now. They remind me of the cantankerous old grumbler who on his ninety-second birthday was asked, "Uncle, you have lived to the ripe old age of 92—you must have seen a lot of changes in your time, haven't you?" Replied the uncle, "Yes; and I am agin' every one of them."

I read a graphic, if not elegant, poem the other day describing the Republican opposition. It read as follows:

"TWELVE LONG YEARS

"The Republicans for 12 long years
Have shed their coats and skins and tears
To tell their comrades how they feel Regarding Roosevelt's New Deal.

"For 12 long years they've pled for votes
But never mention 9-cent oats.
They say 'This New Deal stuff is rotten.'
But never speak of 4-cent cotton.

"For 12 long years they've wept aloud
And cussed this money-spending crowd.
They say, 'Of liberty we are shorn,'
But not a breath of 12-cent corn.

"For 12 long years they've been at sea,
And now they come to you and me
And offer us as bait for votes
More 3-cent steers and 9-cent oats.

"For 12 long years they fume and fret,
Hammer and slander the 'New Deal set.'
They say to all, 'What a cheat!'
But forget to talk of two-bit wheat!

"They offer as in days of old
A crown of thorns, a cross of gold,
More gilded promises—can you beat 'em?
Well, one thing sure, you can't eat 'em!"

My friends, the Democratic Party has proved its worthiness of the people's continued confidence.

Time and again we have seen the results of our President's leadership. Time and again our opponents have sought to fill the minds of the people with doubt and confusion, and time and again successes have dispelled the doubts, confounded the confusers and confused the doubters.

The people have not been—they will not be—misled. They are doing a magnificent job. Men and women, boys and girls of all political parties, of every race and color and religious faith are proving themselves to be America's greatest generation.

AMERICA IS STRONG

Our enemies, dazed and bewildered, cannot understand the striking power, producing and building power, of our military and our civilian soldiers.

Our heroic and patriotic farmers have made greater production records each year in spite of increasing war shortages of manpower and farm machinery and regardless of periodic gloomy prophecies of national starvation by many, including Herbert Hoover.

All of these and thousands of other things have been accomplished by America's civilian armies, with American women doing their proud part and more. They march side by side with the men in the armed forces. Their strong and faithful hands never stop working, in the homes, on the farms, in the factories, and at every job that will speed the day of victory. They long for, work for, and pray for peace. The kind of peace worked for, fought for, and died for by the immortal Woodrow Wilson. The kind of peace worked for and fought for now by President Roosevelt.

WE MUST WIN THE PEACE

America and her allies are winning this war because they have planned their work and are now working their plan. They can and must win an abiding peace. International peace, as we of this generation have had to learn twice, is of vital concern to every American. It cannot be achieved by burying our heads in the sand and leaving white tail feathers waving in the breeze.

Through tragic experience we have learned that it is just as necessary to prepare for peace while waging war as it is to prepare against war while enjoying peace. We must realize that the unsolved problems of peace are the causes of war.

Some of the greatest victories won in this war have been in the field of diplomacy. No military victory can mean more to America and her allies than the diplomatic advances made in the Atlantic Charter, and in the conferences held at Casablanca, Moscow, Teheran, and Cairo. These and many other such advances have been wisely conceived by our President, so ably aided by that grand American statesman, the greatest Secretary of State in a hundred years, Cordell Hull.

TRIED—OR UNTRIED?

The President, during the next 4 years, must represent our country in many more such conferences. I ask all Americans everywhere: Who can best represent our Nation in the future councils of war with our allies and in the conferences around the peace table? I know America will not regard this question lightly, nor decide it wrongly. Shall it be Thomas E. Dewey or Franklin D. Roosevelt?

Who will represent England at the peace table? An untried man—or her greatest and wisest—Winston Churchill?

Who will represent China? Some man without experience—or Chiang Kai-shek?

Who will represent Russia? One who for the first time will participate in such a meeting and who, no matter how honorable he might be or how able he might sometime become, would thus be greatly handicapped—or will she be represented by her most experienced and strongest—Joseph Stalin?

Each of our allies will be represented by the one who has demonstrated the greatest ability for the task.

Who will represent the United States of America? An untried leader who has not even told his own people what his views are? Or the man who has from the start declared his position in clear and certain words, and who has the respect and esteem of all the United Nations as no other living American?

Will it be Dewey—or Roosevelt?

THE MYTH OF YEARS

Just suppose for a moment, but no longer, that it were Dewey. What would Churchill and Stalin and the Generalissimo and the other Allied leaders think and do when they learned that he looked on them as just a group of "tired old men"?

When England faced her darkest hour, with her military forces unorganized and poorly armed, in whose leadership did she place her trust? Her least tried or most proved? Can England, can we, can the civilized world ever discharge the debt of gratitude due Winston Churchill?

When he was just about as old as Mr. Dewey is now he permitted an impetuous urge to lead him into the tragedy of Gallipoli. But how different he acted at 65. After Dunkerque he stood before the House of Commons. Listen—are these the words of a "tired old man"? "We shall not flag nor fail. We shall fight in France and on the seas and oceans. We shall defend our island whatever the cost may be. We shall fight on the beaches, landing grounds, in the fields, in streets, and on the hills. We shall never surrender."

Look at Stalingrad. Whose figure looms amid the defenders? Whose spirit sustains them in the most heroic and awful hour in Russia's history? Who stopped and defeated and now drives Hitler's once mighty armies, once dreaded air force, back and back and back? Mr. Dewey would have discarded him nearly 3 years ago when he was 62 as a "tired old man." But Russia is smarter than that. She marches irresistibly today under the leadership of her much revered, world respected, 65-year-old Joseph Stalin.

ARE THE ADMIRALS AND GENERALS TOO OLD?

Let us examine the record.

Shall we discard as a "tired old man" 59-year-old Admiral Nimitz?

Shall we discard as a "tired old man" the lion of the Pacific, 62-year-old Admiral Halsey?

Shall we stop his onward sweep to redeem the Philippine Islands and discard as a "tired old man" 64-year-old Gen. Douglas MacArthur?

Should we discard as a "tired old man" the chief of all our naval forces, 66-year-old Admiral King?

Shall we discard as a "tired old man" the greatest military leader of our Nation, 64-year-old Gen. George C. Marshall?

No, Mr. Dewey; we know we are winning this war with these "tired old men," including the 62-year-old Roosevelt as their Commander in Chief. What diplomatic or military experience have you had that justifies you or us in believing that you can handle the most difficult and important responsibilities and duties ever placed upon the shoulders of any American?

When the life and liberty of every American hang in the balance; when the safety and welfare of unborn generations in this fair land are at stake, what assurance do you have for yourself and your own loved ones or can you give our 130,000,000 Americans that you and we may know that you can do this tremendous job? Suppose we broke up this team that every American knows is a winning one, which you have openly approved and in an effort to gain votes promised to keep, that is, all but the Commander in Chief, which position you seem to regard as a minor detail; and suppose we named you Commander in Chief? What assurance could our fighting men, their mothers and fathers, sons and daughters, have that we could thereby win the war one day sooner, or as soon, and with as few casualties, as we can under our present leadership? What experience have you had or what deeds have you performed to indicate that you could do as well, to say nothing of doing better?

Imagine, if you can, what we would have suffered and where we would be if Dewey had succeeded in his efforts to defeat lend-lease when it was proposed by President Roosevelt, who was neither too old to originate that great program nor too tired to put it in operation.

Roosevelt was not too old to see the terrible danger to America from Germany and Japan nor too tired to move with speed and courage to get munitions of war to the democracies who were fighting them and thus keeping them away from our shores.

Lend-lease, in spite of Dewey's opposition, in spite of opposition from the vast majority of Republican leaders in Congress, went into effect 9 months before Pearl Harbor. Now, 3 years and 4 months later, all Americans, Democrats and Republicans alike, can thank God for it and for Roosevelt who did so much to accomplish it.

DEWEY'S POSIES

In his efforts now to appear something other than the isolationist that he is, Thomas E. Dewey has gathered a few posies from the declared foreign policy of Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Hull, until he has most of the form of a Willkie bouquet without any of the substance.

The forces of isolationism crucified the great-hearted Woodrow Wilson. The same forces now strive with equal fury and frenzy to inflict the same fate on Roosevelt. But where they succeeded then, they will fail now.

The people—patriotic Democrats and Republicans alike—will not again be misled and betrayed by the same false doctrine and propaganda, no matter how disguised or camouflaged it may be.

In 1920 Mr. Harding and the Republican Party promised to lead America back to normalcy.

Mr. Hoover reiterated that thought from this platform last month when he said, "And may I say this to the youth [and the youth in Albany was listening to every word] * * * you can lead our Nation back to unity of purpose again."

Our answer to that is: "This Nation is not going back again."

WE ARE NOT GOING BACK

When this war is won a grateful Nation will not go back on the farmers of America who have produced so heroically and so abundantly in our great war effort—nor will this Nation go back to a Republican administration that did go back on American farmers.

When this war is won a grateful Nation will not go back on labor—the workers who have produced the munitions and equipment of war so patriotically in this great struggle—nor will this Nation go back to a Republican administration that did go back on the workers of America.

When this war is won a grateful Nation will not go back on the home owners, businessmen, and the great masses of our people who have served so faithfully in this war effort—nor will this Nation go back to a Republican administration that did go back on these, our citizens.

When this war is won a grateful Nation will not forget, nor go back on its returning service men and women—nor will this Nation go back to a Republican administration that did go back on the returning servicemen of World War No. 1.

Our President has already made comprehensive plans for America to go forward now, and in the post-war period. He has submitted them to the Congress. Part of them are now law. Others soon will be. It is his proposal and our program that wartime America can and will become a prosperous peacetime America with opportunity for profitable employment for all.

I say to you, to the Democrats of America, to our fighting forces around the globe, and to all men and women of this Nation who have dreamed of a better world, and who are willing to work and sacrifice to realize that dream, victory is within our grasp. We have stormed the beaches of poverty and discouragement and fear and seen the hearts of the people filled with new life, lifted with new hope, and buoyant with superb confidence. We have overrun the ramparts of special privilege and reaction and planted the banner of Democratic liberalism high on the hill of human progress.

Let our opponents—who have grown fat in a prosperity they could not build for themselves—do their worst. Under our great Commander in Chief we will not now retreat. We will not falter in midpassage. We will win.

Address of Hon. Clare Boothe Luce, Member of Congress from Connecticut, to the Republican National Convention at Chicago, June 27, 1944

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EARL C. MICHENER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 23, 1944

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the privilege given to me, I include the address of Hon. CLARE BOOTHE LUCE, Member of Congress from Connecticut, to the Republican National Convention at Chicago, on June 27, 1944. The address is as follows:

Ladies and gentlemen of the convention, we have been called together in a time of historic crisis to choose the next President of the United States.

Plainly the honor of speaking to you in this hour so fraught with consequence has come to me because I am a woman. Through one woman's voice our party seeks to honor the millions of American women in war industries, in Red Cross work, in civil service, in hospital and canteen, and volunteer work. Our party honors the women in the armed services and our truly noble Army and Navy nurses. Their courage has written a new chapter for American history books. Above all we honor the wives and sisters and sweethearts and mothers of our fighting men. The morale of the home front has been largely in their keeping. They have kept it to the height of the morale on the battle front.

And yet, I know and you know, that American women do not wish their praises sung as women, any more than they wish political pleas made to them as women. They feel no differently from men about doing their patriotic jobs. They feel no differently from men about the ever-growing threats to good government. They feel no differently about inefficiency, abusiveness, evasion, self-seeking and personal whim in the management of the Nation's business. They feel no differently about the processes which have little by little distorted our democracy into a dictatorial bumbledom. And certainly they feel no differently about pressing this war to the enemy's innermost gates, or creating from the sick havocs of war itself, a fair and healthy peace.

But there is one thing that women feel, not differently, but more deeply about than men.

In this crowded convention hall, many women are wearing the little red and white pin whose blue star shows that somewhere on land, in the air, at sea, there is a man in uniform who is dearer to her than all else in the world. Shall I speak of what is closest to the mind and heart of every American woman today? Then I shall speak of the man who is known from Key West to Kiska, from San Diego to Harlem, as G. I. Joe.

American women want these minutes and, yes, every minute of our thought and concern to turn on this fighting man. Uppermost in their minds are his hopes, his aspirations, his dangerous present, and his still uncertain future.

Now, G. I. Joe's last name is Legion, because there are about 12,000,000 of him. What his immediate needs are today his generals and his admirals know best. To the filling of these needs, all Americans are pledged to the limit of their capacity.

But this convention is gathered together to consider not so much G. I. Joe's immediate wants as to clarify what his wants are likely to be in the next 4 years, and to plan to meet those wants.

Before this convention is done it will have clearly interpreted Joe's long-term wants in keynote and in platform, and to the honoring of them our candidate will pledge himself with vigor and with truthfulness.

The great Scandinavian, Ibsen, said, "I hold that man most in the right who is most closely in league with the future."

Here the Republican Party will choose the man most closely in league with G. I. Joe's future as he and his family see it. And so the man we choose shall prove to be most in the right in November.

Now, if you asked G. I. Joe today what he wants most of the future, he would probably say, "I want to go home, of course. But I want to go home by way of Berlin and Tokyo."

And this tremendous and heroic want of Joe's to sail into the roadsteads of Yokohama, and march by the waters of the Rhine—this alone is a greater guaranty of the future security of our Nation than any guaranty any political party can offer.

This is Joe's gift, beyond price, to America.

But wait—if today you asked Joe, in the heat of battle, why he wanted to go home by way of Berlin and Tokyo, you might get a very unexpected and sobering answer. He'd say that the biggest reason was that he wanted to vindicate and avenge G. I. Jim. And because G. I. Jim is the biggest reason today that Joe is fighting like a man possessed of devils and guarded by angels, we had better talk of him in the time that remains to us.

Who is G. I. Jim? Ask rather, who was G. I. Jim? He was Joe's pal, his buddy, his brother. Jim was the fellow who lived next door to you. But, "He shall return no more to his house, neither shall his place know him any more." Jim was, you see, immobilized by enemy gunfire, immobilized for all eternity.

But Jim's last name was not Legion. You read the casualty lists. You have seen Jim's last name there: Smith, Martof, Johnston, Chang, Novak, LeBlanc, Gonstantakis, Yamada, O'Toole, Svendsen, Sanchez, Potavin, Goldberg, Rossi, Nordal, Wroblewski, McGregor, Schneider, Jones. You see, Jim was the grandson and great-grandson of many nations. But he was the son of the United States of America. He was the defender of the Republic, and the lover of liberty, and he died to make a more perfect Union, "that government of the people, by the people and for the people shall not perish from the earth."

Today a white cross marks his narrow grave on some Pacific island. His dust dulls the crimson of the roses that bloom in the ruins of an Italian village. The deserts of Africa, the jungles of Burma, the rice fields of China, the cold depths of the seven seas, the very snows of the Arctic, are the richer for mingling with the mortal part of him. Today his blood flecks the foam of the waves that fall on the Normandy beachheads. And again and again he falls on the tragic soil of France. Yes; even as it was in 1918. Or tantalizing and inscrutable phrase, Jim is just—missing in action. Then all that marks him anywhere is a gold star in the window and the tears that are silently shed for him.

There are many gold stars on the women sitting in these halls. To all who loved Jim, even more than to those who love Joe, everything we do and say here must be helpful and inspiring.

We are come together here to nominate a President who will make sure that Jim's sacrifice shall not prove useless in the years that lie ahead.

For a fighting man dies for the future as well as the past; to keep all that was fine of his country's yesterday, and to give it a chance for a finer tomorrow.

Do we here in this convention dare ask if Jim's heroic death in battle was historically inevitable? If this whole World War might not have been averted? We know that this war was in the making everywhere in the world after 1918. In the making here, too. Might not skillful and determined American statesmanship have helped to unmake it all through the thirties? Or, when it was clear to our Government that it was too late to avert war, might not truthful and fearless leadership have prepared us better for it in matériel and in morale, in arms and in aims? These are bitter questions. And the answers to bitter questions belong to time's perspective. Being human, we Republicans are partisan. But being partisan, we risk being unjust if we try to answer these questions in days so fateful. But this, even as partisans, we dare say: The last 12 years have not been Republican years. Maybe during the twenties Republican Presidents were overconfident that sanity would prevail abroad. But who dealt with the visibly rising menaces of Hitler and Mussolini and Hirohito? It was not a Republican President. Who promised young Jim's mother and father and neighbors economic security and peace from '33 to '39? Yes, peace? It was not a Republican President. Who promised the mothers and fathers of America again and again and again that their sons were not going to be sent to fight in any foreign wars—when he knew, when he knew, even as he spoke, that the security of America demanded that these sons should shortly fight on foreign soil? It was not a Republican President. Who gave these promises again and again and again to our ears, but broke them to our hearts? It was not a Republican President. This terrible truth cannot be denied; these promises, given by a Government that was elected again and again and again because it made them, lie quite as dead as young Jim lies now. Jim was the heroic heir of an unheroic decade; a decade of confusion and conflict that ended in war—the Roosevelt decade.

But Jim did not complain too much about his Government. Sure, mistakes, awful mistakes, had been made by his Government. But Jim figured that anybody can make mistakes. Maybe Jim's friends and neighbors had made them, too. How could his friends and neighbors tell that they had been going for some promises that should not have been made because they could not be kept? How could they tell that some of these promises were never spoken to be kept? Maybe Jim's neighbors would have acted differently, voted differently, if they'd known all the facts. But maybe they wouldn't. Anyway, Jim has taken the rap for everyone's mistakes, from the man in the White House down to the man in the house around the corner. And it was O. K. with Jim. He was ready to pay with his life for his countrymen's mistakes, anytime, if it gave the home folks and good old Joe a fresh start on life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness in a world wiped clean of the Nazi marauders and Japanese spoilers.

If Jim could stand here and talk to you he might say, "Listen, folks, the past wasn't perfect. But skip it. Get on with the business of making this old world better. You've got the land, the tools, the know-how, and big bunches of people who want to pull together. No country ever had more. And you've got great and friendly nations who want to pitch in with you, like they pitched in even before Joe and I did, to fight the Japs and Germans. Take your hats off to the past, but take your coats off to the future. I didn't look back when I struck the beaches. Is it tougher at home for you fellows?"

This is what Jim might say if he could stand here and talk to you. Well, I suspect Jim is at this convention—although he is no longer, you understand, a Republican or a Democrat. But a man who dies to keep America America, and to give G. I. Joe a break, just might like to stay on a bit to see whether or not he's really succeeded. So, if Jim were here, it might be the most natural thing in the other world. Maybe he was brought here by some friend who knows his way around American Presidential conventions. Yes, maybe he was brought here by Gen. George Washington. All Americans know that the General's spirit has watched over every gathering where Presidents have been picked for 147 years. And if that is the case, then Jim has learned a lot he never knew before about American Presidents. For example, Jim always knew from the history books that the General was a soldier without blemish. But now he knows that Washington was a President who, if he erred, as all Presidents do, erred with integrity. He knows that General Washington might have become America's king, and that President Washington might have stayed in power all his days; the early days of our weak and infant Republic, which were days of terrible crises and stupendous emergencies. Wild disorders of frontier life, political confusion worse than any we know, marked Washington's last years in office. And there were great social and economic injustices still to be corrected. Then every man said that George Washington was the indispensable man. Who understood better and could better save the new liberty he had given a new nation? But Washington so loved his country and the institutions that he helped to author, that he refused more than two terms. That was a tradition Washington's spirit never saw broken at any President-making gathering for a century until it was broken by the man who promised in this very city 12 years ago that "Happy days are here again." It was never broken until it was broken by the man who promised peace—yes, peace—to Jim's mother and father. But Jim knows now why, even so, Washington's spirit is calm. Why? Well, Washington knows even better today than he knew a century and a half ago, that no one man can destroy our Nation's institutions. And no one man can save them. He knows that the people alone can destroy, or save, their country's institutions. For freemen always have another chance to redeem the mistakes of the past, and to shape anew their own history. In peace or in war, freemen can always choose and change their President.

Oh, yes, Jim and his friend, the Father of his Country, want us to choose well, as well as we know how here. They want us to choose a man who would rather tell the truth than be President; to choose a man who loves his country and its institutions more than he loves power. They do not want us to pretend that any one Republican, more than any one Democrat, is indispensable. They want us to think as Americans. And as Americans, they want us to raise here a "standard to which the wise and honest can repair." They know that the event, today as yesterday, is in the hands of God.

And this we will do here, for Jim's sake. And then Jim can exultantly say:

"I am the Risen Soldier, I have come
From a thousand towns, the city blocks
The factories, the fields of this fair land.

"Many am I, yet truly one, the son of many streams
That poured their wealth into the common cup
The wide and golden cup of liberty.
"I am the Risen Soldier; though I die
I shall live on and, living, still achieve
My country's mission—Liberty in truth.
"Lord, it is sweet to die—as it were good
To live, to strive for these United States,
Which, in your wisdom, you have willed should be
A beacon to the world, a living shrine
Of liberty and charity and peace."

It is as Americans that we are gathered here. We come to choose a President who will redeem the mistakes of the past, not try to apologize for them. Who will justify G. I. Jim's death, not try to explain it.

Apology and explanation must suffice for the Democrats when they meet in this city—not to choose a President but to take Mr. Roosevelt and like it.

Let that convention which meets here point to Joe's homecoming with forboding. Let the Democratic Party call Joe, who has saved us, "The terrible problem of the returned veteran." Another candidate, not ours, can hold Joe's return as an economic club over the heads of the people. We are Americans. We say, "Hurry home, Joe, by way of Berlin and Tokyo. We need you."

Yes, we Republicans, men and women, are here to build a greater and freer America, not only for, but with the millions of young, triumphant G. I. Joes, who are fighting their way home to us.

Missing in Action and Their Dependents

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM H. STEVENSON
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 3, 1944

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, I am receiving many letters asking questions about the rights of men and women reported as missing. The writers of these letters also want to know what rights the dependents of men and women reported as missing have. For that reason, I am explaining these rights so that my people will be fully informed. If you have any further questions, feel free to write me, Congressman WILLIAM H. STEVENSON, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Question. If a service man or service woman is officially reported to be missing or missing in action, is his or her family notified?

Answer. Yes; the War or Navy Department promptly telegraphs the person whom the service man or service woman has designated as emergency addressee.

Question. What do the terms "missing" and "missing in action" mean?

Answer. They mean that the person has disappeared. It is not inferred that he is dead. In many cases it is found later that the person is alive, interned in a neutral country, a prisoner of war, or was isolated in such a way that a prompt reporting of whereabouts was impossible.

Question. When a person in service is in the status of missing or missing in action, does his right to pay stop?

Answer. No. His pay will continue as long as such status is officially continued.

Question. What provision exists for the support of dependents in such cases?

Answer. Family allowances and allotments of pay continue; and if not in effect, they may be established.

Question. If the serviceman or servicewoman had not made any allotment of pay previously, how are his or her dependents supported when he or she is declared to be missing, if they are not eligible to receive family allowance?

Answer. Where there is no existing provision adequate for the reasonable support of the dependent or to pay the premiums on the life insurance of the missing person, the secretary of the department concerned may direct suitable allotments of pay for these purposes.

Question. If the dependents of the missing person were eligible for a monthly family allowance but no application had been filed before the person in service entered the missing status, can the dependent obtain a family allowance?

Answer. Yes; by making application therefor.

Question. May a relative who is actually dependent upon a missing serviceman or servicewoman obtain an allotment of pay?

Answer. Yes; if actually dependent and a relative within the recognized degree.

Question. How does the Government make these payments?

Answer. The money is sent to the dependent or insurance company by means of a Government check each month. It is deducted from the missing veteran's credit which has accumulated.

Question. How much may be allotted to a dependent?

Answer. The Secretary of War or Secretary of the Navy determines the amount according to the circumstances in each individual case.

Question. How long do these allotments of pay continue?

Answer. If the dependent remains eligible to receive the allotments of pay, they may continue as long as the serviceman or servicewoman is officially continued in a missing status or is officially transferred to some status entitling him to a continuation of pay. If such veteran has been missing for 12 months, the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy reviews the record and determines whether such person should be continued in the missing status.

Question. If a missing serviceman or servicewoman is later found to be a prisoner of war or interned in a neutral country, does the allotment of pay continue?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Following a finding of death, what benefits begin for the dependent?

Answer. Death gratuities and insurance benefits then become payable to those entitled to them.

Question. What if a missing serviceman or servicewoman returns to the jurisdiction of the American military or naval authorities?

Answer. They again become a part of the Military or Naval Establishment and can adjust their allotments of pay to dependents on the same basis as servicemen or servicewomen who have not been missing.

If there is any need for further information, see your local Red Cross chairman or your county veterans' service officer, and if you need additional information, write your Congressman, WILLIAM H. STEVENSON, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

The Fourth Term

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SAMUEL DICKSTEIN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 3, 1944

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of Henry S. Hooker to the Men's League of Marble Collegiate Church on the evening of June 13, 1944:

The answer to the question of the fourth term is found, I believe, in considering and evaluating the things that happened in the summer of 1940. This country was in mortal danger at that time. If it ever had a rendezvous with destiny it had it then—and the month was May. The British Army by great bravery had just escaped annihilation and reached England from Dunkirk. Their weapons for further defense were gone. In the whole of England there were no adequate weapons. There was a great body of American opinion in favor of concentrating on the defense of this continent and allowing England to go under. America had to make a decision. If it had made the wrong decision you would not be here tonight. It had to decide whether it would permit England to go to the wall and lose her fleet, or whether it would stand by England. If our country had allowed England to go to the wall, it is quite apparent that it would not have stood a chance against the Axis Powers in the year 1940.

At that moment Churchill telephoned to the President and the President made the decision. The President issued orders to the War Department to collect every available piece of surplus artillery and ordnance and ship it to Raritan, N. J., where vessels for England were ordered to assemble. Within a week freight trains from the far west and every part of America were steaming east to Raritan with this material.

At this point the lawyers entered the scene and advanced technical objections. The lawyers told the Government that it would be a breach of neutrality to sell these arms to England, but they could be sold to an American corporation who in turn could sell them to England and this was accordingly done. Title was passed to the U. S. Steel Export Corporation and from it to the British Government. When the word was flashed that the lawyers were satisfied the stevedores loaded the munitions on the ships and shortly thereafter the British Army had something with which to fight and the worst of the crisis was over.

The next thing that happened that summer was a miracle. A Selective Service Act was for the first time in American history passed in time of peace and in an election year through the determination and insistence of the President. Let us tell you a little of the history of that act.

Nearly 30 years ago a group of men foreseeing war and knowing our unpreparedness gathered in New York and organized the Military Training Camps Association. With the help and leadership of Gen. Leonard Wood they established voluntary training camps to prepare officers. There were many difficulties, but they carried on and when war broke out they furnished the nucleus of the officers of the American Army who fought in France. If this had not been done it is a question whether the American Army would have arrived in time to save Europe. I know because I went over with my division in May 1918, and there was not much time to spare. After the World War this association which became known as the Plattsburg Group carried on with the object of having something like the Swiss system of universal service introduced into America so that we should not be caught again weak and impotent and see our men needlessly slaughtered. One of the leaders of this Group was James Wadsworth, a Republican and a very fine man. He appeared before the Senate Military Committee at the end of the First World War with our bill for universal service, and he was told by that committee that it was not necessary to consider this bill because there would never again be another World War.

In the spring of 1940 the old Plattsburg Group met often at the bar association here in New York and sat around a long table and prepared what later became the Selective Service Act. Many men now in the Government had a hand in this—among others, Colonel Stimson, now Secretary of War, and Judge Patterson, now the Under Secretary. As a result, the Selective Service Act was drawn and sent to Washington and introduced into Congress by Congressman WADSWORTH and Senator Burke, and it became known as the Burke-Wadsworth bill. At that point nothing further happened because the politicians thought it was dynamite and wouldn't touch it.

One night in June 1 happened to be staying at the White House and dined alone with the President, and I told him of the bill. He had never seen the bill. It had not been brought to his attention. He studied the bill that night and the next day threw the whole power of the administration behind it, and the miracle of its passage was assured.

Later in September, acting under Executive authority, the President turned over 50 of our old destroyers to the British in exchange for military bases stretching from Newfoundland to the Caribbean, and the things these ships did forms one of the most glorious pages in naval history.

For instance, about 18 months later one of them, the old U. S. S. Buchanan, rechristened the H. M. S. Campbelltown, steamed into the harbor of St. Nazaire, passed under point-blank range of the German guns, and rammed itself into the great lock gate of Germany's principal submarine and battleship base on the Atlantic. There it stuck with 5 tons of high explosive in its hold which was timed shortly to blow up and there it was visited by the high German officers of the town and there it suddenly blew up, destroying all the Germans and wrecking the base.

Other things happened in the summer of 1940 with lightning rapidity. I have not time to enumerate them now. No leading Republican applauded them except Wendell Willkie and he has been discarded by his party. Even he objected to delivering the destroyers to England without the permission of Congress, and as you all know the delay in getting this permission would have been fatal when things had to be done fast.

This was the summer of our rendezvous with destiny and these events mark the manner in which we kept that rendezvous. These events mark one of the greatest decisions in the history of any country or in the life of any man. Out of this decision came our lend-lease aid to Russia, to China, and to others, and out of it came the spiritual coalition of the United Nations and the pattern of ultimate victory.

The following months and the following year saw the introduction into Congress of many measures to implement the decision that had been taken, and every one of these measures was opposed, generally speaking, by the Republicans, in both the House and the Senate.

In the summer of 1941 the Selective Service Act under which our Army was being trained was to expire. If it had been allowed to expire men in training would have gone home and our preparedness would have come to an end. The Republican isolationists did their best to kill the Selective Service Act that summer. A vote was taken and the bill missed death by one vote.

Today it is crystal-clear that the Republicans were not wrong in matters merely of slight importance. They were wrong on the fundamental issue of our continued national existence. One does not return to a doctor whose advice if followed would have brought death, no matter how good that doctor's intentions might have been.

The desperate crisis is past, but the danger is not over and the future is difficult. If we think again of the summer of 1940, and carefully evaluate what happened then and since, we find our answer to this question of a fourth term.

An Honor Roll

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES A. PLUMLEY

OF VERMONT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 3, 1944

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, taking advantage of unanimous consent heretofore obtained, I am inserting the address I delivered upon the occasion of the dedication of the honor roll at White River Junction, Hartford, Vt., on Sunday, July 30, 1944.

Mr. Chairman, we have seen men and planes and squadrons of planes darken the sky and shake the earth with the thunder of their motors and their bombs.

We've seen battleships and fleets of battleships, cruisers, destroyers, carriers whipping the sea in a welter of white paper, drowning all sound with the roar of their guns.

We've heard the endless surf beat of attacks that roll in and smash at a beachhead again and again and then over-run islands and shoals of islands with tidal waves of landing craft, tanks, and trucks, and men.

We have seen men by the million go out from among us exemplifying the might of America to fight for that freedom which only those have a right to enjoy who are willing to die if necessary to maintain and defend it.

And we have seen some of them brought home to the land they loved to sleep in its bosom forever, having paid a man's price for a peace that is only bought by those who love to be free.

So today we dedicate ourselves and this emblem to their memory and to the determination to carry on to the end that they shall have not died in vain, that the hopes of all of us may be realized, for an America where there will always be work to do, a greater future, unlimited opportunities for every man and woman to dream, to build, and to grow, as we shall keep America free from all pirates and aggressors who might hope again to loot the world.

There are those short-sighted people who have held that we could not longer accommodate the growth of science, technology, and mechanical power to the Bill of Rights and our form of government.

In a thousand factories and plants scattered across this continent engaged in defense work we have proved the foolishness of that fallacy.

Men's inventions cannot be of more value than men themselves. A man is always bigger and better than any machine he makes.

Those who would have you and me think that an irreconcilable conflict is created by our so-called machine age in which liberty must be sacrificed should not forget that we have fought for liberty. The dynamic forces which sustain economic security and progress in human comfort lie deep below the surface. They reach to those human impulses which are watered alone by freedom.

The initiative of men, their enterprise, the inspiration of thought, the determination to be free, flower in full only in the security of those rights established fundamentally by our fathers.

Liberty comes alone and lives alone where the hard-won rights of men are held unalienable. Where governments themselves may not infringe. Where governments are indeed but the mechanisms to protect and sustain these principles. Liberty comes to those who will fight for it. It is for this concept of a government of and for and by the people for which you are giving your all and your best. It is for this concept that America's sons and daughters have died and for which they stand ready to die today.

Those rights that made our fathers free men are in question. If they be not now the more carefully preserved, said John Eliot, they will render us to posterity less free, less worthy than our fathers.

We must recognize the fact that a world conspiracy of all the basest, foulest, most wicked criminals in history, saturated with a crazy determination to crush our civilization, threatens to stop all human progress, to destroy the work of centuries, to establish their new order over our dead bodies.

Against the aggressor hordes that affront and confront us we have—

"* * * set up our banners. We are not Ashamed to show the cause for which we fight.

* * * * *

"We are full slow to rouse; and deaf and blind
To danger till the day is almost lost;
Then, as one man, welded in heart and mind,
We fight to victory, and scorn the cost;
There is no foe we have not dared to meet,
And none we will not face—except defeat."

We proclaim our determination to emancipate ourselves, to uphold and defend the Constitution of the United States, to preserve and conserve all of those guaranteed liberties and freedoms for which it stands and shall forever stand; to save, safeguard, and transmit to posterity the democratic form of government that is ours, its principles of justice, freedom, and equality. To this end we dedicate ourselves, the undivided genius of our people, all we hold dear and sacred, with one duty, one desire, and an unbeatable determination to win this war.

The defense of the ideals of the founders of this Republic, and the maintenance of them constitute the only pure patriotism to which an American can lay claim or in defense of which lay down his life.

To the memory and in honor of those who have gone forth from this area to do or to die in order that liberty may live, we dedicate this honor roll.

No man knows what lies ahead of us as a nation or as individuals. We are pledged by all that is good, and honorable, and holy, to maintain the ideals of democracy. We are committed to something more than keeping possible invaders from our shores.

National defense means something more than helping friendly nations to keep our liberty.

We are bound by our love of life, and are on our sacred honor to keep alive in this Nation those ideals which have made America great. We should dedicate ourselves anew to an unending determination to make this country one in which all men shall have equal rights to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. We should consecrate ourselves to the end that this Government of ours shall continue to establish justice and make secure the blessings of liberty. We should highly resolve that this Government of ours shall not perish from the earth.

It is not to be overlooked, however, that even in victory the end for which the war is being fought could easily be lost because of the incompetency of leadership and unpreparedness for the peace to come. After all, what is the end for which the war is being fought? Let me answer the question by referring to a letter from a soldier overseas, which tells the story better than I could were I to try. He said: "We're headed straight for the open doors of hell, and when we get inside they'll slam 'em shut and lock 'em. Maybe I'll come out alive, and maybe I won't.

"I'll take that chance. I'll take it because I know now what I'm playing for over here. And it isn't marbles.

"I'm not fighting for the right to wait in line for my daily bread.

"I'm not using a bayonet and a knife to carve myself a hole where I'll hide in fear for the rest of my days.

"I'm not betting my life out here so anyone back there can tell me where and what and how to worship.

"I'm not outguessing madmen with machine guns in their hands for the privilege of being told what to say and when to say it.

"I'm fighting for freedom.

"I'm fighting for the things that made America the greatest place in the world to live in * * * that are going to keep America the greatest place in this world to live in.

"So don't anybody tell me I'll find America changed.

"Don't anybody tell me there's no future any more in America. Don't anybody tell me there's a ceiling on my opportunity to make a million or be President.

"Don't anybody tell me there's a bridle and bit waiting for me with my name on it!

"That's what took the humanity out of the men I'm up against now. And I don't want any part of it!

"I want to come back to the same America I left behind me * * * where our way of living has always brought us new and better things * * * and always will * * * the America where there's clean, hard work to do * * * where there's freedom, and justice, and opportunity for all * * * where, if you can think and plan and act on your own, there are no limits on how high you can rise, how far you can go.

"That's what I'm fighting for.

"That's America to me.

"Keep it that way until I come back!"

That is the burden of our responsibility on the home front.

All of us are rightly concerned as to what the world of tomorrow shall be. Certainly one has only to lift his eyes from the ground to see that the path which the Government should follow lies open before it and away from the roads which led us into this World War No. 2.

Every person knows today, whatever he thought yesterday, that the foreign policy of the United States has been based on isolationism, or was till our hands were forced by Japan.

That such policy has failed utterly and miserably is a foregone conclusion, and as Sumner Welles, Under Secretary of State, declared the other day, had we been willing to play our part in keeping the peace of the world since World War No. 1, the cost to us in life and treasure would have been an infinitesimal part of the cost required of us today.

We should have learned and are paying a terrible price to be educated to know that we cannot run away from our destiny.

Selfishness, fear, and ignorance wrote the Treaty of Versailles, kept us out of the League of Nations, prevented the founding of the World Court, prevented a lasting peace, and are responsible for the holocaust of today. It must not happen again.

To some people it seems that the League of Nations is the natural point of beginning for that reorganization and readjustment which experience has shown to be essential to make it the center of some form of that federal union which most certainly will have to be set up.

While others are opposed to the League on the ground that it is and would be at best a league of governments and not of peoples, such people favor an international confederation of nations to be regulated by international law enforced by an international police force.

All of us are resolved to win the war and to achieve a genuine and enduring peace. In order to establish a free world after the victory at arms is accomplished is a question which deserves the best thought of the most profound thinkers of the age, yet it can only be established and maintained by, and most largely will depend on the leadership and the policy of the United States. We cannot dodge our responsibility.

Most of the plans for peace start with the idea that the problem is one of power. This is a sound assumption. How to apply the power is the problem. Some believe that the maintenance of peace depends on some form of economic action—international cooperation—removal of economic restrictions on world trade, and equal access to raw materials. Others emphasize social justice and social security. Another group stresses the importance of psychological and spiritual forces, education, creation of world opinion, development of international morality, revival of religion. Still others pin their faith chiefly to institutions of democracy, the growth of law, and respect for it, or wider recourse to arbitration and conciliation. Many think that peace can be assured by special measures applied to Germany as the most dangerous actual or potential breeding place of wars. As the old fellow used to say at the Dog River Valley Fair, "You pays your money, you takes your choice," for there are over a dozen tentative plans which have been promulgated and 26 different groups working on post-war planning. What we must bear in mind, as I see it, is that we must not be diverted from our objective, which is to win the war at the earliest possible moment and at whatever the cost.

As for me, if you are interested to know what I personally believe, I shall support the program to establish some international organization which can by force if necessary keep the peace.

Our fundamental national interest after victory at arms is the establishment of our national security to safeguard and promote the political, economic, social, and spiritual or moral (call it as you like it) well-being of this Nation and of all the nations.

We must establish some system of organized international cooperation for the maintenance of peace based upon the willingness of the cooperating nations to use force if necessary to keep the peace. There must be no question that adequate and appropriate means are provided and are always available and will be used if and when any aggressor nation starts a fight. We must be unitedly strong enough to do it and uniformly determined that there shall be an end put to war. Whatever it may cost us as a price to preserve the peace.

We must insist upon the preservation of our old freedom, keep our standard of living, and our American way of life to the fullest possible extent. Then bend every effort to lead or to cooperate to create a law-abiding, war-free, just society. This is the mission which America has in the world, and we should and shall fulfill it in God's good time.

It is no time for a blueprint. As the Negro preacher said, "We may arguefy and spectify to our hearts' content, but we cannot specify," until we know, for example, what Russia's peace terms will be, or what plans China has for its own development—or until, in fact, our partners have had a chance to examine and to approve the specifications and the articles of association on the basis of which the partnership is to be established. But seeing the world in shambles, business destroyed, homes broken by the millions, millions sick in body and mind, and other millions whose careers have been interrupted, everywhere the peacetime pursuits of more than a billion people transformed into war effort, while the total war bill rolls on and up and will reach close to half a trillion dollars, the American people will not undertake to stop historical evolution, avoid, evade, or to escape their destiny or to shirk the responsibility of their mission.

Saving the best we have and can, we will go ahead to build a new and a better social, political, and economic society, nearer to our heart's desire, based on American leadership, maintained by American power, and dedicated to freedom.

But do not be too optimistic. This is a fight to the finish that we are in. We are surrounded right here at home by clamorous political experimenters, social uplifters, and vigorous radicals who have little respect for the past, and whose chief concern for the future is to make it as different as possible from the present. Their aim is to tear up everything by the roots, to destroy all that has been done, and to begin all over again.

Such a program as they advocate both openly and insidiously is as un-American, unintelligent, and as unpractical as it is dangerous.

If we let the world be turned over to them, it will for an indefinite period be a regimented and government-controlled world, ruled by force, either economic or military, or both. The choice of today will determine the character of the world tomorrow.

Our responsibility will not be lightened "Till the lights go on again all over the world."

Rights of Servicemen

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM H. STEVENSON
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 3, 1944

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to set forth further answers to questions about the rights of service men and women and their dependents, so that my people will be fully informed as to these matters.

Question. Are officers, Army nurses, warrant officers, or cadets, U. S. M. A., entitled to a family allowance for their relatives or dependents?

Answer. No. The benefits of this act are limited to enlisted men and women, and aviation cadets.

Question. Are enlisted members of the Women's Army Corps eligible?

Answer. Yes; they may apply for a family allowance for dependent children, dependent husbands, and also for dependent parents, brothers, and sisters.

Question. May a man or woman who is eligible for a family allowance also authorize a class E allotment of pay?

Answer. Yes; and many do authorize such an allotment of pay on behalf of dependents, in addition to the family allowance, in order to provide added security.

Question. If a dependent is in a hospital or institution may payment of the family allowance be made to some other person or to the institution, for the credit of that dependent?

Answer. Yes; if the applicant desires that payment be made to a person other than the entitled relative or dependent, or to an institution, for the credit of that dependent, the name and address of such person or institution will be entered on the application in the proper location. The Office of Dependency Benefits will determine whether or not the payee designated is the proper person to receive payment.

Question. Will photostatic copies of documentary evidence be accepted?

Answer. Yes, if properly certified.

Question. What happens to a family allowance in effect when a man is reported missing, missing in action, beleaguered, besieged, captured, or interned?

Answer. It is continued, subject to right of the serviceman to terminate it if dependents receiving it are other than wife, child, or former wife divorced. They may be in a position to exercise this right if interned or captured, and able to establish contact with the O. D. B. If dependents are not receiving a family allowance at the time, and are eligible, they may apply for this benefit on the official form, W. D., AGO Form No. 625.

NOTE.—In cases of extreme need, dependents may apply for dependency allotments of pay under Public Law 490 in addition to the family allowance. For information about dependency allotments of pay, write to your Congressman, WILLIAM H. STEVENSON, House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

Question. When a dependent dies, what should be done with a check or checks sent to the deceased dependent after death, or uncashed at time of death?

Answer. Such check or checks should be returned to the Office of Dependency Benefits, Newark 2, N. J. A new check—covering all amounts of a family allowance uncollected at the time of dependent's death—will be written to an appropriate payee as determined by the O. D. B.

Question. If payments for two or more dependents are included in one check and one such dependent dies before the check is cashed, should survivors try to cash this check?

Answer. No. Such a check should be returned to the O. D. B. A new check will be drawn covering the amounts due surviving payees. Amounts due deceased payee will be paid to an appropriate payee designated by the O. D. B.

If you have any further questions, please feel free to write your Congressman, WILLIAM H. STEVENSON, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Unheralded Feat of Our Merchant Marine

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. B. W. (PAT) KEARNEY
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 3, 1944

Mr. KEARNEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Morning Call, of Paterson, N. J.:

UNHERALDED FEAT OF OUR MERCHANT MARINE

Congressman CANFIELD'S daring trip to England as a crewman incognito of a merchant-marine tanker, to view first hand the activities of the United States merchant marine, has focused long belated public attention on the heroic role those mighty lifeliners of the sea have played on the road to victory.

Mr. CANFIELD, before leaving on his adventurous investigating mission as a member of the important Congressional Committee on Merchant Marine, had expressed the belief that this vital and dauntless arm of our Nation's armed services, so essential in keeping our Atlantic and Pacific lifelines moving to our boys at the front, had not been fittingly recognized by the Government. So as a practical idealist he decided to see for himself, which he did in one of the most unique ways of congressional history.

While his report to Congress will not be ready for some time, the Morning Call is confident, that what he saw was more than sufficient to confirm his belief, and prove our unwavering faith in the rugged patriotism of the United States merchant marines based upon our personal knowledge of a number of these grizzled veterans of the deep, officers and seamen alike.

Well earned and fully merited then is the war risk bonus recently obtained for merchant seamen, representing financial compensation for the performance of extraordinary duty. How perilous have been their tours of duty through submarine and mine-infested waters momentarily beckoning death, which monetary reward, however, can little repay, the long casualty lists offer mute but glowing testimony. Yes, long before Pearl Harbor our merchant marines were in the thick of the fight.

Now thanks to our regenerated Navy, the hazards of this seafaring arm of our military might, though still constant, are on the wane. With a reported loss up to the end of May of 5,727 merchant seamen, we can be thankful for the present definite improvement now confirmed by President Roosevelt and Prime Minister Churchill in their joint report on the antisubmarine campaign for the month of June, showing that merchant vessel losses for last month were below their most hopeful calculations.

In an analysis of this loss of life among our merchant marines, the Metropolitan Life Insurance Co., referring to the offensive and defensive allied activities which have progressively improved the situation, says:

"There was the constant patrolling of the sea lanes by the Allied navies on the hunt for Axis submarines. On the defensive side, there has been the most effective use of naval escorts * * * and the creation of new and advanced bases for reconnaissance." The civilian mind cannot fathom the amount of vigilance, effort, and sacrifice which has gone into "sub-busting" or evaluate the military dividends derived. Our merchant service has been a vital factor in this regard, being directly responsible for preventing many an enemy-inspired disaster at sea.

As a result of this admirable teamwork between our merchant marines and the Navy, the enemy sea raiders have lost their deadly punch of the past 2 years and thousands of lives have been saved from a watery grave not only of seamen, but also of soldiers on their way across the sea to come to grips with the Axis demons of hate and destruction who would enslave the world. The United States merchant marine has played a noble role, but now that our maritime strength is approximating its peak and new ships are coming off the ways, the need for new crews to man this now greatest of all fleets is one of the pressing war problems of today, and it must be promptly met to keep our ocean life lines running full speed ahead to our invading armies of liberation.

So we urge our Government to take immediate action to further encourage and stimulate new enlistments in the United States merchant marine whose war record of this war marks one of the proudest achievements in maritime history.

Rights of Servicemen

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM H. STEVENSON
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 3, 1944

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to set forth further answers to questions regarding the rights of men and women in the service and their dependents, so that my people will be fully informed as to these matters.

Question. May a wife apply for a family allowance if her husband has made no arrangements for it?

Answer. Yes; if he is an enlisted man or an aviation cadet. She should fill out W. D., AGO Form No. 625, and attach required evidence. The application may be approved with or without his consent.

There is one exception. If she is the wife of an enlisted man in one of the first three grades and her husband already has made a monetary allowance in lieu of quarters in effect—either for herself or other dependents—which he wishes to continue instead of the family allowance, she will receive no family allowance.

Question. If the class A dependents of a serviceman make application for a family allowance, and he thinks they should not be granted an allowance because of special circumstances, can he appeal for relief from the requirement of providing a family allowanee for them?

Answer. There is no way in which the serviceman may control an application made by or on behalf of an eligible class A dependent. Section 104 of Public Law 625, Seventy-seventh Congress, states:

A monthly family allowance shall be granted and paid by the United States to the class A dependent or dependents of any such enlisted man upon written application to the department concerned made by such enlisted man or made by or on behalf of such dependent or dependents.

Question. If a serviceman with a wife and children is divorced by his wife while he is in the Army, and she is decreed alimony, will the family allowance be reduced?

Answer. Family allowance for former wife divorced will be reduced from $50 a month to a sum up to $42. Payments for divorced wife and children will be governed by divorce decree.

Question. If a serviceman remarries, will his second wife receive a family allowance?

Answer. Yes; she will receive the full monthly payment for a lawful wife, $50. The amount of her family allowance is not affected by the fact that the former wife receives a family allowance. Nor will former wife's family allowance or that of her children be affected by his remarriage.

Question. If a serviceman has several children living in his own household and/or in the household of a former wife divorced—or a separated wife—will each child receive monthly payments?

Answer. Yes. Under joint Army and Navy regulations governing administration of the Servicemen's Dependents Allowance Act of 1942, as amended, total sum of family allowance payments for all children of a soldier will be divided equally among them.

Question. If a woman has entered into a common-law marriage in a State where such marriages are recognized, and is at present receiving a family allowance, would she be eligible for this allowance if she moved to a State where common-law marriages are not recognized?

Answer. Yes. Eligibility for family allowance payments is not affected by such a change of residence.

Question. Are all enlisted men in the first three grades—staff sergeant, technical sergeant, first sergeant, and master sergeant—required to contribute to a family allowance for their wives and other class A dependents?

Answer. Yes. A family allowance for class A dependents of a soldier in any one of the three higher grades is compulsory if such dependents request it and if the enlisted man has made no monetary allowance in lieu of quarters for dependents—in effect on or applied for before November 1, 1943—on behalf of his wife, children, and/or other dependents. If he has made such monetary allowance, he may elect to continue it instead of applying for a family allowance, or to discontinue it in favor of a family allowance. He may not have both. Nor may any soldier request a monetary allowance in lieu of quarters for dependents after November 1, 1943. The family allowance is the only benefit for dependents for which enlisted men are eligible after that date, except as stated above.

If you have any further questions, please write your Congressman, WILLIAM H. STEVENSON, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C. I will be glad to help you.

Let Us Have More Farmers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES E. McKENZIE

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 3, 1944

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, the enclosed editorial from the Louisiana Farm Bureau News of July 1944 should be of interest to the whole Nation. With rural electrification, better housing, and better roads farm life is much more attractive than urban life and so much more wholesome. It is our job to see that the farmers of these United States get these farm improvements; also that the farmer gets a decent wage for his toil in the form of better marketing conditions and better prices. We must encourage diversification, better balanced farms which will produce much of the necessities of life for the farm family with a surplus to sell to the industrial and urban families, providing the money to buy the things that industry and commerce have to sell. Then and only then will we have a balanced and self-sufficient economy. Yes, indeed, give us more farmers but make farm life both attractive, convenient, and profitable.

LET'S HAVE MORE FARMERS

Any post-war planning which does not provide for the quick return of several millions of returning service men to the farm will be a colossal mistake. Regardless of the fact that no civilian goods have been manufactured for nearly 4 years, and that there will be an enormous demand for the things which we have had to do without, it will be practically impossible for industry to adjust itself to pre-war conditions and absorb more than one-third or one-half of the men and women who will be looking for jobs when the war finally comes to an end.

The farm is the greatest and most important of all industries. The farm is the food factory of the world. If the farm were to close down, hunger would stalk the Nation. We could get along without radios, refrigerators, washing machines and automobiles, but we cannot get along without food. Food is grown on the farm—there is no other place for large scale operations in the production of something for people to eat.

But, first, the farm and farm life must be made more attractive than it has ever been before. Drudgery must be taken out of farm life if we ever hope to get any large number of our returning soldiers back to our food, feed and fiber factories.

Our cities are filled with men and women who would willingly swap city life for farm life if they could have some of the conveniences city life affords. They are not going back to coal oil lamps, bored wells, washing tubs and washboards.

They want and are entitled to all the electrically operated labor-saving devices which go to take drudgery out of farm work. They want radios, refrigerators, washing machines, electric irons, water systems, milking machines, chicken brooders, feed grinders, wood saws, shop tools, ice-cream freezers, stoves, percolators, toasters, etc., and they are entitled to all these things. They are not only entitled to them but they must be supplied before any number of our people can be induced to seriously consider taking up farming as a permanent vocation.

More rural electric lines and cheap power is the one best way to check disintegration of the farm home and farm life. No man with a mental picture of his old mother scrubbing clothes and drawing water from a deep well looks with favor upon going back to such conditions.

Put city conveniences in the rural home; give a man a car or a truck to get his produce to the city market; keep the country from being considered a thing apart from the city, and, with surroundings most people love, the country home will beckon as it never has before.

Freedom of action in growing crops and animals, and the joy of carrying out a plan of its own is worth a lot to any family. Cash income is important, and the farmer can always have it, but it is by no means the only measure of living.

Plenty of fresh vegetables, fruits, eggs, milk, home-cured meat, fried chicken at will, with an ice box to keep things cold and good, certainly tops off any city dweller's prospects.

Who would trade the joys a well-ordered country home offers for a hemmed-in home in a crowded, bustling city, where the rule is "every man for himself and the devil take the hindmost"?

New Roads to Rome

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. GLENN BEALL

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 3, 1944

Mr. BEALL. Mr. Speaker, James Patrick McGovern, a former captain in the A. E. F. during the First World War, and a member of Bethesda-Chevy Chase Post, No. 105 of the American Legion, Department of Maryland, has composed a poem which reflects such a basic spiritual force as mankind must cherish if civilization is to survive—let alone to advance. He has titled it "New Roads to Rome," and is dedicating it to the national welfare. Pursuant to unanimous consent granted by the House, I now present the verses for publication in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, as follows:

NEW ROADS TO ROME

Kaleidoscope of law, religion, art,
And every mortal trial of state and man,
Rome, great theme for every human heart,
Now owes high promise to the American.
Columbus, Genoese, sailed the broad West,
Our arms today crusade by Eastern sands—
Strange wheel of fortune: In true freedom's quest
We turn back Goths and Huns, new heathen bands.
Brave as our legions, be our councils wise
To lay the cornerstone of stable peace
On such foundations as in Rome still rise
Of Christianity's undying lease.
War would ever be a fugitive
If only Christ among us all might live.

—James Patrick McGovern.

Another Big, Big Blunder, Governor Dewey

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. BUELL SNYDER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 3, 1944

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, in Governor Dewey's acceptance speech at Chicago he belittled the memory of that great soul, Woodrow Wilson. He said in that speech:

No organization for peace will last if it is slipped through by stealth, trickery, or the momentary hypnotism of high-sounding phrases. * * * That is too much to ask in the name of those who have died for the future of our country; this is no task for men who specialize in dividing our people; it is no task to be entrusted to stubborn men, grown old and tired and quarrelsome in office. We learned that in 1919.

Too bad that a candidate for Presidency of the United States would make such a remark—he can never live it down—and I here quote David Lawrence's answer to Mr. Dewey's slur on Woodrow Wilson, taken from July 7 issue of the United States News:

This is a gratuitous slur at the memory of Woodrow Wilson. It is inaccurate and is an evidence of superficiality. It is to be hoped that Governor Dewey will read the real history of 1919 and not be swayed by the Republican isolationists who would like now to blame President Wilson for the destructive job which the Republicans in the Senate under Senator Lodge in 1919 did in wrecking the noble efforts made by an American President to set up the foundations of world peace.

AN OPPORTUNITY TO WIN VOTES OF INDEPENDENTS

The boys who are dying in France today would not have been asked to make that supreme sacrifice if the Government of the United States—under Republican administrations between 1920 and 1933—had unequivocally supported the League of Nations and had shown by example to the craven politicians of Britain and France that the United States would use force if necessary to keep the peace and avoid a second world war.

Zionist Organization of America Receives Highest Treasury Award in War Bond Drive

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SOL BLOOM

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 3, 1944

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herein the following addresses delivered by Dr. Israel Goldstein and the Honorable William C. Fitzgibbon at the presentation of the United States Treasury Department's highest citation, on July 31, 1944, to the Zionist Organization of America for its accomplishments in the recent War bond drive:

ADDRESS BY WILLIAM C. FITZGIBBON, SPECIAL ASSISTANT TO THE SECRETARY, UNITED STATES TREASURY DEPARTMENT

Sixty-five million fighting Zionist dollars have gone to war. Under the generalship of President Rabbi Israel Goldstein, the Zionist Organization of America mobilized for a campaign to sell $25,000,000 worth of War bonds during the month of June. Edmund I. Kaufman acted as national chairman of the drive, and Ernest E. Barbarash was his chief lieutenant in charge of operations.

If you had attained your objective, $25,000,000, that would have been an outstanding success. Had you doubled your quota and raised $50,000,000, that would have been a superb accomplishment. But you didn't stop at $25,000,000 or at $50,000,000, you pressed on and on until your sales of War bonds reached better than $65,000,000. What a record! Emblazon it upon your scroll; point to it with patriotic pride, and challenge any other organization of like size to top that achievement.

Little wonder it is that the United States Treasury Department wishes to honor you with its official citation for distinguished services rendered in behalf of the War Financing program. How befitting those words are to the Zionist Organization of America: Distinguished—superior in ability, achievement and character; service—work done for another. The investments you made in War Savings bonds were not for yourselves alone; they were a service to the men and women in our armed forces; to your fellow citizens at home, and to all liberty-loving peoples throughout the world. You served humanity by helping to provide the means by which to save civilization from destruction. Distinguished services rendered. Inside that word rendered, we find the spirit of democracy, for rendered means to give in return—to pay for something owed or due. We in America are blessed with freedom, independence and prosperity because our people fought at Bunker Hill, Valley Forge, Gettysburg and Chateau-Thierry, that we might enjoy liberty. For this priceless heritage, we are indebted to our forebearers, and the only way we can hallow their memory is to give of ourselves in service to the cause for which they gave their lives. Thus do we deserve to be cited for distinguished services rendered. This, the Zionist Organization of America, its officers and members have done summa cum laude.

As on the field of battle, so on the home front citations are awarded in recognition of heroic deeds. Such citations do not retire their recipients from active duty, but rather inspire them to greater patriotic service. Likewise, Mr. President, this official Treasury citation awarded to the Zionist Organization of America, and so richly deserved, will, I am confident, be cherished as a memento commemorating a most successful war effort, and also, as a commission for even greater patriotic service.

ADDRESS BY DR. ISRAEL GOLDSTEIN, PRESIDENT OF THE ZIONIST ORGANIZATION OF AMERICA

It is with humble gratitude that I accept on behalf of the Zionist Organization of America this citation from the Treasury Department of the United States. When the Zionist Organization of America undertook a War-bond quota of $25,000,000 for the month of June we made a conservative estimate on the basis of last year's precedent. Our actual achievement, however, is nearly three times the quota we took, being in excess of $65,000,000. This is the largest amount raised in any single Jewish organization in the United States. It is proper that the Zionist Organization of America should take the lead seeing that its membership of 120,000 makes it the largest Jewish membership organization.

Our members, like all Americans, have been stimulated by the success of our armed forces overseas, in the Pacific as well as in Italy and France. Close to 500,000 Jewish boys are fighting in the American forces. Many thousands of whom are among the dead and wounded. The least that we their kin back home can do is to provide the tools for victory. Thus we have endeavored to do and shall continue to do by our War-bond purchases.

We cherish the hope that it will not be long before the Nazi yoke will be broken in Europe and soon thereafter, the Japanese stranglehold upon the Far East. When Europe will be liberated the full story of the Jewish part in the victory will be revealed, the 600,000 Jews in the armies of Soviet Russia, the 100,000 in the armed forces of Great Britain and the countless thousands in the guerilla forces and underground group of Poland, France, Yugoslavia, and other occupied lands. With special pride we point to the war record of the Jewish community in Palestine. Without conscription but by voluntary enlistment more than 30,000 men, representing 25 percent of its male population of military age, are serving in the armed forces, Palestine Jewish soldiers have led in military assignments in Lybia, Syria, and Crete, which involved the greatest peril and called for the greatest daring and ingenuity. Behind them is the Jewish home front in Palestine contributing through hard working agriculture and industry much needed supplies of food, clothing, machine parts, and repair facilities.

No people has made a heavier contribution to the victory of the United Nations, in proportion to its membership, and no people has suffered so heavy a toll. More than half of the Jews of occupied Europe have been exterminated. No other people has suffered civilian casualties in such degree.

The victory of the United Nations will come too late to bring the dead back to life, but it is not too late to rescue many thousands now in Hungary and in other satellite countries who, under the shadow of defeat, may be persuaded to release great numbers of Jews. It is now up to the United Nations to persuade surrounding neutral countries to provide temporary asylum, guaranteeing the cost of temporary maintenance and also guaranteeing permanent resettlement after the war. Now that the International Red Cross has informed us that the only obstacle is the availability of visas, the duty incumbent upon the United Nations is obvious. The United Nations will also have to persuade Turkey to permit large numbers of Jews to transit for Palestine. Most of all, it is up to England to open the doors of Palestine for as many as can get there.

Looking to the permanent solution of the problem of Jewish homelessness in Europe, Palestine is the only place which will be fit economically, psychologically, socially, and culturally to absorb a large immigration. In order to provide for both the spiritual and physical needs of the Jewish people, Palestine must become a Jewish commonwealth. Only the Jewish people can make Palestine big enough to serve the needs of the Jewish people, without dislocating any of its Arab inhabitants. The establishment of Palestine as a Jewish commonwealth is post-war aim No. 1 of the Jewish people. No matter how great the military victory of the United Nations may be, the war will not have been won on the moral side unless this measure of justice will have been achieved.

That American public opinion understands and appreciates and favorably regards this aim is abundantly attested by the Palestine plank which both the Republican and the Democratic Parties have recently included in their platforms.

American Zionists pledge their lives and the lives of their children, their substance, and their sacred honor to the speeding of the victory which will bring liberation to all the oppressed of earth.

The success of our War bond campaign is due to the able direction of its chairman, Mr. Edmund I. Kaufmann, the results of whose efforts have reemphasized the readiness of our people to give practical and tangible expression to their patriotism; and, above all, to the regional and district leaders, war effort committee chairmen, and key workers who carried on the drive. The response of our members and their friends has surpassed all expectations.

Free Doctor and Hospital Care for Wives and Infants of Servicemen

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM H. STEVENSON

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 3, 1944

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, free maternity care for wives of men in military and naval service, and free medical and nursing care for their babies is now provided through the Wisconsin State Board of Health as a result of money given to this State by Congress.

Under this plan, a wife of a man who is in the lower four ranks of the service may receive prenatal care from a qualified doctor at her home or at the doctor's office. These lower four ranks include in the Army: Private, private first class, corporal, and sergeant; in the Navy it includes men in the seventh to the fourth pay grade.

At childbirth, whether the wife of the man in service stays at home or goes to a hospital, she and her baby can receive free medical and nursing care. Complete maternity care is provided, including a physical examination 6 weeks after the baby is born. Besides all this, the baby is entitled to free medical care during the first year of life.

IMPORTANT TO FOLLOW RULES

Wives of servicemen should acquaint themselves thoroughly with the rules set down for this free medical attention. The rules set down in Wisconsin are clearly stated and must be met in order to receive this care and service. The wife should see her doctor for an application form to apply for this free service. If the doctor does not have these blanks, write to Bureau of Maternal and Child Health, Wisconsin State Board of Health, Madison, Wis., and ask them to rush a blank to you. Fill out the application blank carefully. Be sure to include your husband's serial number. The wife fills in part 1 of the blank. Ask your doctor to fill in part 2 at once and rush to Madison for approval.

APPLY EARLY

It is important that wives apply for this early. The State board of health will not approve payment of the doctor, hospital, or any service before the application is made out. In case of an emergency be sure that the doctor makes application for you within 48 hours after the service is rendered. If the application is not made no bills for medical or hospital service will be paid. It is most important, therefore, to get the application filled out and sent in at the earliest possible time. See your doctor and apply for this free service.

Wives can see their regular family doctor for this. It is not necessary to go to a special or certain doctor to get this aid. It is most important that wives of servicemen remember that no payment for any such service will be made prior to the filing of an application. In other words, no application—no aid. It is tragic to be refused this aid simply because no application was made beforehand.

CHARGES PAID THROUGH STATE BOARD OF HEALTH

The charges for this medical, hospital, and surgical attention are paid through the Bureau of Maternal and Child Health, Wisconsin State Board of Health, Madison, Wis. The charges are paid directly to the hospital and the doctor and the nurse. No serviceman's wife need worry about proper medical care, infant care, or hospital care if she acquaints herself with this free service and makes proper application before the event rather than after.

WHAT WIVES CAN EXPECT

First. Complete medical service for maternity patients during the prenatal period, for childbirth and 6 weeks thereafter—including care for the newborn infant.

Second. Health supervision for infants.

Third. Nursing care, in the home, through the local health department, including bedside nursing care necessary for the mother—before, during, and after childbirth, and for the baby during the first year of life.

Fourth. Hospital care, in wards, or at ward rates, for maternity patients and infants. These funds cannot be used in part payment for more expensive hospital accommodations. A minimum stay of 10 days in the hospital after childbirth is arranged if possible. Hospital care may be authorized in any hospitals where the maternity and pediatric services have been approved by the State health agency.

Remember that this service is available only to the wives of the men who are in the four lower ranks of service. It does not apply to the wives of commissioned officers or to the wives of the higher-ranking noncommissioned officers.

CONGRESS SET UP THIS SERVICE

I want servicemen's wives to know about this help that Congress has provided for them. Should any questions arise, ask your doctor or nurse about it; and if they do not have the information, write your Congressman, WILLIAM H. STEVENSON, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Farmers Come Through Again

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SOL BLOOM

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 3, 1944

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by the Honorable Marvin Jones, War Food Administrator, over the Mutual Network, Wednesday, August 2, 1944, at 10:15 p. m., entitled "Farmers Come Through Again." Judge Jones gave an inspiring message in his address last night, when he told how one of the greatest production achievements of our entire war effort has been made by the Nation's farmers and ranchers. Every American has reason to be proud of the splendid accomplishments listed in his speech.

I have recently returned from a trip out through the great farm areas of the United States. What I saw out there is of such importance to everyone of us in this whole country—and even to much of the rest of the world today—that I want to report to the public on what I saw and what it means.

This war is a production war. We have known from the beginning that victory would depend on production—and the almost unbelievable production records that we have made, the goals that have been reached and exceeded, are proof enough that victory will be ours. We have produced planes and tanks and guns and munitions of every kind beyond anything that was thought possible before the war. But one of the most outstanding production feats of all these, one of the greatest production achievements of our entire war effort, has been made by the Nation's farmers and ranchers. It is inspiring to see the tanks and planes rolling off the assembly lines of our arsenal of democracy, but it is equally inspiring to see what I saw on my trip, the equally amazing production now under way on our farms.

I wish that our 11,000,000 soldiers and sailors could see what I have seen, so that they would know that they will continue to be the best fed army in the world. I wish that every man, woman, and child in the United States could see the record-breaking crops and harvest which the long hours and skill and the hard work of our farmers and their families have produced again this year. And finally, I wish that the misguided war lords of Germany and Japan could see this tremendous harvest and production, so that they would realize now the total hopelessness of their attack against a nation of such resources and a people of such determination as ours. If they could see what I have just now seen, they would give up and stop more quickly this unhappy war, knowing that their defeat is inevitable.

Down in the southern portions of the Great Plains where the wheat harvest was then in full swing, they were gathering the greatest wheat crop ever produced in this or any other country in all history. Last fall much of that country was dry and it looked as though wheat yields would be low. It was wise to play safe, and all our efforts were to guard carefully our food and feed supply and get the last full pound of results from every pound of feed we had. But nature was kind, and the combination of favorable weather and the hard work and skill of the farmers and their families brought record yields and a tremendous harvest. They tell me that our wheat production this year will be not only a record, but more than a hundred million bushels greater than we have ever produced before.

But the big crop itself was not all that I saw. I saw the tremendous job of handling it, which is a challenge to the genius of America, and an impressive spectacle in itself. Farmers and their families, old and young, men and women, boys and girls, people from the cities and towns were working early and late to get in the crop. I saw one 10-year-old boy operating a tractor and combine. I saw one farm woman in Kentucky who has worked her tractor day and night, not only taking care of her own crops but plowing and cultivating for her neighbors. Boys and girls in their early teens and hundreds of thousands of women are doing man-sized jobs with their hands and with machines. Many soldiers were helping with the harvest on short periods of leave.

We have read with amazement and with pride of the tremendous marshaling of mechanized equipment on the embattled beaches of Normandy and we are justly proud of the organization that mobilized these machines of war and drove them on. But this year, in our own country, a great battalion of large combines was shipped down from the North, mobilized and equipped—and on the D-day of harvest they began their long march through the wheat fields of the Southwest to follow the harvest northward across the country to the Canadian border on their own mechanized march to victory.

The big crop has added to the wartime burdens of the railroads. More freight cars have been needed to move the grain to terminal storage elevators, and more and more men have been needed to unload them. It is customary in the Southwest to pile some wheat on the ground temporarily at harvest time. But this year it has been heaped in the fields and along the railroad sidings and stored in temporary bins—and in one small town I saw a paved street roped off and piled high with wheat. But our record-breaking wheat crop will, I am sure, be moved and stored in ample time to prevent loss.

I mention these incidents as illustrations of the initiative and the hard work and the problems that are a part of our victory on the home front. All these, along with the uncertainties of weather, are a part of the business of producing food, which we too often take for granted.

Now what does this wheat crop mean? It means one more assurance of plenty for our armed forces and for all of us on the home front. It means greater assurance, too, for our fighting allies and for the people of occupied countries who will look to us for a part of their food needs when they have been liberated. The fact that the wheat crop is so much larger than was expected a few months ago means that more wheat will be available for feed for livestock than had been anticipated. The most important feed grain is corn, of course, and the size of this year's corn crop will largely determine the amount of milk and meat and eggs that we can have this year and the next. The prospects now are for another corn crop near the 3,000,000,000-bushel mark, although it is still too early in the season to count on it for sure.

The wheat and corn prospects are not by any means the only bright spots in the agricultural production picture this year. We have another big hay crop this year and that's important to our livestock industry. The prospects now are for another big soybean crop from which we get feed for livestock as well as a large part of the vegetable oil for human consumption and industrial uses. The prospects now are for another big potato crop—bigger than the production of most recent years although not quite as large as last year. Commercial vegetable acreage gives promise of turning out a larger volume than last year. Livestock numbers, especially cattle, are very large. Our farms and ranches are teeming with cattle in much larger numbers than ever before. The number of cattle now on farms is 15,000,000 greater than the 1935–39 average and nearly 8,000,000 greater than the high point of the previous cattle cycle in 1934.

These are some of the things that one sees out in the great ranch-and-farm areas of our country today. They cause us who are concerned with the Nation's food supply to give serious and sober thought to what it means.

It means one thing which I never tire of repeating. That is that the craftsmanship and the skill and the patriotism and the hard work of the American farmer and his family can be depended upon to meet the challenge of production, given normal growing conditions and prices which will enable him to carry on. The more I see our farmers and their families at work, the more I marvel at their remarkable job of conversion to war production.

It was fortunate that we had these first two ingredients of food production—namely, good weather and the kind of farmer that we have. It was equally fortunate that we had for them a system of support prices and that we had these long enough ahead of planting and breeding time, so that the skill of our farmers and the bounties of nature could proceed to extend for 1 more year the long stretch of 7 years of record-breaking production.

There are two reasons why price supports have been important to everyone in America. First, they have given farmers the assurance they must have to plan for and to produce so far beyond their normal output. When goals were established for production of guns and planes and tanks and the thousands of other items of equipment needed to fight a global war, the Government made contracts with manufacturers on a price basis. When war needs demanded a third more food than peacetime production the Government said in effect to farmers, "Increase your production to meet these war needs and on every commodity for which an increase is asked, the Government will guarantee that you get a reasonable price." Price supports are the farmers' counterpart of the manufacturer's war contract.

The second reason why price supports are important to everyone is that by helping to get abundant production they help to make workable the wartime program to control prices and prevent inflation. A black market cannot be maintained in a commodity that is plentiful.

During the last war, some foods sold for extremely high prices—eggs, for example. Some people have wondered why eggs didn't sell at very low prices at times when supplies have been very large during this war. But the reason why eggs have been so plentiful at times is that there are price supports on eggs for farmers. These price supports which have assured more abundant production have made it possible for consumers to buy eggs at more reasonable prices on the average throughout the year. Those of you who remember the price of eggs during the last war will remember that eggs have been more reasonable and more plentiful during this war. But for the plentiful supply of eggs it might have been very difficult to prevent black market operations and dollar-a-dozen eggs in the black market.

In wartime when the demand is so great for so many farm commodities, farmers couldn't be expected to continue producing eggs abundantly if they had to take a loss on abundant production. And so the price support and price stabilization programs work hand in hand to protect consumers against extremely high prices and protect farmers against extremely low prices. And, at the same time, they have helped farmers to produce the abundance we all are enjoying now.

In the case of some foods there will occasionally be some temporary oversupplies. In order to be sure to have enough we must sometimes expect to have too much. But I am sure that no one would be optimistic enough to hope that such a tremendous production effort could be so well geared and so delicately controlled that every goal could be exactly reached in spite of all the hazards of war and the uncertainties of weather. I am sure too, that if criticism comes, farmers would rather it would be for having too much rather than for having too little.

We do have abundant supplies of food. And having built up our wartime stocks of food during years when production was being increased to its present high level, there is no reason to suppose now that farmers will not be able to continue to supply us abundantly, barring unfavorable weather.

America owes the farmers of this country a debt of gratitude for the way they have come through on their job of producing food to win the war. Many farmers too are indebted to city people who have helped them in critical periods to harvest the crops. The work of our Victory gardeners and home canners has made a big difference in our fight for food.

In our war years we have seen a vast demonstration of the kind of accomplishment we can expect when everyone is doing his part. Our food situation is good and if we work at it in the future as we have in the past we can keep it that way.

Rights of Servicemen

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM H. STEVENSON

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 3, 1944

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to set forth further answers to questions regarding the rights of men and women in the service and their dependents so that my people will be fully informed as to these matters.

Question. Should the wife of a man overseas write to him concerning reinstatement of her family allowance if he has become eligible again?

Answer. No. She should write a letter to the O. D. B. stating, first, serviceman's name, present rank, and serial number; second, family allowance application number, if known; third, period of time during which she received family allowance; fourth, reason for discontinuance; fifth, request for reinstatement.

Question. Should wife requesting reinstatement send in documentary evidence again?

Answer. Not if she has submitted all required evidence. It will be a matter of permanent record at the O. D. B.

Question. Should a soldier in one of the first three grades who wishes to have a family allowance reinstated for his dependents file a second application for them?

Answer. No. He should write his commanding officer, stating facts of case.

Question. Is it compulsory for a serviceman to apply for a family allowance for his class B–1 or class B dependents?

Answer. A family allowance for eligible class B–1 or class B dependents is entirely optional with the serviceman and may be stopped at any time at his request.

Question. Are the dependent parents of a man in the Air Force eligible for a family allowance?

Answer. If the man is an enlisted man or an aviation cadet; yes. If he is a commissioned officer; no. An officer may, however, authorize a voluntary class E allotment of pay on their behalf, if he wishes to do so. The Air Force is a part of the Army.

Question. May a mother who worked in order to support her son prior to his entry in the Army—and is still working—receive a family allowance from him?

Answer. Such a case would have to be judged on its merits. She must prove that she is dependent upon her son in order to be eligible.

Question. May a mother with two sons in the service have a family allowance from each son?

Answer. Yes; provided she is dependent upon both of them at least to a substantial degree, and provided that each son desires to apply for a family allowance on her behalf. She may be dependent upon one son—and only one—for chief support and upon a second son for a substantial portion of her support. Or she may be dependent upon each son for a substantial portion of her support.

Question. What steps should she take to get this benefit from both sons?

Answer. She should request each son to apply on her behalf, as the family allowance will be payable only at his request or with his consent. She might supply each son with a dependency certificate, W. D., AGO Form, No. 620, properly filled out and signed by herself and by one witness to her signature. If the two sons desire to apply on her behalf, they may then attach these forms to their applications.

Question. A mother has sons and a daughter in the service, and a husband who is retired on a small income. May she receive a family allowance from any one of her children in the service?

Answer. Yes; provided she can prove dependency upon any one of them, and provided the child concerned consents to the authorization of this benefit.

Question. Under what authority does the O. D. B. change the rate of payment or discontinue a family allowance?

Answer. Under authority of the Servicemen's Dependents Allowance Act of 1942, as amended. This amendment provides increased payments for certain class A dependents, also for those parents, brothers, or sisters who rely upon the serviceman for their chief support, establishing these in a new class—class B–1. Under the law as amended, payments to those remaining in class B are fixed at a flat monthly rate of $37.

Question. If a dependent's family allowance payments have been reduced and the dependent is actually relying upon the serviceman for chief support, will the Office of Dependency Benefits reconsider the case upon request?

Answer. Yes. The dependent should write the O. D. B., Newark, N. J., giving full facts to establish claims of dependency. State amount of each item of living expenses such as rent, fuel, food, clothes, and medical bills—per month. Also, state monthly income from sources other than the family allowance. The O. D. B. is set up to authorize family allowances for those who are entitled to them and will review and redetermine any case wherein dependents had not originally supplied the O. D. B. with sufficient facts to support claims of dependency.

Question. If a dependent who has been in class B becomes dependent upon the serviceman for chief support, may she have payments increased? How?

Answer. Yes; payments may be increased. Dependent should write the O. D. B. for reconsideration of her case, giving an itemized statement of income and expenses.

Question. If a dependent's payments have been discontinued because of failure to return the dependency certificate to the O. D. B., will the case he reopened if this certificate is sent in now?

Answer. Yes. The O. D. B. will reconsider the case upon receipt of sufficient evidence to support claims of dependency, together with a letter requesting reconsideration.

The foregoing articles are of especial importance to the members of our armed forces, their parents, wives, and children, and to their dependents in general.

Be sure to keep these articles for future use and guidance. You will find them of inestimable value for years to come.

Mr. Speaker, I am happy to say that all the benefits for servicemen, their wives, mothers, children, and other relatives outlined in these articles and in the previous articles that I have set forth in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, were made possible by legislation passed by the Congress of the United States; and I am very glad to report to my people that as their representative in Congress, I worked for and voted for all the legislation passed by the Congress which made possible the benefits for our men and women in the armed service, their wives, mothers, and their children.

In the 4 years I have been in Congress, I am glad to report that more than 40,000 of my constituents have written to me for help and guidance in Federal matters.

I am happy to report further that I have worked to meet and fulfill every request. All these requests have received my personal attention. It has been the rule of my office to answer every letter or post card received by me within 24 hours after its receipt.

Your Congressman is your agent in Washington. If for any reason you have any problem with the Federal Government, you should write your Congressman. I invite the people in my district to write me and to call on me if and when you have any problem which relates to the Federal Government. Write your Congressman, WILLIAM H. STEVENSON, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Free Ports for Refugees

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SAMUEL DICKSTEIN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 3, 1944

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address entitled "Free Ports for Refugees," delivered by me over radio Station WMCA, July 5, 1944:

Every day as we move on to liberate the countries which the Nazis control, the enemy is enslaving and murdering thousands upon thousands of noncombatants. It started in Poland. I need not repeat to you the reports of the damage which the Germans inflicted there. Nor need I repeat to you how the Germans applied their science of destruction to the other countries of Europe—Norway and Denmark, to Holland, Belgium, and France, to Czechoslovakia and Yugoslavia. Latest victims of the German drive are their late collaborationists—the Bulgarians and the Hungarians. The Germans are now treating those Bulgarians and Hungarians precisely as they treated the Poles as long as there was a Poland to destroy.

For, according to Nazi principles, all who are not Nazis must become underlings; all who are not Germans must become subhumans; all who are useless to the Nazis must be killed. If Nazis cannot use you as a slave, either because you are too weak in muscle or too strong in character, they destroy you. Before they kill you they take away ever bit of our clothing. They strip you naked—children, women, and men. For the clothes of the dead are good enough, they say, for their slaves in factories and on farms.

Some of these victims of the Nazis managed to escape. Others will manage before we can get to Europe and stop this dreadful destruction of humanity. The refugees managed to get to Sweden, to Switzerland, to Spain and Portugal, to Turkey, and some reached the haven of even the fighting United Nations—Russia, England, and a very few, the United States.

This problem calls for a solution, but any solution offered at this time can be only a temporary one. It was with this idea in mind, that I introduced House Resolution 154, which I still believe would have been the most adequate answer to the problem. Some opposition developed, however, and I, therefore, introduced another resolution known as H. Res. 576. This resolution offers a temporary solution by way of so-called free ports.

The President of the United States created a War Refugee Board to afford relief to these victims, not only in this country but in other countries as well.

An American journalist, Samuel Grafton, who writes for the New York Post, the Washington Star, and many other great newspapers, suggests that we establish free ports in which to harbor such refugees temporarily—until the War Refugee Board and similar agencies get them permanent places to live.

These free ports for refugees would be exactly like the free ports for international merchandise. Goods come to our seaports. There they are put into bond in warehouses until they are re-exported. They do not enter our domestic commerce. They do not compete with the products from our farms and factories. They merely rest on a shelf, as it were. We supply the shelf, that is, the warehouse, that is, the free port—as an international convenience which costs us nothing.

Why not establish similar free ports for refugees. They would remain interned and segregated in such free ports, in such temporary havens, for the duration of the war. At the end of the period, they would be returned to the countries of their origin, or to those countries which would invite them—just as soon as we bring peace and order to Europe.

Remember that these human beings would be in transit, precisely like a batch of merchandise kept in customs bond on the free port of Staten Island.

Remember, too, that we have more than 200,000 Nazi prisoners of war in this country right now. They, too, are transients. As soon as the war ends we shall return them to central Europe where they were born. Every camp for prisoners of war in this country is a free port in the sense that I am advocating. The prisoners are treated well. But they may not leave their camp. Neither would the refugees be allowed to leave. But, this is the most important thing in the world today, the Nazis here are imprisoned, the refugees would be sheltered. Jail and asylum are diametrically opposite in spirit.

The milk of human kindness that flows through all our hearts makes it imperative that we do something definite for those European refugees, and do it with the greatest dispatch.

Quick and widespread was the response to this proposal of temporary shelters for refugees. Newspapers, magazines, national organizations, national leaders, throughout the land quickly applauded, quickly approved, quickly memorialized President Roosevelt to establish such havens forthwith.

The New York Times said editorially: "The plan has nothing to do with restricted or unrestricted immigration. It is simply a proposal to save the lives of innocent people."

The New York Herald Tribune said editorially: "The appeal represents one more expression of American anxiety that nothing be left undone in the effort to save as many innocent people as possible from the unspeakable brutality of the Nazis."

The Chicago Sun said: "We can hope that the Government can and will adopt the project."

The Asheville (N. C.) Citizen Times said: "Prisoners of war will not reside here after the war. It could be the same, if charity follows the counsel of wisdom, for the war refugees."

That leading Catholic weekly, the Commonwealth, urged: "Suppose we put our influence, whatever determination to help the refugees we have left, back of the plan."

And that liberal weekly, the New Republic, had this to comment: "The United States Government talks a lot about helping refugees from Hitler-occupied Europe; but thus far we have done almost nothing about it—build a few concentration camps along the eastern seaboard. Put the refugees into them with the understanding that they are to see no more of America than this, and will be sent somewhere else when the war is over. At least, they would not starve in Europe or use up precious cargo space for food on ships going to north Africa. If we refuse as a nation to do any more than this, then in the name of human decency, let us do no less."

Speaking for the National Farmers' Union of whom he is president, James G. Patton, pleaded with President Roosevelt: "I am confident, Mr. President, that if the American people were acquainted with the true facts of Nazi persecution, they would cry out with one voice asking that this country point the way in this proposed humanitarian task of providing temporary havens for European refugees."

President William Green of the American Federation of Labor also pleaded: "I urge you, Mr. President, in my own name, and in the name of the American Federation of Labor, to cause the creation of free ports in this country for refugees who are victims of this cruel war now, before it is too late. Such action on your part will, I believe, clear the way for similar action in other parts of the allied and neutral world."

And president Philip Murray, speaking for the C. I. O., cried out: "In behalf of the C. I. O. I endorse the plan and hope to see it implemented without delay."

And Mr. Justice Frank Murphy, speaking as chairman of the National Committee Against Persecution of the Jews: "Surely we have not become so calloused to human suffering, so inured to brutality and bestiality that we can stand idly by and refuse to initiate this simple plan which will save thousands of human lives and in the bargain cost the taxpayers of our country not a cent."

There are also hundreds of others, Poles and Czechs, Scandinavians and Netherlanders, Belgians and French, Serbs, Croats, Albanians, and Greeks, who are also trying to escape the Nazi debasement. There are Catholics, Lutherans, and Eastern Orthodox as well as Jews. They represent all types of religions, all types of political and social creeds which the Nazi despises and fears.

It is for all these refugees that Jewish organizations—the American Jewish Congress, the American Council for Judaism, the American Ort, the Hebrew Sheltering Society—have joined the A. F. of L., the C. I. O., the Farmers Union, and Mr. Justice Murphy's National Committee Against Persecution of the Jews—in pleading to President Roosevelt to establish such temporary havens for refugees in this country.

The President of the United States has ordered the admission of 1,000 refugees and I am endeavoring to persuade the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, of which I am chairman, to pass a resolution to establish more free ports, and to urge other nations to do likewise.

On establishing these free ports, we shall be able to congratulate ourselves on having saved that many human lives from death and destruction. Each human life saved means that a victim of Hitler's fury has been rescued. It means that Hitler's plan of extermination of the people of Europe was not successful. It means that both we and other liberty-loving nations have definitely done a humanitarian act and only then will we be able to point out proudly to the consistent record of our Nation's history, that we are an asylum for the oppressed.

Commendation of Thirty-sixth Infantry Division

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. TOM CONNALLY
OF TEXAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 7 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 1), 1944

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article from the Dallas (Tex.) News relating to the Thirty-sixth Infantry Division, the members of which came from my State, and to Maj. Gen. Fred L. Walker, former commander of the Thirty-sixth Division, during its operations in Italy.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

VALOROUS DEEDS OF TEXAS THIRTY-SIXTH WIN GENERAL'S HIGH PRAISE

FORT BENNING, GA., July 25.—Back among familiar surroundings Tuesday was Maj. Gen. Fred L. Walker, former commander of the Thirty-Sixth (Texas) Division, which gained fame for its fighting in Italy.

General Walker, nearly two decades ago, was a student at the Fort Benning Infantry School. He assumed the duties of commandant of the school after a conference at post headquarters with Brig. Gen. William A. Hobson, post commander.

"I have observed our soldiers in battle on the Italian front over a period of 10 months and I am convinced that our soldiers are better than the Germans," General Walker said.

In a report to Lt. Gen. Ben Lear, United States of America, Commanding General Army Ground Forces, in Washington, General Walker said our soldiers are "more cheerful, more confident, better marksmen. After having seen our men going through the hardships of last winter during which they were subjected to almost continual rains, mud, cold rations, and continual artillery and mortar fire, maintaining a cheerfulness far superior to the enemy, I feel confident that they are capable of being made into the best soldiers in the world."

The Thirty-sixth Infantry Division, which General Walker commanded, has seen some of the bitterest fighting of the war. This division made one of the toughest amphibious landings of the war—under fire of the enemy's guns at Salerno. They were in the fighting at Altavilla, made one of the hardest crossings of the river in the war—the crossing of the Rapido—and fought at Cassino. They were one of the divisions in on the capture of Rome.

"The Thirty-sixth Infantry Division is a great outfit and I hated to leave it," General Walker said. "The public knows the deeds of some of its more publicized heroes such as Sgt. Charles (Commando) Kelly and Sgt. James Logan and Pvt. William J. Crawford, who won the Medal of Honor, and Sgt. Manuel Gonzales, who won the Distinguished Service Cross. But the division has hundreds of other heroes, real infantrymen who have proved that they're the kind of men you like to soldier with."

Although an Ohioan himself, General Walker's face lit up with pride when he talked about the Thirty-sixth, which was the Texas National Guard before it was inducted into Federal service in 1940. He assumed command September 13, 1941.

Although Selective Service trainees who filled out the division to combat strength and replacements from all over the Nation have given it an All-American flavor, General Walker says the citizens of Texas still regard it as their own.

He was notified before he left Italy that Texas Highway 36 has been renamed Thirty-sixth Division Highway and that plans are going forward to erect a monument to the division on that highway near Temple, Tex.

General Walker was not an eyewitness to Sergeant Kelly's feats which won for him the Medal of Honor, but he visited the Mayor's house in Altavilla—the scene of Kelly's exploit—after the Germans had been pushed out of the city.

"The third-story window from which Kelly dropped mortar shells as grenades on the advancing Germans was about 70 feet above the ground with a deep ravine below that," he said. "From there it was easy to make the shells fall on the point so that they would detonate.

"The Thirty-sixth Infantry Division has suffered heavy casualties several times," he continued, "but our men have had what it took to come back and give it back to the Germans in kind. Although we've seen less days of action than some of the other divisions, we've seen the toughest kind of action of all, storming a well-fortified beach and rivers."

General Walker is proud of a letter received, just before he left Rome, from Lt. Gen. Mark W. Clark, United States Army, in which the Fifth Army commander said in part:

"My heartiest congratulations on your new appointment, I am delighted that the Infantry School will have such a skilled commandant.

"The Fifth Army regrets the loss of one of its veteran commanders but realizes the importance of the role you are to play in the training of infantry for future battles.

"At this time I wish to express my very best wishes for every success as commandant of the Infantry School as well as to extend my congratulations for the superior job which you performed as commander of the Thirty-sixth."

General Walker was honored with a dinner at Rome just before leaving there, when a new song, singing the glory of the division, was introduced by one of the band members, Sgt. John Forte, 7331 Reed Street, Philadelphia, Pa. Sergeant Forte also composed Via Roma, a song which the general said had become very popular in Italy.

Just before the big push started in May, General Walker told the members of his division that they were being held in reserve, "But when you are committed, the eyes of the world will be upon you."

Sergeant Forte borrowed the expression to name his song, The Eyes of the World Are Upon You, Thirty-sixth, which ended with:

"Cheers to the men of the Thirty-sixth,
Theirs is the spirit that's never been licked.
To the men who led her
From Salerno to Rome,
Maj. Gen. Fred L. Walker."

General Walker was graduated from Ohio State University, Columbus, Ohio, in 1911 with a degree in engineering. Having been a member of B Troop, Ohio Cavalry, for 4 years, he took an examination for an Army commission in the fall of 1910. He was accepted in February 1911 and entered the Army in April as a second lieutenant of infantry, doing special work to gain his college degree later.

In 1932 he attended the Army War College, Washington, D. C. For the following 4 years he served on the War College faculty. He won the Distinguished Service Cross and Purple Heart with Oak Leaf Cluster in the World War.

His wife formerly made her home in Columbus, Ohio, but moved to Fort Benning with him. Their two sons are infantry officers.

Editorial Comments on Retirement of James A. Farley

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALBEN W. BARKLEY

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 7 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 1), 1944

Mr. BARKLEY. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD three excellent editorials, one from the New York Times of June 10, one from the Brooklyn Citizen of June 15, and one from the New York Enquirer of July 17, commenting upon the retirement of the Honorable James A. Farley as chairman of the New York State Democratic Committee.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times of June 10, 1944]

MR. FARLEY LEAVES THE CHAIR

Mr. Farley has been a chairman for 26 years. He began in 1918 with the Rockland County Democratic Committee. In 1930 he took the chair of the New York State Democratic Committee, which he has just resigned. For 8 years he was chairman of the Democratic National Committee. He has done an immense amount of drudgery. He has managed effectively a great Government department. Now, in a letter full of characteristic kindness for his fellow-workers, he becomes free at last to earn the competence which his great ability, exclusively exerted, would have won him long ago.

A political chairman usually becomes something of a mythological figure. To his opponents his words and his works are evil. Mr. Farley didn't entirely escape the demonologists, but the sinister myth couldn't stick long to a personage to incorrigibly honest, friendly and straightforward. Even the straightest-laced objectors to his code of sticking to his party through thick and thin had to make him an exception. Both politicians and the public have been impressed by his character.

Born with the gift to like and be liked, his tact and power to please are natural, not acquired. He must know by sight no small part of the voting population of the United States. Enlarging a Jeffersonian trait, he has written letters to most of the rest of the population. He comes down to us in a stream of green ink. He never talks too much and never bores us. Brought up in a Republican county, he has never had the bitterness that might have been expected. He has been moderate and reasonable. If he has had disappointments he keeps them to himself. He is a good fellow with no sacrifices of dignity. He is a good man, though he doesn't know it and won't believe it if he is told. As a public man he is A–1 The best of luck to him as a private man. As he gives up the chair we recall this recipe from his book of reminiscences. He "still believes that the only way to get ahead in public life is to understand people and sympathize with their viewpoint."

[From the Brooklyn Citizen of June 15, 1944]

MR. FARLEY'S FAREWELL

Whatever else may be said about the resignation of James A. Farley as chairman of the Democratic State committee, there is no doubt that it marks the end of an era. With this realization there also comes a feeling of sadness, for it almost seems as if politics were progressing too swiftly nowadays and too many events were happening too rapidly. When the old order changes and gives place to the new, it is natural for there to be considerable reluctance at parting with the good from the past.

However, it was, perhaps, inevitable to anticipate Mr. Farley's action. As he himself pointed out, his "business duties and obligations" preclude his devoting what he considers the amount of time necessary to perform the work of the State chairmanship in a conscientious manner. Since no one has ever been able to accuse him of lacking a sense of duty, or being deficient in the conscientious fulfillment of his responsibilities, it is understandable that Mr. Farley should have declined to concentrate on one assignment to the neglect of another.

In conjunction with his fidelity to a trust imposed in him, he has also manifested an unfailing sense of modesty in claiming credit for the tasks which he has accomplished. His formal statement of resignation displays this quality in his declaration that, "Whatever success I may have had in the performance of my duties as chairman of the State committee has been due entirely to the assistance I have had from the leaders and the precinct workers—men and women—down through the years."

What Mr. Farley apparently fails to grasp, with true self-effacement, is the fact that it was his own industrious and inspiring example which evoked this willing aid and cooperation from his admiring assistants. Yet he disclaims even this modicum of justified pride when he says, gratefully and humbly, that "I doubt if any man in my position has ever enjoyed the friendship of the leaders and the party workers as I have during these 16 years."

The truth of the matter is that few other men in public or private life have Mr. Farley's capacity for making friends and, as Shakespeare says, "grappling them to the soul with hooks of steel." If the Democratic politician benefited by an acquaintance which was wide and varied, it was because it was founded on the sincerity of Farley, the man. The Brooklyn Citizen joins with that host of friends in wishing him well as an executive and as a Democrat.

[From the New York Enquirer of July 17, 1944]

JIM FARLEY—AMERICAN

In the fierce conflict that is American politics there is no room for weaklings. Men who for themselves or for others seek power for an idealistic or worldly reason, have no easy path.

There is no governing class in America. The boy from the wrong side of the tracks has as much right to seek the highest office in the land as does the son of the wealthiest family. Therefore, he who enters the political arena knows that he must deal with all the people, some zealous in behalf of his plans, others bitterly opposed.

On his way he may sometimes compromise, sometimes veer slightly, but always before him he must keep his goal and his general direction must ever be toward it.

He must place the interest of his country first and as he is loyal to it, so must he be loyal to his party and his friends.

Above all else, he must be honest. The public is his judge and while the public is often slow to understand and sometimes temporarily deceived, in the long run it makes a true assay of a man's real worth. Successful politicians themselves place the highest value on personal honesty and even the bitterest opponents, worthy of each other's steel, will invariably grant full trust in each other's word.

Obviously, a man successful in politics must possess great ability, singleness of purpose, courage, loyalty, and high moral integrity.

Such a man is James A. Farley. And in saying this we know that we only echo the thoughts that are in the minds and hearts of millions of Jim's fellow Americans.

It is not necessary to restate here Jim Farley's record. It is known the length and breadth of the land. Thousands can testify to his political ability and his genius for organization. But more thousands will rate Farley eminent not so much for these attributes, for others have them, but because through the years, despite hard blows, despite disappointments, despite temptations, he has held fast to the virtues of patriotism, loyalty, honesty, and has demonstrated moral integrity and spiritual qualities of the highest order.

Jim Farley has resigned as chairman of the Democratic State committee and is stepping out of public life. But we know that millions of Americans expect him to keep up his interest and to watch closely the political scene. America will always need men like him and such is our faith in Jim Farley's love of country, we know that if the enemies of America seem to be waxing too strong and the people summon him back to the political arena, Jim Farley, patriotic American, will respond.

Federalization of Medicine

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALLACE H. WHITE, JR.

OF MAINE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 7 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 1), 1944

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, at the request of the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] and on his behalf I ask unanimous consent that there may be included in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "The Doctors," by Frank C. Waldrop, appearing in the Washington Times Herald of July 31, 1944.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE DOCTORS

(By Frank C. Waldrop)

There is pending in Congress a bill 90 pages long, and containing roughly 17,000 words, that makes the doctors of America shiver. This bill proposes that the Federal Government spend $3,000,000,000 more per year than it does now for medical care and hospitalization of the people in general.

Uncle Sam is already the heaviest spending patient in history—what with the Army and Navy hospital systems, veterans' care, and the various public-health services operated under direction of the United States Surgeon General.

This additional $3,000,000,000, also to be administered primarily under control of the Surgeon General, is looked on by the doctors as the absolutely last ton of bricks to flatten them into machine parts of a Government-run medical bureaucracy.

The 17,000 words, all highly technical and full of complicated legal meaning, were put together by New York's Senator WAGNER and Senator MURRAY of Montana, as an amendment to the already existing Federal social-security laws.

In its preamble, it reads like a gilt-edged bond against all the ills that human flesh is heir to, for it proposes "to provide for the general welfare; to alleviate the economic hazards of old age, premature death, disability, sickness, unemployment, and dependency: * * *" etc., etc.

Just how a law of Congress can provide against "premature death" or alleviate the "economic hazards" thereof is not so clear. But the American Medical Association looks on the bill as a provision for the premature death of the sort of medicine that has brought to the United States of America the highest health standards in the history of man.

And, of course, the $3,000,000,000 worth of medical work to be done each year under the terms of this bill won't be free at all. Who escapes taxes, except by "premature death"?

But, at any rate, here is how the project is supposed to work: The Surgeon General is authorized to select on his sole say-so hospitals in which patients may stay at the taxpayers' expense for from 30 to 90 days.

He is also the final say-so as to the organizing of panels of general physicians and specialists—he alone will say who is a specialist—to do tax-paid preventive and curative medicine the country over.

Doctors will serve according to his instruction and appointment—or else.

In brief, the entire basic system of medical practice in America will be governed by the head of one Federal bureau in Washington—if the bill goes through.

And some astonishingly clever maneuvers have been started to blast it through at the psychologic moment.

For instance, have you had trouble getting a doctor lately? America is so short on civilian physicians that the house of delegates of the American Medical Association warns an epidemic of influenza or similar disease would sweep the country in devastating fashion. The doctors just can't get around to their patients now, and in a few years things will be worse, according to the A. M. A.

Britain, Canada, and Russia, looking ahead to the troubles of post-war readjustment, are enlarging their systems of medical training now, war or no war.

But Mr. Roosevelt, in his infinite wisdom, is working in exactly the opposite direction. The overworked older doctors of America are dying at the rate of 4,000 a year. They are being replaced at the rate of only 1,500 a year—because F. D. R. has decreed that no premedical students shall be deferred from the draft. By 1948, end of term IV, if any, the effect of this policy would leave the United States with 10,000 fewer doctors than it has today.

The house of delegates of the A. M. A. has begged Mr. Roosevelt to think twice about this, and warned that the result will be a critical loss for the private practice of medicine in the post-war era when care for the veterans will in itself be a gigantic assignment and world demand for American medical skill will hit us.

There just won't be enough young doctors to fill the ranks as the older men die, they show by simple mathematics. But there will be a crisis and an emergency. And then the political geniuses can spring the Wagner-Murray bear trap at the moment the country's desperation for medical attention will be at its peak.

The doctors are up against some of the ablest political propagandizers who ever lived. If F. D. R. gets his fourth term, he will socialize them for sure, if he can.

The doctors can beat him at his game only by tossing all their crooks and quacks out of their medical societies, by showing they care more for their patients' welfare than for their elaborate "ethical" protection of doctors who have double-dealt with the public.

They have a heavy policing job to do in their own ranks if they expect the public to stand with them against the Wagner-Murray juggernaut, and without the public on their side it will crush them for sure.

Public Health Service Drive on Tuberculosis

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH F. GUFFEY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 7 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 1), 1944

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the following article from the Washington Evening Star of Thursday, August 3.

It is interesting to note that the newly created Tuberculosis Control Division of the Public Health Service reports that Washington is eighty-fourth on the list of 92 cities reported. I hope that the members of the District Committee, who recently held an investigation, will find time to read this report.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HEALTH SERVICE PLANS NEW DRIVE ON TUBERCULOSIS—DISTRICT LISTED AMONG 92 CITIES TO RECEIVE AID

The United States Public Health Service today announced it is shaping up plans for a new national tuberbulosis control program in 92 cities with a population of more than 100,000, including the District of Columbia.

Dr. A. Barklie Coulter, head of the Tuberculosis Bureau of the District Health Department, when informed of the announcement, said he fully expected the national assistance to be extended to Washington will be in the form of a grant of money. Legislation authorizing a fund of $10,000,000 for the Public Health Service has been enacted, but the money has not yet been appropriated.

The Public Health Service made public a comprehensive set of statistical tables disclosing the relative death rates of the 92 cities, based on deaths during the 3 years of 1939, 1940, and 1941. The average yearly death rate in the big cities was shown to be 55.4 per 100,000 population, compared with 43.5 in communities of 2,500 to 100,000 population and 31.1 in rural areas.

DEATH RATES VARY

Dr. Herman E. Hilleboe, chief of the newly created Tuberculosis Control Division of the Public Health Service, recently authorized by Congress, said that death rates in the large cities vary extremely, and studies were being made to find out why. For example, he pointed out the death rate in cities of overwhelmingly white population varies from 15.6 deaths per 100,000 population in Grand Rapids, Mich., to 151.7 in San Antonio, Tex.

Washington's standing among the 92 cities was listed in several ways—its relative position based on deaths among all races, deaths among whites only, among nonwhites, among cities of its own size and by geography.

The cities with the lowest death rate among all races, which stood at the top of the list, were Grand Rapids, Mich., 15.6; Salt Lake City, 19.3; Minneapolis, 20.9.

D. C. IS IN EIGHTY-FOURTH PLACE

Washington was listed in eighty-fourth place, with a rate of 82.7 deaths per 100,000 population of all races. Cities with a higher tuberculosis death rate among all races than Washington were: San Antonio, 151.7; Chattanooga, Tenn., 113.7; Sacramento, Calif., 97.5; Jacksonville, Fla., 89.4; Memphis, Tenn., 89.1; Atlanta, Ga., 86.5; Birmingham, Ala., 83.7.

In the list given, the death rate for the white race only, however, Washington stood next to the top among cities of its own relative size from 500,000 to 1,000,000 population, with a death rate of only 38.3 per 10,000 population. The only city which had a better rate than Washington was St. Louis, Mo., with a death rate of 37 per 100,000 white population.

Dr. Coulter, pointing to this good showing of the District, said this was the fairest comparison of any of the tables listed by the Public Health Service. He emphasized, however, that cities should not be considered to be in competition with each other in a tuberculosis death rate. Instead, he said, a more practical consideration would be to show how rapidly the death rate was going up or down in each city.

He stressed his recent report that since the establishment of the Bureau of Tuberculosis in the Health Department here in 1935, the death rate generally had dropped from 102.2 to 66.4 per 100,000 population, according to his figures here.

OTHER CITIES LISTED

After St. Louis and Washington in the Public Health Service list of death rates among white populations were Pittsburgh, 38.9; Milwaukee, 39.3; Cleveland, 42.1; Baltimore, 46.8; Buffalo, 48; Boston, 55; and San Francisco, 61.

Among cities of its own size, Washington stood in fourth place for the death rate among nonwhites, as follows: St. Louis, 176, per 100,000 population; Pittsburgh, 182.6; San Francisco, 188.5; Washington, 194.3; Boston, 215.7; Baltimore, 299.2; and Cleveland, 235.1.

The nonwhite situation among 39 cities of the country listed showed Washington in twenty-eighth place with the figure of 194.3. The highest nonwhite tuberculosis rates were in Newark, 275.5; Chicago, 250.1; Chattanooga, 244.4; Cincinnati, 243.3; Cleveland, 235.1; Tulsa, Okla., 234.1; Baltimore, 229.2; Boston, 215.7; New York, 213; Philadelphia, 203.5; Jacksonville, Fla., 198.4; Washington, 194.3, and Detroit, 189.2.

Among such cities the ones with the lowest nonwhite death rate were Fort Worth, 102.7; Charlotte, N. C., 107.2; Kansas City, Kans., 109.2; Dallas, 116.9; Houston, 134.4, and Richmond, Va., 135.3.

A Soldier at the Peace Table

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DENNIS CHAVEZ

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 7 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 1), 1944

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial appearing in today's Washington Times-Herald, entitled "A Soldier at the Peace Table." I make this request for the reason that I believe the editorial to be timely, reasonable, and correct.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A SOLDIER AT THE PEACE TABLE

SOLDIERS KNOW AND HATE WAR MOST

Miss Marcia Winn, writing in the Chicago Tribune last week, came up with a suggestion that we believe merits a lot of consideration. She suggested that a soldier, or some soldiers, be invited to sit at the peace table, since they are the ones who actually know about war and hate it most. And she told how her suggestion came about.

Miss Winn said she had a letter from a man who had been in the Spanish-American War, whose son had been in the last war, and whose grandson was in the current war. Her correspondent said he had come out of his own experience hating war, and felt that his son and grandson would duplicate his feelings.

"The soldiers who come home," he wrote, "are the world's best missionaries for peace."

The man later called on Miss Winn in person and elaborated on his idea.

"Women can do a lot for peace," he told her, "but in the long run it's up to the men. The only way we will ever stop war is through the men who have fought in a war."

His great idea was to have a soldier at the peace table.

As Miss Winn remarked, the notion is full of holes. How to pick the soldier? What powers to give him? In fact, the question of questions, How to do the thing at all? Actually, it's just a dream, but even so, it's worth thinking about.

Peace tables are usually surrounded by politicians who are dickering with one eye on the people back home and by diplomats who almost always outsmart themselves by being too diplomatic. Sitting in, usually, are generals and admirals, who believe they are entitled to have some say about allotting the rewards of the victory they have just won.

BATTERIES OF EXPERTS BEHIND NEGOTIATORS

Sitting behind the actual negotiators are batteries of secretaries and bales of papers. The secretaries are experts on this and that, and the papers are full of studies about where the new boundaries should be and who pays whom for what. The boundaries are jiggled back and forth according to the claims of minority pressure groups, associations of fiery patriots and, occasionally, the word of some one who really knows something about it. The claims are adjusted not only in terms of those who lost a cow when the armies battled across their pasture, but by the representations of those engaged in international commerce, impatient to grab the trade formerly held by the losers.

And underneath everything else is the insistent undertone of politics.

But by the time things reach the negotiation stage, the war itself has been pushed into the background, to become a set of casualty statistics in the almanac, where they will be looked up by coming generations of editorial writers seeking a comparison for the figures in the new war.

The men who have fought the war have ceased to be soldiers, because they are dead, or because they have been demobilized.

The politicians at the peace table may occasionally remember the men who were soldiers, because those who got out of the war alive are voters; they can be tossed a bonus. The diplomats don't have much time for soldiers except considered as a point which may be used effectively in an argument. The generals and admirals, who are often shown decorating a soldier or a sailor, are accustomed to considering their men in numbers and firepower, too, and not as people.

What we are getting at is this. None of those people around the peace table ever has had that intimate contact with war that the ordinary soldier has had. Cerainly a general or an admiral gets killed once in a while, but if he does, it's a mistake. And a politician or a diplomat may get assassinated, but not, usually, in a fox hole or on a beachhead. They know war only in the broad and impersonal sense.

We think that, even though it's just a dream and insanely impossible, there might be a way to plant a couple of soldiers on the peace table. Probably not what we called an ordinary soldier, the tough inarticulate fighter, but there must be among the ranks somewhere a couple of sensitive, intelligent men who could put across to the other participants in the debate the notion that a soldier does not like war and could convey to the experts a suggestion as to what the men who fought the war would like to do about the peace.

Of course, it's just a dream.

Control of the Press

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALLACE H. WHITE, JR.

OF MAINE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 7 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 1), 1944

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, at the request of the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] I ask unanimous consent that an article appearing in the Washington Times-Herald of June 18, entitled "F. C. C. Probe Bares Plan to Control Press," be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

F. C. C. PROBE BARES PLAN TO CONTROL PRESS—GAGGING OF CRITICS IS FIRST OBJECTIVE

(By Willard Edwards)

A New Deal pattern for intimidation of the American press, leading to eventual control through a permanent Government propaganda set-up, has been brought to light in hearings just concluded by the special House committee investigating the Federal Communications Commission.

Patching together bits of testimony wrung from numerous Government witnesses over a period of weeks, committee members said there has become evident a well-planned program for bureaucratic domination of radio, the press, and freedom of speech.

SUPPRESSION OF CRITICISM

Suppression of newspaper criticism of the Government is the first objective of the planners, the evidence indicated. An attempt to accomplish this would be made by the publication of surveys presenting a comparison of Axis radio broadcasts with selected excerpts from a few prominent newspapers which have aroused the wrath of President Roosevelt by opposition to New Deal policies.

As a basis for making such a comparison, the Federal Broadcast Intelligence Service of the F. C. C., the testimony revealed, has prepared a digest of enemy broadcasts, divided into 14 themes, illustrative of the Nazi and Japanese propaganda.

This chart is inclusive, members noted, of practically all possible criticism of the United States and its allies, so that hardly an American newspaper worthy of the name would be exempt from a charge of having followed, in some manner, at some time, the enemy propaganda line.

BRANDED AS PRO-NAZI

A newspaper could be branded as pro-Nazi on a basis of comparison with these 14 themes, if it had ever intimated that "political and economic injustice" existed in the United States or Great Britain or criticized the foreign policies of Mr. Roosevelt or Mr. Churchill.

Similarly, an editorial or news story suggesting that President Roosevelt was under the influence of Communists would be condemned as following the German propaganda line.

As a crowning absurdity, statements that Germany and Japan were powerful and might win the war could be assailed as fomenting enemy propaganda. The highest-ranking officers of our Army and Navy might qualify as enemy propagandists on this basis, members noted.

WHIPPED INTO LINE

The publication of such comparative surveys, however, they remarked, might damage the prestige of the first newspapers selected as targets to such an extent that many other newspapers would be whipped into line.

Following is a summary of the 14 themes of enemy propagranda, drafted by the propaganda analysis section of the F. C. C., which would form a basis for denunciation of any newspaper found to have published criticism similar to them in any respect:

"Political and economic injustice exist in the United States and Great Britain, and internal corruption, war profiteering, Communists and spiritual decay. The foreign policies of the United States and Great Britain are morally unjustifiable. Either President Roosevelt or Prime Minister Churchill or both is a war monger, unscrupulous, the pawn of Communists.

FEAR OF EDITOR CITED

"Germany and Japan are powerful and possess the manpower, armaments, materials, and morale essential to victory. The United States and Great Britain are weak. The United Nations are disunited, and distrust, deceive, envy, and suspect each other. The United States and the world are menaced by Communists and plutocrats."

Variations of some of these themes can be found in many newspapers, committee members noted, and one remarked ironically:

"An editor might fear to render a tribute to a dish of pigs knuckles and sauerkraut lest he be labeled pro-Nazi because a Germany broadcaster had expressed a liking for similar fare."

It was reported that last Monday's 5-to-4 Supreme Court decision in the Hartzell espionage case, affirming the right of an American citizen both in war and peace to criticize the Government and the President in the strongest terms, even to "immoderate and vicious invective," if he so desires, may have caused a temporary halt to plans for publishing the surveys.

FRANKFURTER DISSENTS

It was observed, however, that the ruling prevailed by the narrow margin of one vote and the present court has been known to reverse itself. Justice Frankfurter, one of the dissenters, was revealed during the committee hearings to have requested a daily copy of the F. C. C.'s digests of Axis broadcasts.

Evidence concerning the 14 themes was brought out during the questioning of Dr. Robert D. Leigh, former president of Bennington College, Bennington, Vt., who is director of the F. C. C.'s Foreign Broadcast Intelligence Service. He was questioned by Committee Counsel Harry S. Barger about the activities of Dr. Harold D. Lasswell, now engaged in research on war communications at the Library of Congress.

Leigh said Lasswell was working in an atmosphere of great secrecy" and was "in touch with a great many important people around town" in the preparation of surveys based upon Axis broadcast material supplied him by the F. C. C. Leigh was asked how comparisons of Axis propaganda would be made with American newspapers.

MAKE COMPARISON

"You identify cliches of Axis propaganda, the people it attacks, then you compare it with what are called the Nazi lines and get your identification," he testified. "If you want to compare an American newspaper with the German propaganda, you would study the quantity and emphasis and consent of the newspaper and make the comparison."

"Do you not feel," asked Barger, "that if such principles as the ones we have been discussing became firmly established, we may be laying the foundation for a real Gestapo to operate against freedom of speech and freedom of the press?"

"It seems rubbish," Leigh replied. "All we are doing is a war job having to do with Axis propaganda to the United States. My division has no interest in the prosecution of anybody."

In November 1942, according to the testimony, the F. C. C. contracted to furnish its Axis broadcast digests to the Office of War Information for delivery by it, through wire services, to newspapers and radio. This marked the formal entrance of the Government into competition with existing war services in the gathering and distribution of news.

SHOULD CONTINUE WORK

Moreover, Dr. Leigh conceded, the material is edited by both his division and the O. W. I. before it reaches the public which gets only that part of it which the two Government agencies wish it to have.

He added, with emphasis, that he thought propaganda work and the monitoring of foreign broadcasts should be continued after the war "for the information of our Government, especially the State Department."

The Farm Surplus Problem

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR CAPPER

OF KANSAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 7 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 1), 1944

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask the unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial printed recently in Printer's Ink, a New York City magazine, commenting favorably on S. 2041, a bill recently reintroduced by Senator SHIPSTEAD and myself and now pending before the Senate Committee on Agriculture. I am glad to say the measure is attracting a great deal of attention among farmers throughout the Midwest.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SENATE REVIVES BILL TO PROVIDE PERMANENT FARM SURPLUS SOLUTION

When the Senate returns next month from its furlough, high up on its calendar will be S. 2041 introduced 3 years ago by Senator ARTHUR CAPPER, of Kansas, and Senator SHIPSTEAD, of Minnesota, offering a new economic principle by means of which, it is declared, the farm surplus problem can be permanently solved. In a word, the bill specifies that our yearly surplus of farm products, up to a billion dollars, shall be exported and that the purchasers be allowed to pay for them in merchandise rather than gold. By means of prorate import quotas, the merchandise thus imported would be only 2½ percent of the United States yearly output in any one classification. The effect on each manufacturer would be negligible, and, in any event, he would gain added profit through the increased prosperity of the farmer. Three years ago the bill stirred up but little interest. It was regarded as just another of those things. But now Senators and Representatives are taking it seriously, and some heavy support has developed for it. You are going to hear plenty about this bill before long.

The Philadelphia Transit Strike

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH F. GUFFEY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 7 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 1), 1944

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the following editorial from this morning's Philadelphia Record, relating to the recent strike in Philadelphia and its causes.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WE DIDN'T SLIP; WE WAS PUSHED

When an elderly gentleman slips on a banana peel, the polite attitude is to look the other way—while he picks himself out of the gutter and wipes off the filth.

Now that the Army has our transit system again in operation and Philadelphia is picking itself out of the gutter, the Record has been advised that we should not add to our city's embarrassment by too caustic comment or criticism; that we should literally look the other way while Billy Penn wipes off the filth. Most important, we are not to inquire who planted the banana peel.

Here and now, the Record serves notice that it is not going to look the other way.

Here and now, the Record serves notice that it will devote all the abilities and resources which it can command to discovering and bringing to justice the perpetrators of this vile conspiracy against our country.

We use the word "conspiracy" advisedly. This was not a strike. Of that the Record is convinced. The transit tie-up was a deliberate plot. It will go down in history as the most shameful work stoppage during World War No. 2.

Until the plotters are discovered and punished, the whole city must share this shame. Until it is proven that this sudden repudiation of patriotic obligation and American principle was not spontaneous but manufactured, Philadelphia must remain a marked city "where it can happen again."

The Record knows that banana peels don't fall from the skies in Philadelphia.

The Record knows this particular banana peel was planted.

To discover by whom and why, The Record will seek answers to the following questions:

Who called the meeting of 50 P. T. C. employees at the Paradise Cafe on Ridge Avenue at 8 p. m. last Monday evening? That is where the work stoppage was finally planned. Who passed the word to meet there? Frank P. Carney, president of the company union, which is still in existence to represent office employees, was prominent at that meeting, but we have no proof that he called it. If he did, the trail would be very clear. In any case, the grand jury should subpena everyone present at that 8 o'clock meeting.

From their testimony it should not be hard to find out who really started the fireworks—or, to stick to our simile, who planted the banana peel. Those 50 men recruited some 150 more. The 200 divided into groups who put over the walk-out at the various car barns, bus garages, subway, and transit terminals. That's how easy it is for a city to fall, once it starts to slip on a banana peel.

But there are two other lines of inquiry of equal importance which we propose to pursue.

Why were Transport Workers Union officials completely in the dark about this "spontaneous" decision of their members to tie up the Philadelphia transit system? Three months ago a majority of the P. T. C. employes had voted for T. W. U. to represent them as their bargaining agent with management. Immediately after that balloting negotiations for a new wage contract were instituted. The very adroit representatives of T. W. U. succeeded in obtaining a very favorable contract for their members, with wage increases of about $3,000,000 a year. After long delay, because of technicalities, this contract was to have been signed last Friday.

While no election of officers of the new local union had been held, shop stewards had been appointed and were functioning. Why was none of these T. W. U. shop stewards included in the original 50 who met at the Paradise Cafe to plan the sabotage? Why did no one of the 50 suggest that T. W. U. officials be notified and represented at their meeting?

Did the 50 men at the Paradise Cafe represent the 8,000 transit employees? Three months ago the employees had repudiated the company union.

What caused them to completely reverse their attitude, accept company-union leadership, and repudiate T. W. U. leadership to which they had given their endorsement a few months ago?

On the face of it, doesn't it look as though a disgruntled minority pulled a "quicky" on the representatives of the majority, who had gone to sleep after concluding a favorable contract for their new members?

But there is another line of inquiry which is even more significant.

Where was management when the cars stopped?

What did management do to meet this emergency?

So far as we can discover the answer is "absolutely nothing."

Dr. A. A. Mitten, chairman of the industrial relations committee of P. T. C., was the official charged with the responsibility of meeting this situation. He admits that he knew about it Monday night. He went out to the car barns early Tuesday morning. He decided not to say anything to the men assembled there because they were "too sullen." He issued no appeal to the men to return to work. By the way:

No appeal to employees to return to work was issued by any official of P. T. C.

Why?

Why was no meeting called of the executive committee of P. T. C. on Tuesday morning? Certainly with the system completely frozen and the city tied up, there was sufficient reason for a meeting of the executive committee if not of the full board of directors. It happens that Mayor Samuel is an ex-officio member of the board of directors, together with three councilmen, who represent the city's interest in the maintenance of its transit system.

Did they demand a meeting of the directors?

We happen to know that in this emergency there was no meeting of the board of directors or of the executive committee until Friday morning, when the executive committee met to accept the usual contract which the Army offers when it takes over.

We want to know why management took so little interest in the strike.

There are answers to all these questions—and when they are properly answered certain pillars of society will be called to account and a great city will be cleared of its shame.

Control of London Press

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALLACE H. WHITE, JR.

OF MAINE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 7 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 1), 1944

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, at the request of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE], I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article appearing in the Washington Times-Herald of July 16 under the title "British Ruling Class Controls London Press."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BRITISH RULING CLASS CONTROLS LONDON PRESS—CENSORSHIP IN ENGLAND WEAKENING NEWSPAPERS AND DISTORTING WAR NEWS

(By J. Loy Maloney)

(Mr. Maloney left the United States for London on May 17 and returned July 4. He tells here of some of the observations he made of the British press during his 6 weeks' stay.)

The belief that the British have tremendous capacity for the absorption of punishment is nowhere more exemplified than in the case of British newspapers.

A casual reading of the London press for 6 weeks forces the conclusion that the British ruling class—names of nobility and wealth such as Beaverbrook, Rothermere, Kemsley, and Astor run through the lists of British newspaper proprietors and controlling shareholders—gives British newspaper readers just what the ruling class thinks they should have and little else. And what is even more shocking is the fact that newspaper readers there "queue up" in long lines to buy what is offered. They appear to like what is handed them.

Although time appears to have relaxed somewhat the British censorship—it is still bad enough—the British press remains weak and lacks all constructive criticism. As if in return for accepting slavishly its news presentation which the British ruling class thinks newspaper readers there should have the latter are treated to good news, strongly played up, whether there is any or not.

Bad news is played down, and good news painted in its most glowing colors. The publishers say it is best to keep the readers—who have suffered the pangs of war for 5 years—as happy as possible. Failures are explained away, sometimes painfully.

The circumstances which most shock the American newspaperman in London is the interlarding of the news with the opinions of the newspaper editor and his reporters.

This mixing of opinion and fact has been practiced so long that the reporters and editors are past masters of the art.

When this phenomenon is pointed out to British newspaper readers, they have the greatest difficulty in recognizing the difference between the two. They have fed on the mixture so long that they can't tell one from the other.

Even an American sojourning in London for a few months soon gets used to it.

The editorial opinion injected into the news stories soon acts as a drug on the reader and the first thing he knows he is swallowing it and if he isn't careful—like the British newspaper readers themselves—is learning to like it or, at least, ceases to object to it. Soon he is sound asleep so far as independent thinking is concerned.

The necessity to compress stories into small space has aided this practice. Stories which "classify" from all over the world are rewritten and localized.

The date lines which give authenticity to reports in American newspapers are forgotten. This makes it easy for the editors and rewrite men to inject their opinions in the news with impunity.

Often the only way a British newspaper reader could tell an editorial from a news story is the fact that it appears on the editorial not the news page.

As to the Pacific war, British newspaper readers know little about it. A story worth a column or a column and a half in Chicago on the exploits of MacArthur and Nimitz will get two or three paragraphs on the back page of a London daily or no mention at all.

European news is well mapped, but maps on the Pacific battles, land and naval, are almost unknown. It is a European war to the British newspaper publishers and readers.

It is difficult to see why the British ruling class, controlling the press as it does, underplays the war on Japan, in view of Prime Minister Churchill's repeated statements that once Hitler is beaten the British will turn their efforts to the Pacific. British newspaper readers certainly have been ill prepared for any such event.

The statements of the Germans on their many radios get more prominence in the British press than the Nimitz-MacArthur battles to whip Japan.

British newspapers often take the Axis radio statements at their face value, giving them prominence and presenting them to British readers as unqualified facts.

American civilians sojourning in London were for a time unable to reach much of the activities of Americans battling in Italy or flying bombers over the Continent.

When it was the British in action, the reader was specifically told so. When it was the Americans, they were referred to as "allies."

British bombers were called British bombers, but when the American day bombers were over Berlin they were often referred to merely as Flying Fortresses and Liberators, and the reader was permitted to draw his own conclusions as to the nationality of the pilots, navigators, and gunners.

This tendency, however, was knocked into a cocked hat after the invasion of France. The activities of the American troops on the Cherbourg Peninsula were so newsworthy that the British newspapers were forced to give the facts frankly.

This they did with the result that the superior press given the American troops was the subject of much comment in London and the demand was immediately made by the British and their American newspaper spokesmen that more correspondents, especially American, be sent to cover the fighting on the British sector of the invasion area.

There is still censorship, backed by law, in Great Britain.

Of late it has been somewhat liberalized and, of course, does not force the British newspapers to serve continually glowing reports to the effect that everything is going well, whether it is or not, when the bold facts would be more interesting and be more conductive to an efficient war production and a vigorous conduct of the war.

It is possible under the British law to punish violations of the censorship by fines and jail sentences. The British government did for a time suppress the Daily Worker, although it is now publishing again.

The British still refuse to accredit Daily Worker reporters as foreign correspondents, however.

"Stops"—the newspaperman's term for definite rules against certain stories or phases of stories—are numerous in Britain.

In the case of the flying bomb, for instance, these "stops" for a time covered three and a half single-spaced typewritten pages.

As the war has progressed and British censorship has tended outwardly at least toward liberalization there have been fewer efforts to prosecute newspapers as having printed facts dangerous to the war effort. Prosecution of the London Daily Telegraph was dropped when it became apparent that the Government could not prove statements made in that paper interfered with the progress of the war.

The principal stumbling block to news publication at the present time is the fact that British censors are "advised" by the British Foreign Office and by air, army, and admiralty "advisors."

The censor does not have to take this "advice" but in practice it amounts to law.

The British have canceled the old edict issued in 1942 which empowered the ministry of information to ban news stories tending to create dissension among the Allies. However, reporters are "advised" by the censor when such news comes up that it should not be written or transmitted.

This "advise" had best be taken because the reporter, if he disregards it, is courting trouble with his credentials and may find himself in England when he and his office want him on the fighting front.

One "stop" remaining in British censorship is a ban on the discussion of diplomatic relations. This is on the ground that it would tip off the enemy on what is planned.

There are also "stops" on stories indicating this is an imperialistic war and there is another on stories which indicate there are large numbers of reluctant soldiers in the French army.

In general, American reporters prefer to submit their stories to British censorship rather than American. The latter are often inexperienced and, so reporters say, often stop stories that the British will pass.

It is unnecessary for the British newspapers to submit to censorship of British home news—news developed in England.

The newspapers may print it at their peril, and in doing so may run afoul of the general British censorship law.

Thus, British newspapers often print stories which the British censors stop when an American tries to send them to the United States.

In that case the American reporter must take to the British censor the British newspaper story as printed. Then the ban is removed at once and the story can be sent—perhaps as much as 12 to 24 hours after the British press has printed it.

Dewey's Labor Platform

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 3, 1944

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, because of changes in labor legislation which have long been advocated by me, some labor politicians and some labor racketeers have frequently charged me with being antilabor. Nothing could be further from the truth.

Many times, actions of the National Labor Relations Board have been condemned by me and amendments to the Wagner Act have been offered to remedy the things criticized. But never was my criticism of the Labor Board more pointed than that made on various occasions by William Green, president of the A. F. of L.; Philip Murray, president of the C. I. O.; and John Lewis, leader of the United Mine Workers.

My contention, embodied in a proposed amendment, that employers should be given the right to petition for an election, was finally adopted by the N. L. R. B. Long after I advocated it, the A. F. of L. insisted that the board limit its election precincts to localities or industries. More recently, both the A. F. of L. and the C. I. O. conceded by their actions that my contention that servicemen should not lose their seniority by enlistment is sound, although some labor politicians and a few labor papers bitterly condemned me for proposed legislation to that effect. The over-all labor program advocated by me would have done much to eliminate labor strife.

At the recent conference of Candidate Dewey and the 25 Governors in St. Louis, a labor program was adopted, which now advocates much of the legislation offered by me—some of it 2 years ago—and legislation now proposed by Dewey and the 25 Governors would aid collective bargaining, preserve the rights of employees, tend to promote industrial peace.

While my proposed amendments were bitterly opposed, they will ultimately be adopted, for, as stated in the report of the 25 Governors and Candidate Dewey, the administration "of existing labor statutes has been inefficient and arbitrary and has tended to promote, rather than to allay, industrial strife."

The foregoing is written, not in the spirit of "I told you so," but simply to show that, in spite of the present condemnation of strikes which hinder war production, there is no disposition to in any way curtail employees' rights or benefits because a few misguided so-called leaders act unreasonably or in disregard of their duty to support the war effort.

We can, and beyond question the new Congress will, adopt new legislation and that legislation will preserve labor's gains, while, at the same time, protecting the unorganized workers and employers.

Is Federal Supervision Over Federal Expenditures Interfering With States' Rights?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN J. COCHRAN
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 7, 1944

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, it is obvious from the press reports of the conference of Republican governors held in St. Louis recently that States' rights will be advanced by Candidates Dewey and Bricker in the coming campaign. Few subjects have been more thoroughly debated.

That the Federal Government has assumed certain controls in connection with the allocation of Federal funds for various State programs no one can deny. If by any chance, Mr. Dewey is elected President, is he willing to say now that he will urge Congress to amend existing law to permit Federal contributions to continue and at the same time eliminate Federal supervision and control of the expenditure of Federal grants by the States. As a governor he might favor this as it would enable the States, including his own, to accept Federal grants and spend the money in any way they please but as a President, who is directly responsible to the people of all the States, his obligation would be to see that Federal grants to the States are applied to the purposes for which they have been provided. New York, Mr. Dewey's State, has gratefully accepted well over a billion dollars from the Federal Government. Is Mr. Dewey willing to say now that he will urge Congress to discontinue making future contributions to the States?

I have just received from the Bureau of the Budget a statement of expenditures for grants to States. The 1945 contributions to date, while below that of 1944 are still around a billion dollars. This figure, however, is infinitesimal in comparison with the amount that will be authorized by the Congress to stimulate employment after the war.

The Conference of Governors objects to Federal supervision and interference, but at the same time criticizes, not Congress as a whole, because that would include Republicans, but the Democratic administration for not having adopted a plan for the post-war era. "National disaster will result if employment is not provided for returning veterans and defense-plant workers," say the Republican governors headed by Governor Dewey and his running mate, Governor Bricker.

The governors advocated public-works projects, aid to the States by the Federal Government for road construction, and so forth. Governor Dewey said the joint statement will end the quarreling and bickering in Washington with the election of a Republican administration; that it will end conflicts between Federal and local authorities, which have been shockingly wastful and injurious to effective government.

Would it not be well for Governor Dewey to be more specific and cite just what caused the conflicts?

Another suggestion was for Congress to adopt a post-war program. Of course, Congress should have a post-war program set up ready to put into operation immediately to prevent widespread unemployment and another depression when the war terminates. I predict these Republican governors will demand the Federal Government provide the major share of the cost of the program. When they make that demand let them remember the critical statements they made in St. Louis relative to Federal interference with the rights of the States. Surely they must admit the Federal Government has some rights. Will the governors demand their representatives in Congress carry out their suggestions that the money is to be handed to the States, to be disposed of as the States desire without any check by the Government to see that it is used for the purpose for which it was allocated? Of course, the Congress will insist upon some check which in the language of the governors is Federal interference with States' rights.

An editorial in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of August 1, 1944, refers to this question. It follows:

MR. DEWEY'S POW-WOW

The conference between Gov. Thomas E. Dewey and the 25 other Republican governors, which opens in St. Louis today, is primarily, of course, a move to strengthen the organization of the party's 1944 Presidential campaign.

The meeting will dramatize the fact that Republican governors now hold office in 26 of the 48 States. It will give the G. O. P. candidate an opportunity to meet his fellow executives, to map a campaign with their aid, and to inspire them to active support of his cause.

The 15-point program outlined for the conference boils down to the question of the relations between the States and the Federal Government. Even though the conference approaches the problem from a purely political point of view, there are possibilities for general enlightenment from its discussions and its decisions.

There will be difficulties, however, in reaching a decision on how to present the States' rights issue in the campaign, for this question has baffled Americans for generations back. The problem has become particularly acute in the last few decades, when the increasing centralization of government and the increase in Federal spending among the other units of government have given a new aspect to the issue.

Sincere opponents of Federal interference in State affairs have found themselves facing a dilemma. The growing complexity of government has compelled Washington to take a greater hand than ever before in matters which were formerly the exclusive province of the States. The needs of the depression era placed a greater relief burden upon the States than they could bear without assistance, and the Government was obliged to help with the job, for the sake of rescuing human beings from hunger and distress.

Federal funds have been sent into the States, often on a share-and-share basis, for many other purposes: to build highways, to control floods, to save farms from foreclosure, to aid in education, to teach farming methods, to assist with old-age pensions, to provide school lunches for needy children.

This spending of millions in the States has necessarily exercised a control over their policies and laws. As is often said, he who pays the fiddler calls the tune. Yet, it has in many cases provided benefits, in addition to the cash, by causing the States to install merit systems in order to meet Federal requirements.

William Allen White, one of the keenest of the Republican Party's advisers for many years, sailed into this problem with his characteristic bluntness in an Emporia Gazette editorial only a few months before his death. Mr. White wrote of a governors' conference at Columbus, Ohio, which had taken a stand against Federal interference:

"Of course Federal interference in State affairs is bad, and of course it is one of the vitiating things of the Americans politics of this fourth decade of the twentieth century, and of course sooner or later it will and must be checked.

"But it will not be stopped by a bunch of governors who, when they are at home, keep their milk pans out day and night to catch whatever benevolent dew falls from the heaven of the New Deal in the way of State subsidies.

"For 6 long years, the Gazette has preached against letting the Federal Government write the laws for Kansas. And so long as the Federal Government hands out the Federal aid, it will be fashionable to denounce the New Deal and take all that is coming from it."

The Republican platform and Mr. Dewey's statements recognize this inescapable dilemma. The platform acknowledges the need for Federal public works, and the candidate's call for the conference put the subject on the agenda. The platform calls for "intelligent cooperation" between the Government and the States and local groups—a plank that does give the governors a chance to take a stand on the Federal spending issue without going so far as to repudiate Government funds, for certainly the process of cooperation could be improved.

Mr. Dewey's conference in St. Louis isn't going to affect the fundamentals of the States' right issue. Republican, as well as Democratic governors will continue to catch the dew with their milk pans.

I also include an article by Mr. Marquis Childs on this subject. It follows:

GOVERNORS AND STATE'S RIGHTS

ST. LOUIS.—With the broad objective of the Republican governors' conference that has just been concluded here no one could disagree.

The picture of power-hungry bureaucrats working zealously to centralize authority in Washington is largely a figment of the imagination. The bureaucrat is an effect, not a cause. The fact is that the average bureaucrat struggles, and too often in vain, to keep up with the deep underlying causes that have resulted in the transference of power away from the States and localities to the Federal Government.

Any realistic effort to check the long trend toward centralization is all to the good. But it must touch basic reality to mean anything.

Take, as an example, the governors' plank on public works. It's a reasonable recommendation for planning in advance by Federal, State, and local units. Included, however, is the following:

"When and if in case of national necessity there are public works which may properly be the province of both Federal and State or local governments, then grants-in-aid should be made by the Federal Government to States or, through them, to their local governments, without conditions which invade the authority of the State or local government."

If that means what it seems to mean, then it says that the Federal Government shall dish out the money but shall have nothing to say as to how it shall be spent. The State could flagrantly misuse the money, and yet, presumably, the Federal Government could do nothing about it.

Here in Missouri, a year or so ago, an incident occurred that illustrates this conflict.

Under a Federal grant-in-aid, the Children's Bureau of the Department of Labor advanced money to the State for family assistance, the Federal law specifying, that the State officers who dispensed the money should meet certain civil-service standards.

The Children's Bureau learned that the jobs were being handed out to deserving politicos with little or no special training. After an investigation and hearings, and in spite of political pressure, the Federal money was stopped until the conditions were met.

What if no conditions had been laid down in the law? The way would have been opened to a patronage grab, and other State administrations might have found it advantageous to follow the example of Missouri.

Here, of course, you get down to an interesting contradiction. One of the chief reasons for lining up the governors behind the Dewey campaign, as one of the principal Dewey people told me privately, was because of the great patronage that most of them wield through their appointive power.

State job-holders who want to hold their jobs are going to be told to get out and work for the national ticket. This is politics on the practical side. But it hardly accords with the lofty language of the governors' 14 points.

There is however, a deeper contradiction in the fact that an important bloc of governors was not present at this meeting at all. The Democratic governors of the Southern States would have had some interesting things to say to the St. Louis conference.

South of Mason and Dixon's line, a revolt against discriminatory freight rates is brewing. Many southerners who are grounded in "States' rights" have come to feel that these rates are a kind of interstate tariff to protect the industrial East from the competition of the South and the Middle West.

The Eastern States want to keep the present lopsided rate structure, Governor Dewey went before the Interstate Commerce Commission 2 years ago to say that the differential was necessary for New York.

Even among the 26 Republican governors regional differences found expression. Montana wanted one kind of treatment from the Federal Government on highway aid, and New Jersey wanted another kind.

Mr. Speaker, Federal interference with States rights was born when Congress passed laws granting Federal aid to the States. The more aid the more interference. Eliminate the aid—destroy the interference.

The following list of expenditures for grants to the States was furnished me by the Bureau of the Budget:

EXPLANATION TO ACCOMPANY "STATEMENT OF EXPENDITURES FOR GRANTS TO STATES: 1941–45"

A "grant" as the term is used in the accompanying statement is in essence a Federal expenditure made to, or on behalf of, State or local governments, as contrasted to such an expenditure made to an individual or group of individuals within the States or local communities. The statement, therefore, indicates the entire flow of Federal funds in the form of grants or donations to State or local governments. It includes payments to defray a portion of the cost of specified services ordinarily performed by those governments for their constituents, and, under emergency conditions such as for unemployment relief or natural defense and war, it includes the entire cost of specified services performed by them or under their supervision. Included also are expenditures of Federal agencies to supply State or local governments with facilities for conducting the usual public services or to supply those services.

The statement includes these types of Federal payments:

a. Grants to States or local authorities for an activity which is conducted by both a governmental and a nongovernmental agency, but for which it is impracticable to distribute the expenditure to show separately the cost for the governmental portion. Examples: Training for nurses, a portion of which is paid to private individuals; emergency maternity and infant care, a portion of which is paid to private institutions or individuals; school lunch and milk program, a portion of which is paid to private schools or child-care centers.

b. Grants to local units of government. Examples: Annual contributions to local housing authorities; payments to counties under the Migratory Bird Conservation Act.

c. Federal agency expenditures made on behalf of State or local governments. Examples: W. P. A. State and local projects; F. W. A. community facilities and war public works.

d. Federal revenues shared with States or their subdivisions. Examples: Payments to States under Mineral Leasing Act; payments to counties under the submarginal land program.

e. Federal payments in lieu of taxes. Examples: Operation, maintenance, etc., national defense housing, N. H. A., F. P. H. A.; T. V. A., payments to States and counties.

Mr. Speaker, it might be well for the governors, including Governor Dewey and Governor Bricker, to inform the Congress, either individually or collectively, just which of these grants they are in favor of repealing and at the some time advise their Representatives and Senators whether or not, if the laws are repealed, the States will assume full financial responsibility and continue the programs now in effect.

Unfair Rough Rice Ceiling Prices

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HENRY D. LARCADE, JR.
OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 7, 1944

Mr. LARCADE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a copy of a letter which I have addressed to Hon. Chester Bowles, Administrator of the Office of Price Administration, and to Hon. Marvin Jones, Administrator of the Office of War Food Administration, following up the protest of the Representatives and Senators from the rice-producing States, in respect to the unfairness and unreasonableness of the order MP-518, of date March 7, 1944, placing a ceiling price on rough rice, and all of which we further protested as being unnecessary and that the prices established are below the cost of production at this time. Mr. Speaker, it is my considered opinion that it was never the intention of the Congress to give the power to these governmental agencies to fix the price on any product below the cost of production, and I sincerely trust that the officials charged with this responsibility will give prompt and favorable consideration to this matter, which affects my State and other States in the production of this most important food crop. Immediate action is required as the crop is now being harvested.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., August 7, 1944.

Hon. CHESTER BOWLES,
Administrator, Office of Price Administration, Washington, D. C.

Hon. MARVIN JONES,
War Food Administrator, Washington, D. C.

Re: MP-518, dated March 7, 1944, Ceiling price on rough rice.

GENTLEMEN: Under date of March 28, 1944, I addressed a letter to you which was signed jointly by the Senators and Representatives from the rice-producing States of Louisiana, Arkansas, Texas, and California, advising you that we had consistently opposed the placing of a ceiling price on rough rice, and demanding that the order be abrogated or rescinded, and outlining the reasons for such request.

I offered an amendment to the Price Control Act in the House of Representatives when this legislation was being considered for extension, to the effect that rough rice be excluded from the provisions of the act, but as you know the amendment was not adopted.

My colleagues and I have not changed our opinions, and still maintain that it is unfair, unreasonable, and unnecessary to place a ceiling price on rough rice, and that the maximum prices established for rough rice are below the levels of the year 1942, and violate the 1942 Emergency Price Control Act, as amended, and that these prices are below the cost of production as proven by the testimony of representatives of the Department of Agriculture of the States of Louisiana and Arkansas, and others. You will recall that this testimony outlined that under the ceiling prices imposed on rough rice production would be largely curtailed, and in addition, our farmers and the rice industry generally would suffer financially.

For your information, I am enclosing a newspaper article from the Lake Charles American Press, recopied by the Crowley Signal, wherein you will note that as a result of a survey made by the Lake Charles Journal, all that we have contended has come to pass, and our farmers will lose money at present prices.

The purpose of this letter is to request that your department make a review and further study of the ceiling prices on rough rice, and that an amendment be issued increasing the ceiling prices on this product in keeping with the cost of production.

Please let me hear from you at your earliest convenience.

Sincerely yours,

HENRY D. LARCADE, Jr.

Memorial for H. Koenemann

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BEN F. JENSEN
OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 7, 1944

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to my colleagues for giving me unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the following tribute by Clifford Powell, Red Oak, Iowa, to an American soldier who has given his all.

I place this wonderful tribute in the RECORD praying that all who read it who have lost a loved one in the service of his country might feel at least a slight loosening of their heartstrings in the great loss they have sustained.

[From the Red Oak (Iowa) Sun of June 22, 1944]

MEMORIAL FOR H. KOENEMANN—RED OAK SOLDIER, PVT. (1ST CL.) HOWARD KOENEMANN, HONORED—TRIBUTES GIVEN BY FRIENDS AND PASTOR

POWELL'S TRIBUTE

A memorial service was held on Sunday at the Congregational Church for Private (1st cl.) Howard Koenemann, Red Oak young man and member of Company M, who was killed in action in Italy on December 3, 1943. Rev. H. C. Bradshaw gave the memorial address and tributes were given by Robert Johnson of the American Legion and Clifford Powell speaking for the members of the Congregational Church of which Howard was a member.

Music was by a choir composed of members of the Congregational and Baptist Churches, Howard having previously attended the Baptist Sunday school.

Following is the text of Mr. Powell's address. It bespeaks the feeling of members of this community not only for Private (1st cl.) Koenemann but for all the young men who go out into battle in the present conflict that the American way of life may be preserved.

THE TRIBUTE

About a quarter of a century ago, and during the darkest days of another great war, an inspired American boy wrote:

"I have a rendezvous with death
At some disputed barricade
When spring comes 'round with rustling shade
And apple blossoms fill the air.

"At midnight in some flaming town
When spring trips north again this year,
And to my pledged word and true
I shall not fail that rendezvous."

Today we meet to pay tribute to one of our own boys, who, like Alan Seeger, did not fail that rendezvous. Howard Koenemann closed his young life with an act of gallantry that shines as a meteor across a darkened sky, and in doing so, brought honor and glory to himself, his parents, his community, and to his Nation.

All of us join extending to his parents, honored and beloved citizens of this community, our deepest sympathy. We are powerless to lessen their grief and sense of loss. But we can, I think, comfort them with the thought that Howard has made a great contribution to the cause of right and world progress. They have that greater and inner satisfaction of knowing that they have helped in the great struggle of man from darkness to light. And so we clasp their hands and say:

"Keep up the song of faith
And let your heart be strong
For God delights when faith can praise
Though dark the night and long."

It is a great personal honor to be asked to pay a tribute to our young friend. It was my privilege to know him intimately for many years and to observe his development into manhood. During his boyhood he regularly attended this church, but because of attendance at another Sunday school, he would arrive here a few minutes late. He would shyly grin as we ushered him to the family pew, well to the front of the church. His interest was in the athletics of our local schools, and in those activities which all youth love. He enjoyed the companionship of boys particularly, and it was only natural that he enlisted with the local National Guard company. He enjoyed the rigors of military training, and in his quiet way would wisecrack over the difficulties encountered. He never complained. He never faltered. He faced life with a quiet smile.

When M Company left in 1941 for training in the South he rode away with a wave of his hand, and entered into the drudgery and toil of preparing for war. He was typical of those thousands of lads, who left all their plans and hopes, their friends and relatives, and adventured forth—not for their own sakes alone—but going in your place and in mine—bearing the hardship and dangers that threaten each and every one of us. We gather here under a debt of eternal gratitude to these typical American boys—these modern knights—who are acting as our shield, and as our sword. Would that every person in this community, and in this Nation, fully realized our indebtedness to them. Howard Koenemann gave everything he had so that we could live peacefully and happily here in this quiet town.

A year's training in the South was followed by a year in Ireland and Scotland. The training was severe and strenuous; and then our community was electrified by the news of the landing in Africa. Montgomery County paid a fearful price in gaining that objective—but it was won by boys like Howard. And this was quickly followed by the grim and costly battles in Italy. Stubbornly, mile by mile, yard by yard, the determined and sobered Allies moved forward, and in this great struggle, Howard played his gallant part:

"And how can man die better
Than facing fearful odds
For the ashes of his fathers
And the temples of his Gods."

And so we gather this afternoon to show in a measure our deep sympathy to his parents. And we also meet and pay tribute to a gallant son, and to a man who did not fear to cast his lot for decent living and for a better world. And we also meet to renew in ourselves a sense of individual obligation to carry on to its glorious conclusion, the task on which the hundreds of young men and women from this community are now engaged.

To his parents we can say, in the words of Willis Sutton:

"No contribution you shall ever make to the history of the world will in any way be comparable to having given it a great boy."

His memory will be measured not in length of years but in his accomplishments.

"The shortest life is the longest, if 'tis best.
It is ours to work, but to God belongs the rest.
Our lives are measured by the deeds we do
The thoughts we think, the objects we pursue."

Howard was a modest lad. Public adulation was to him a thing to be avoided. He wanted only to be with his friends, to comment quietly on the passing show and to do his duty. He possessed a quiet sense of humor, and his letters from Ireland, with their semiserious comments on the natives, were a pleasure to receive and read. He liked the Irish but he feared to call twice on the same girls, as they all seemed imbued with matrimonial intent. He also liked the Italians. As all soldiers call them, he found the "Dagoes" good scouts. They would carry his pack for him and he greatly appreciated this courtesy. Never a word in his letters that the going was tough or that he feared the approaching battles. Just a typical American boy—just the kid next door.

Many of us do not appreciate the real American boy. He does not wear his heart on his sleeve. He does not want to show sentiment. He scoffs at sob stories. But from several years intimate living with them, I have discovered that there is no grander thing under heaven than the average American boy. He is true. He is a sentimentalist. He can take anything the world can give and come up with a grin. He will share his last ration with a hungry child, and he will risk everything to save a life—either of his comrades or of a dumb animal.

Hundreds of thousands of these boys are scattered over the face of the earth today—facing every danger and discomfort known to man—and shielding you and me. Very few can express why they are fighting. They are not given to oratory. But deep in their hearts they know that they are there to preserve the good things which for 5,000 years civilized man has laboriously built up.

A few weeks ago in the New York Times, Berton Braley expressed their thoughts in these words:

"What is it we are fighting for?
For all we hold as just
For tolerance and dignity
And simple, human trust.
For faith and hope, and honors,
We are fighting one and all.
For old and homely axioms
We learned when we were small.
The mottoes of the copy books
The simple sentiments
Of honesty and charity
And simple common sense.
We fight with our united might,
With body, soul, and brain
To save the 'moldy platitudes'
The copybooks contain.
We're fighting for the copybooks
Those adages and saws
Which fools deride,
But which abide as fundamental laws
Which are the key to decency,
Those rusty rules that give
To age and youth the guiding truth
By which all free men live."

Deep in the hearts of these boys they are determined that this Nation shall not perish, that it shall eventually, and by God's will, be "a government of the people, by the people, for the people."

And yet my friends, in this very community are some who cannot realize or value the sacrifices boys like Howard are making. We have in our midst those who complain of the little inconveniences to which they are being subjected; who resent the necessities of rationing; who blindly use the war to play partisan politics, and those who ignorantly urge the elimination of various races and minority groups. In the name of Howard Koenemann, I indict all such as un-American, lacking in patriotism and Christianity.

These American boys are seeing life through an enlarged vision. They are already demanding that those of us here clean the political stables of soft living. They may come home worse Congregationalists, worse Methodists, and worse Lutherans, but friends, they will come home better Christians. They will be better Americans, more understanding of world conditions, and with an outlook that reaches around the entire globe. They are entitled to an accounting from those who have not been real patriots. We here must pledge each to himself.

"Here—on this soil
Began the kingdom, not of kings, but men
Began the making of the world again.
Where equal rights and equal bonds were set
Where all the people equal franchised met
Where doom was writ of privilege and crown
Where human breath blew all the idols down
Where crests were naught, where culture flags were furled,
And common men began to rule the world."

Let us remember then, that in that awful hour, when his machine gun squad was held up, and Howard went forward alone to free his mates—that in that glorious act be unconsciously displayed all that America fights for. He expected no glory, but he won immortal fame. He sought no praise, but a grateful government cities and decorates him. He probably realized the danger, but "When duty calmly said, 'thou must,'

The youth replied, 'I can'."

He did not go forward to insure the continuance of special privilege, of a grumbling citizenry, or cowardly discontents. He proved that greater love hath no man than that he lay down his life for his friends; that freedom, justice, and democracy are greater than life; and that when supreme occasions arise the common man can meet them with pure courage and simplicity.

Howard probably would not desire these words of tribute. Had he expressed a wish, it probably would have been:

"And may there be no sadness of farewell
When I embark."

But we owe it to ourselves and to our community to recall a glorious life well spent. We owe it as a duty to his parents. And we must seize such moments as inspiration to greater deeds. This memory must be and will be kept fresh in our hearts. To all of us, Howard Koenemann calls:

"Ye that have faith to look with fearless eyes
Beyond the tragedy of a world at strife
And know that out of death and night shall rise
The dawn of ampler life,

"Rejoice, whatever anguish rends the heart,
That God has given you the priceless dower
To live in these great times and have your part
In freedom's crowning hour,

"That you may tell your sons, who see the light
High in the heavens—their heritage to take—
I saw the powers of darkness take their flight;
I saw the morning break."

Statement of R. S. Reynolds Before Truman Investigating Committee

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LISTER HILL

OF ALABAMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 7 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 1), 1944

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement by Mr. R. S. Reynolds, president of the Reynolds Metals Co. before the Truman Investigating Committee on June 19, 1944. Mr. Reynolds appeared before the committee at its request. I also ask consent to have printed immediately following the statement an article by Mr. I. F. Stone on Mr. Reynolds' statement entitled "This Is Really Enterprise."

There being no objection, the statement and article were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF R. S. REYNOLDS, PRESIDENT OF REYNOLDS METALS CO., BEFORE TRUMAN INVESTIGATING COMMITTEE AT ITS REQUEST, JUNE 19, 1944

Gentlemen, I am pleased to be called before this committee. It is high time that we get together and find post-war jobs for those heroes who will come back from the battlefields and for the thirty-odd million men who will be thrown out of battle plants. If we start now closing plants, we are laying up trouble for tomorrow.

I feel that we can find a use for all the aluminum production today; for example, in ships, landing boats, tanks, armor plate, and many items of essential consumers' goods. Indeed, shipments of aluminum products to consumers in March of this year were 232,000,000 pounds—almost as much in one month as the total aluminum production before the war. If we will sanely distribute the Government plants, I am positive we will find ample business to keep all aluminum plants busy when peace comes.

I have listed some suggestions which I would like to read and leave with you for your further consideration.

1. If aluminum should return to the hands of one producer, I prophesy that the sole producer would not be able to keep even its privately owned plants in full production. I cannot conceive of the steel industry, the automobile industry, the railroad industry, the housing industry, or the great consumer-goods industry adopting and becoming dependent upon a metal controlled by one company. If two independent companies could be placed in a strong competitive position, it would be only a question of time until new aluminum plants would have to be built to take care of the increased demand for this magic metal.

2. In my opinion, aluminum will not reduce the production of steel and other metals. On the contrary, I am certain it will increase such production. If steel refuses to make use of aluminum, I prophesy that the steel industry will find it difficult to maintain its present production in the world of tomorrow. If, on the other hand, it takes advantage of the insulating quality of aluminum which reflects 96½ percent of all radiant heat, of its resistance to corrosion, and of the reduction in weight which aluminum affords, I prophesy that the steel industry, as great as it now is, would yet have to double and redouble its production.

3. Aluminum will soon make use of soft woods of the forest which are now suitable only for fuel. It will give to the soft woods freedom from moisture, fire, and termites, and will give them the quality of insulation which will bring to the homes of the world freedom from excess heat in the summer and excess cold in the winter.

4. Aluminum will not replace steel in the railroad industry but as a cladding for steel will bring to the industry reduction in weight and consequent saving in fuel and power plus the supreme insulating value of aluminum together with its noncorrosive qualities.

5. Aluminum will provide farmers a superior protection in preserving fresh fruits, vegetables, and frozen foods, enabling the farmers to market their products throughout the year instead of forfeiting their profits in glutted markets at harvest time.

6. Aluminum in combination with magnesium will be used in huge quantities in all transportation by air, by land and by sea.

7. In the distribution of wholly owned Government plants due consideration should be given to the fact that Aluminum Co. of America and Reynolds Metals Co., on their own resources and at their own risk, multiplied by three the pre-war production of aluminum. Both expansions were ready when Pearl Harbor came. The Government-owned plants did not come into production until a year and a half thereafter. In addition to this contribution Aluminum Co. of America and Reynolds Metals Co. reduced the price of aluminum to the Government 25 percent at the time when all other metals were advancing in price.

8. The value of these Government plants is dependent upon their ability to compete with privately owned plants, particularly the large plants constructed in Canada and owned and operated by Aluminum Co. of Canada with large advances by our Government, firm orders and other protective provisions, all of which are familiar to your committee. Therefore, in fixing the prices and terms for these plants on the basis of a competitive position for world markets, it will be necessary for you to give due consideration to the net cost to Aluminum Co. of Canada of its plants and power developments, so built in this emergency, upon completion of its contracts with our Government. If the prices as thus determined should be considered too low then the Government might retain title to these plants, leasing them on the basis of an appropriate division of profits with the proviso that if after 3 years the plants are not in operation, the Government shall have the right to make other disposition of them.

[From New York PM of July 27, 1944]

A THING OR TWO—THIS IS REALLY ENTERPRISE

WASHINGTON.—While everybody is making after dinner speeches about free enterprise, there is very little of it around and what there is gets treated as a stepchild.

I give you the case of R. S. Reynolds, of Reynolds Metals, the first man in a generation to compete with Alcoa in the making of aluminum. This shrewd burly little man is one of those rare creatures, a genuine capitalist, a fellow with ideas and the nerve to risk his money on them.

When France fell Reynolds began preaching the need for more aluminum. And while the big fellows got their war plants from Jesse Jones on a silver platter, Reynolds had to mortgage everything he owned to qualify for an R. F. C. loan to make the light metal.

Reynolds came here several weeks ago to testify before the Truman committee, but no one paid any attention to his testimony. Everybody talks full employment in the large, where it will remain pie-in-the-sky. Nobody's interested in getting down to the job of achieving it, industry by industry.

The bogey of the sit-tight boys is that aluminum can only expand at the expense of steel and other materials, so what's the use? Reynolds provided some facts and figures on what aluminum could do, not only on its own, but in combination with other materials.

He showed how aluminum as an alloy could expand the market for steel by giving the heavier metal the benefit of its insulating qualities, its resistance to corrosion, and its weight reduction. He disclosed that used with soft woods, now suitable only for fuel, aluminum could provide a housing material free from moisture, fire, and termites.

He opened the door on new possibilities in agriculture by telling of his experiments in using aluminum foil to keep fruits and vegetables fresh for year-round marketing. Reynolds said he had wrapped oranges in aluminum foil "and 9 months after the oranges have lost practically no moisture and are full-sized."

But Reynolds, who learned about free enterprise the hard way, had one commonsense warning. "If aluminum should return to the hands of one producer," he told the Truman committee, "I prophesy that that sole producer would not be able to keep even its own privately owned plants in full operation. I cannot conceive of the steel industry, the automobile industry, the railroad industry, the housing industry, and the great consumer-goods industry adopting and becoming dependent on a metal controlled by one company."

Reynolds has a really big idea. He proposes that in disposing of war plants the Government sell aluminum facilities not only to Reynolds Metals but to a third company, an aluminum company which would be cooperatively owned by a group of big potential users—automobile and railroad equipment companies, for example.

Such a plant wouldn't be anywhere near enough to take care of their needs, but it would be enough to assure them that they could safely shift over to aluminum without being caught in a price squeeze. These potential users represent a market that would dwarf present aluminum capacity.

I challenge Eric Johnston, of the United States Chamber of Commerce, and Paul Hoffman, of the Committee for Economic Development, to be a little less fervent about free enterprise in the abstract and give this Reynolds down-to-brass-tacks program the boost it deserves.

I. F. STONE.

Our Heroes and Their Loved Ones Deserve the Best

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES H. MORRISON

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 7, 1944

Mr. MORRISON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, this Nation owes a great debt to the brave veterans of this war. After the last war proper provisions were not made for them and their dependents. This Congress of which I am proud to be a member was determined that this should not happen again. I am proud that I, as a Member of the Seventy-eighth Congress, worked, supported, and voted for the G. I. bill which is now law.

The Congress of the United States, fully aware of its obligations and responsibilities, has enacted the G. I. bill of rights and I am glad to have had a part in its passage. One can see at a glance that the Government of the United States is liberal with those who are wearing and have worn the uniform of their country; our servicemen are the best paid and the best equipped in the world; our veterans and their dependents receive more adequate care than any others in the world. Because of the different kind of warfare which has developed, the needs will change and many future requirements will have to be met, but our immediate duty is to help them readjust their lives to the new conditions that have been imposed upon them.

ALLOTMENTS AND ALLOWANCES FOR DEPENDENTS

Dependents of all grades of enlisted men and aviation cadets of the Army and Navy are eligible to receive a dependent's allowance from the Government in addition to the serviceman's allotment. Those men and women serving as officers come under another system. The allowances provided by the Government are as follows:

Class A dependents: A wife, $50; a wife and one child, $80; each additional child, $20. A divorced wife, $42; a divorced wife and one child, $72; and $20 for each additional child. Note: If the divorce or separation order of the court does not call for alimony or separate maintenance, the wife will not receive any allotment, and in case of a court order providing alimony or separate maintenance, she will get no more than the amount fixed by the court.

Class B dependents: The dependent must prove that he or she is substantially but not completely dependent upon the serviceman for support. A parent, $37; two parents, $37; a parent and any number of brothers and sisters, $37.

Class B–1 dependents: The dependent must prove that he or she is completely dependent upon the serviceman for support. One parent, $50; one parent and one brother or sister, $68; one parent and each additional brother or sister, $50 plus $11 for each brother or sister; two parents, $68; two parents and one brother or sister, $68, plus $11 for each brother or sister; a brother or sister but no parents, $42; each additional brother or sister without parents, $11.

It is important that men and women with dependents make application through their commanding officers for allotment and allowance, as these benefits will begin the date application is filed. Allotments are compulsory only for class A dependents. If the serviceman or woman for some reason or other fails to make application or is in a position where he or she cannot make application, any class A dependent can make application instead. The Army requires their regular application blank to be filled out; the Navy requires merely a letter giving the name of applicant's wife and children and dates of birth. In case a man is reported missing in action, the allotment and allowance continue to be paid for a period of a year, unless in the meantime his status is definitely determined.

Parents and brothers and sisters who can prove dependency can receive an allowance at the same time as wife and children. Parents can get an allowance from more than one son or daughter in the service. For instance, if two parents are greatly dependent upon a son or daughter in the service, they get $68 per month. Now, if another son or daughter in the service helped support these same parents, they can get another $37 from the second son or daughter.

The agency for the Navy having jurisdiction over allotments and allowances is: Bureau of Naval Personnel, Navy Department, Washington 25, D. C.; the agency for the Army is: Office of Dependency Benefits, War Department, 213 Washington Street, Newark, N. J. If you experience any difficulty contact your Congressman.

TEMPORARY AID FOR DEPENDENTS OF SERVICEMEN

Sometimes cases of extreme hardship arise involving dependents of servicemen. Many dependents, and even members of the armed forces themselves, are not fully acquainted with the two emergency agencies set up for the express purpose of helping such persons in need. These two agencies have branches all over the country. They are the Army Emergency Relief Fund, whose functions have recently been assigned to the Red Cross, and the Navy Relief Society, which also can be reached through the Red Cross.

ARMY RELIEF FUND

Any member of the armed forces in the Army can appeal to the Army Relief Fund, represented in all camps, or through the Red Cross if the soldier is not at camp, for needed immediate financial assistance. He will receive courteous and willing assistance at all times. The fund is also open to all dependents of men and women in the Army and anyone needing relief should get in touch at once with this fund through the local Red Cross.

NAVY RELIEF SOCIETY

Any serviceman or servicewoman in our naval forces or his dependents can appeal to this agency for urgent financial assistance. To get immediate action, it is advisable to take the case up through the Red Cross.

MUSTERING-OUT PAY

This benefit is payable to all honorably discharged personnel of our services whose rank is below captain in the Army and lieutenant, senior grade, in the Navy. Payments are made in the following sums: Personnel with less than 60 days' active service, $100; personnel with 60 days' or more active service, no part of which was outside continental United States or Alaska, $200; personnel with 60 day's or more active service, any part of which was outside continental United States or Alaska, $300. Whenever mustering-out payments amount to more than $100, payments are made in monthly intervals of $100 each. Servicemen who are discharged at their own request are not entitled to mustering-out pay.

FREE MEDICAL AND NURSING CARE FOR WIVES AND INFANTS OF MEN IN ARMED FORCES

In most States through cooperation with the Federal Government, a wife of any man in service may receive prenatal care from a qualified doctor at her home or at the doctor's office. At childbirth, whether the wife of the man in service stays at home or goes to a hospital, she and her baby can receive free medical and nursing care. Complete maternity care is provided including a physical examination 6 weeks after the baby is born. Besides all this, the baby is entitled to free medical care during the first year of life.

The wife should see a doctor at the first sign of pregnancy. She should then ask the doctor for an application form to apply for this free service if it is provided in that State. Fill out the application blank carefully. Be sure to include your husband's serial number. The wife fills in part 1 of the blank. Ask your doctor to fill in part 2. In the case of emergency, be sure that the doctor makes application for you within 48 hours after service is rendered. If the application is not made within 48 hours, no bills for medical or hospital service will be paid. The charges are paid directly to the hospital and the doctor and the nurse; no money is given to the wife. This service is extended to wives and infants of servicemen in Hawaii, Puerto Rico, and Alaska, but not to any other foreign country.

SERVICE-CONNECTED DISABILITY PENSIONS

Our honorably discharged veterans of all wars are entitled to a pension for disabilities incurred in or aggravated by their service in line of duty. The rates range from $10 per month for 10-percent disability to $100 per month for total disability. Special rates are payable for specific losses, such as hand, foot, or eye, blindness, and so forth, the highest rate being $250 per month.

The disability claim is filed by the veteran for benefits payable to him as the result of injury or disease resulting from military service. The award of compensation is based on the degree of disability, which is determined according to the Veterans' Administration schedule provisions. Any disability, except misconduct, is compensable if it is as much as 10 percent disabling. This application is known as form 526. It is simple to execute and seldom does one have any trouble answering the questions. Additional evidence is seldom required. This is particularly true on the adjudication of the initial claim. No subsequent formal claim need be filed. If the veteran is dissatisfied with his present rating, he can submit medical evidence to this effect.

However, it should be borne in mind that the doctor's statement must state not only his diagnosis but sufficient findings to warrant it. It is essential that this evidence show, or at least indicate, a higher degree of disability than the present evaluation. Upon receipt of competent medical evidence, the Veterans' Claim Service will authorize an official examination for rating purposes, thereby reopening the case for further consideration.

Except in cases of members of the military or naval service transferred from one Veterans' Administration facility to another, and except in cases of enlisted men discharged, for disability whose claims, with essential service and medical records, are forwarded to area offices for settlement, veterans should file claim on proper form which will be supplied them by any Veterans' Administration facility or the local representative of the American Red Cross. If the disabled person is insane or incompetent, the manager of the Veterans' Administration facility will file all necessary claims for him.

READJUSTMENT TO CIVIL LIFE

Education: One of the provisions of the so-called G. I. bill of rights offers an education to any man who has served for a period of 90 days, on or after September 16, 1940, and prior to the termination of the present war, and who was discharged under conditions other than dishonorable, and who was not over 25 years of age at the time he entered the service. Application must be made therefor within 2 years after discharge. The Government will pay to the school of the veteran's choice, up to $500 per year for tuition and books, and will pay to the veteran $50 per month maintenance if without dependents and $75 if he has dependents. In no event shall the total period of education exceed 4 years. There is also a provision for part-time attendance in a course of education or training at a reduced subsistence allowance or without allowance but with payment of tuition and other expenses.

A veteran also has the right to vocational education for service-incurred disabilities, extended to those who served during the period from September 16, 1940, to December 6, 1941.

Application for education and training should be made to the Director, Servicemen's Education and Training, Veterans' Administration, Washington, D. C.

Hospitalization and prosthetic appliances: Adequate hospital facilities are provided for the care and treatment of veterans for nonservice disabilities or diseases as well as for disabilities or diseases incurred in service.

The veteran has the right to adequate prosthetic appliances and necessary training to effect the greatest possible benefits in the use of such appliances.

Right of medical review of irregular discharge or release from active service: A veteran has the right of review in cases of irregular discharge or release from active service, (a) by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to determine whether the person at the time of committing the offense was insane, in event of which determination, benefits to which the person would otherwise be entitled shall not be forfeited; (b) except in case of separation by sentence of general court martial, any enlisted man or officer may have a review by an authorized board to determine the correctness of such discharge or dismissal; (c) any officer retired or released to inactive status without pay may likewise have a review by an authorized board to determine retirement rights.

Under both (b) and (c) above, the claim for review must be filed within 15 years after discharge or dismissal or within 15 years after the effective date of the act, whichever be the later.

Loans for the purchase or construction of houses, farms, and business property: Loans provided for the above-mentioned purposes or for the alteration or improvement of buildings or equipment may be guaranteed not to exceed 50 percent of the loan, the total amount guaranteed as to any one person not exceeding an aggregate of $2,000. Loans may be made by an individual or by private or public—State or Federal—lending agencies or institutions. The interest rate must not exceed 4 percent. The loan must be practicable and suitable to veterans' circumstances. The loan must be repaid in 20 years. Application must be made to the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, Veterans' Administration, Washington, D. C.

Employment of veterans: A veteran of any war, honorably discharged from any one of the services, has the right to register for employment and for placement in employment by the Veterans' Employment Service. He should contact his local United States Employment Office in his home town or county.

Unemployment compensation: There is also a provision for unemployment allowances of $20 per week while unemployed. To be eligible, the person must reside in the United States, be completely unemployed, or, if partially unemployed, at wages less than $23 per week, be registered with and report to a public employment office, be able to work, and available for suitable work.

Any person will be disqualified if he leaves suitable work voluntarily without good cause or is suspended or discharged for misconduct; if he, without good cause, fails to apply for suitable work offered; if he fails, without good cause, to attend an available free training course; if he is participating in a strike or labor dispute causing a work stoppage.

BENEFITS FOR DEPENDENTS AS A RESULT OF LOSS OF SON, DAUGHTER, HUSBAND, OR FATHER

There are four money benefits provided for the dependents of a deceased veteran: 6 months' gratuity payment, monthly insurance payments—if the servicemen applied for insurance—monthly pension, and back pay.

Gratuity: The gratuity is a lump-sum payment equal to 6 months' pay at the rate received at the date of death. In addition, the dependents of any private or seaman who dies in foreign service receive 20 percent of his base pay, and the dependents of any officer who dies in foreign service receive 10 percent of his base pay. If the serviceman was in either the flying service or submarine service, his dependents receive, in addition, 50 percent of his base pay. There is also a longevity provision in addition to the above amounts.

The gratuity is automatically paid to a wife of a deceased veteran, or, if there is no wife, it is automatically paid to the surviving child or children. It is not automatically paid to parents or brothers or sisters of an unmarried serviceman. The serviceman should designate someone of this latter class to receive it; however, if he does not, they may apply for it. If two parents survive, the amount is divided between them. A grandparent must show an insurable interest in order to receive it.

Application should be made by the surviving relative of a soldier to Gratuity Pay Branch, Finance Office, United States Army, 60 Florida Avenue NE., Washington, D. C., by the surviving relative of a seaman to Bureau of Naval Personnel, Navy Department, Washington 25, D. C.

Monthly insurance payments: This insurance is not paid in a lump sum; it is paid on a monthly basis, depending on the age of the beneficiary—the older the beneficiary, the higher is each monthly payment. On a $10,000 policy, if the beneficiary to whom payment is first made is under 30 years of age at the date of death of the insured, payments shall be made in 240 equal monthly installments, at the rate of $5.51 for each $1,000 of insurance. If the beneficiary to whom payment is first made is 30 or more years of age at the date of death of the insured, payment shall be made in equal monthly installments for 120 months certain, with such payment in installments continuing during the remaining lifetime of such beneficiary. For instance, under a $10,000 policy, a 50-year-old beneficiary will get $53.90 monthly. Under the same policy a 70-year-old beneficiary will get $85.10 monthly, and so forth.

It would be well to have parents and next of kin check with the men and women in service to see that all insurance policies are in order and in the hands of the beneficiaries. An insurance policy taken out by men and women in service can name any of the following as beneficiaries: Wife, husband, child, stepchild, illegitimate child, parents, brother, or sister, including those of half blood. There is nothing to prevent a parent or brother or sister from being the beneficiary of more than one serviceman.

All dependents and next of kin ought to check their insurance policy now. See that everything is in order now. It might save a lot of grief in the future. Negligence has caused many a beneficiary to lose out. A ittle care can avoid a lot of trouble should anything happen.

Monthly pension: This pension is paid automatically to a wife and children. All children under 18 are eligible. Children up to 21 are eligible if they are in school up to that time. If a child marries before 18 or 21, he or she is not eligible for this pension. Parents who have been dependent upon the deceased man or woman in service are also entitled to a pension. Parents who have been dependent upon a deceased serviceman can get a pension at the same time his wife and children are getting a pension. The amounts of the monthly pension are as follows:

One parent, $45 a month; two parents, $25 each; widow but no child, $50; widow with one child, $65, with $13 for each additional child; no widow but one child, $25; no widow but two children, $38 equally divided, with $10 for each additional child, the total not to exceed $100.

The fact that a widow, a child, or parents get the insurance does not prevent them from getting a pension also. They can collect both insurance and a pension.

Back pay due the serviceman: When a casualty occurs, that service man or woman who has become a casualty may have back pay coming. All this back pay is paid to the nearest heir. Application should be made by the surviving relative of a soldier to Finance Officer, United States Army, 60 Florida Avenue NE., Washington, D. C.; by the surviving relative of a seaman to Bureau of Naval Personnel, Navy Department, Washington 25, D. C.

Headstone for grave: Any person may make application for a headstone for the grave of any veteran of any one of the Army or Navy services whose service was honorable, to the Quartermaster General, War Department, Washington 25, D. C.

Burial allowance for any war veteran: After honorable service, reimbursement for burial may be allowed, not exceeding $100, on burial, funeral, and transportation expenses. Application should be made to Director, Dependent Claims Service, Veterans' Administration, Washington 25, D. C.

Burial in a national cemetery may be arranged for any honorably discharged veteran or for anyone who dies while in active service, with right of burial therein of his wife or widow, and under certain circumstances, his minor children or adult unmarried daughters.

WRITE FOR OTHER INFORMATION

It is practically impossible to cover briefly all the details of benefits available to veterans of this and previous wars. I have tried to outline the benefits relating primarily to World War No. 2 veterans. If anyone has special questions or individual problems not covered in this summary, I shall be glad for you to write to me personally.

Address by Hon. Samuel D. Jackson, of Indiana, Before the Connecticut Democratic State Convention

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCIS MALONEY

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 7 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 1), 1944

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there may be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by the able and distinguished junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. JACKSON] at the Democratic State convention on Friday last.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Ladies and gentlemen of this convention and fellow Americans, I feel singularly honored to be invited to address the Democratic convention of the State of Connecticut—the State of the former Govs. Wilbur L. Cross, Robert A. Hurley, and of ex-Senator Augustine Lonergan. I am honored to have been presented to you by one of your most distinguished sons, a noted national chairman of our party and Attorney General of the United States, Homer Cummings. It is gratifying to have an opportunity to speak to the friends and neighbors of one of the most distinguished Members of the United States Senate, a loyal friend of the President and the people, my colleague, the Honorable FRANCIS MALONEY.

The 1944 Democratic National Convention is now history. In many respects it is one of the most significant meetings of this generation. It submitted the future of this Nation, and perhaps the future of civilization itself to the jury of the American electorate. It closed the issues for this unprecedented wartime campaign and election.

It wrote a platform which was short, understandable, and unambiguous. It presented the candidacy of the man who will guide our destinies for another 4 years, Franklin D. Roosevelt.

Among other things, this convention proved that Democrats can air their difficulties, debate their sectional differences, discuss their delicate problems, and select their candidates for office out in the open—in the presence of 20,000 spectators, with 10,000,000 loudspeakers tuned in, and with all the world listening. There was nothing that needed to be hidden, nothing to be ashamed of, no group to be trammeled, and no one to be throttled.

By the instrumentality of that convention, millions of American voters of divers views, differing opinions, conflicting desires, and antagonistic purposes, openly solved their problems, arrived at a single message, and nominated a ticket satisfactory to all.

During the proceedings, each burst of applause and each noisy demonstration seemed to voice its own throaty utterance, like a mighty wave beating upon the rocks, but the sum total result was a steady thunder of Democratic enthusiasm like the noise of the surf—the sound that forecasts an acclaiming verdict of approval when election day rolls around in November.

The feature of that convention was, of course, the substitution of HARRY S. TRUMAN for HENRY A. WALLACE as a candidate for Vice President. There is no use blinking the fact that articulate groups called for one, or the other of these two outstanding American statesmen. This is a most natural and a truly American habit and course of action. But nobody was licked in the Democratic Convention at Chicago. To be licked implies a just punishment for unworthy conduct.

If those of labor were for MR. WALLACE, they were within their rights in every reasonable and honorable effort to advance his cause. There is room in the Democratic Party for labor in all its patriotically organized forms.

The workers still prefer, and shall continue to prefer, that party which, for the first time in history, guarded them against the exactions of conscienceless exploitation. They will be found in this campaign in the Democratic Party. The doors of the Republican house have been shut against them, and there is not a flickering candlelight of welcome for them there.

HENRY A. WALLACE is a great liberal and a great Democrat. He has taken a noble stand in what, to a man of lesser stature, would be a personal disappointment. He is not lost to the cause of liberalism. He, more than few men can, understands that his cause transcends men, elections, and political parties. HENRY A. WALLACE, honest and altruistic, is for Franklin D. Roosevelt and HARRY S. TRUMAN.

On the other hand, Senator TRUMAN is a just, kind, humble, industrious, and patriotic American. He is an able statesman. By his activities through the special committee of the Senate to investigate the national defense program, he has saved his country hundreds of millions of dollars. He has insured the greater safety of the armed forces of this Republic. He has greatly enhanced the quality and extent of the preparation of our armies and navies for the bloody combats awaiting them in every quarter of the globe.

For the dollars saved, the American taxpayer is everlastingly grateful. For the greater safety with which he has clothed and surrounded the last American boy, he deserves the unfailing prayers of the fathers and mothers of our men and women in uniform. For bringing a victorious end to this war just one day nearer, he deserves the blessings of Heaven.

The advances and achievements wrought in liberal legislation will be secure, and further gains will have ample opportunity for development within the common sense, acceptably progressive influence of HARRY S. TRUMAN as he presides over the Senate. He will make the United States of America a great Vice President for the next 4 years.

We are in the midst of the fiercest, most devastating war mankind has ever known.

We have said that America cannot afford to take a chance—that our people will not gamble with the lives of their sons, your sons and mine.

The opposition would have us believe that we and our noble allies already have our enemie: vanquished; their morale shattered, and their power destroyed. We wish we could believe that.

But our military authorities tell us that is not true. These authorities say that tremendous battles loom large between us and the ultimate surrender of enemy arms, or even the destruction of enemy morale.

America will win this war finally and completely, no matter who is elected President of the United States next November.

Yet, under the most favorable conditions, an administrative change, we know from experience, would mean change all the way down the official line. Change means interruption. Interruption means delay.

Every day of delay means the sacrifice of more American lives.

The American electorate will not vote for change, interruption, and delay.

We pray this war may end soon. The sooner the better—tomorrow—tonight—would not be too early. But our servicemen who have been away from home longer, and who have been farther away from home, than ever before in our history, realize, and so do their parents, that the Presidency which begins January 1945 will be a wartime Presidency, and not a peacetime Presidency.

What we contend is that a change of administration now might well prove to be the tragedy of this generation.

In terms of statesmanship, a comparison of the apparent dimensions of the G. O. P. aspirant with a man of the stature of the President rules out of the field of rational consideration this proposed substitution for the party of Franklin D. Roosevelt.

We do not condemn our adversaries' selection of a candidate so young, but we do expose the hypocrisy in their claim that the Presidency now needs a man of just his age.

What the Presidency demands now is not so much a bright young man as a man of wisdom and experience, with depth and breadth of vision.

The Old Guard would substitute themselves for an administration whose foresight led us from depths of poverty in 1932 to the high ground of 1940—converted a pacific nation of 1940 into the strongest military power on earth in 1944—and achieved more in war preparedness in 3½ years than the combined accomplishments of the Jap in a half century and the Nazi in a decade.

According to press reports, the G. O. P. candidate for the Presidency states that the country cannot face another period like the Roosevelt depression for some 8 years after 1933.

If that expression, "Roosevelt depression," makes sense, then logic has fled the campaign and inductive reasoning has lost its power.

That watchword that only Republicans are capable of dealing with the domestic problems of Federal administration—that watchword is a tired old man of many campaigns.

We know from bitter experience where their expertness in the field of domestic administration led us. After three uninterrupted terms in charge of the Government that expertness led us into the depths of depression.

President Hoover had no slide rule with which to find his way out of that disastrous quagmire. The country turned from the great engineer to a Democrat. The country will not turn back from that Democrat to a pupil of the great engineer.

Our adversaries scorn our claim that we should not change administrations now on account of the war.

At the end of the Spanish American War, in the summer of 1898, the people of this country looked forward to the work of a peace commission. That commission was to crystalize the gains made by our victory over Spain. That had been a war which, without overstating the case, was neither as furious nor as widespread as World War No. 2. We faced the off-year election of November 1898. But the war was over. The enemy had surrendered. The peace negotiations were just in the offing when the campaign came on. But we were clearly the victor, and the vanquished could but yield to our terms.

Certainly those were circumstances under which a plea for uninterrupted continuation of the administration of the party then in power would have less potency than now. There is certainly a thousand times the weight in the argument today that the present war administration should continue uninterruptedly than was true under the comparatively easy circumstances of 1898.

But even so, the Republican campaign of 1898 was pitched upon the plane that we should not change the complexion of Congress on account of the tendency of that step to weaken the hands of the peace commissioners.

In that campaign, Albert J. Beveridge, of Indiana, prominent Republican leader and spokesman, in a campaign speech in his own home State, in September, said:

"If the administration is defeated at the polls, will England believe we have accepted the results of the war? Will Germany be discouraged from interfering with our settlement of the war * * *? Will Russia * * * regard us as a steadfast people? * * * The world is observing us today. * * * Think of England abandoning its ministry at the moment it was securing the fruits of a successful war. Think of Germany rebuking Bismarck at the moment he was dictating terms of peace to France. What would America say of them if they should do such a deed of mingled insanity, perfidy, and folly? What would the world say of America if * * * the American people should rebuke the administration * * * and place a hostile House and Senate in Washington? God forbid! When a people show such inconstancy, such childlike fickleness as that their career as a power among nations is a memory."

In the same campaign Theodore Roosevelt, in an address in New York on October 5, said:

"I should ask the people of this country to support the administration of President McKinley, if for no other reason than because, say what you will, the victory at the polls of the men who are opposing and denouncing his administration in this election will be interpreted abroad as meaning, on the part of America, a repudiation of the war from which we have just emerged triumphant. * * * It will result in partial undoing what our Army and Navy have accomplished."

Ex-President Benjamin Harrison, in a letter appearing in the press just a few days before election day in that year, said:

"Our election results should not give, or even seem to give encouragement to those who would find in our discords and divided counsels their advantage."

President McKinley, in a campaign tour through the Middle West, at Clinton, Iowa, October 11, 1898, uttered the following:

"The Army and Navy of the United States have won not only our praise, but the admiration of the world. Our achievements on land and sea are without parallel in the world's history. * * * We want no differences at home until we have settled our differences abroad."

In the light of such illustrious precept and example from such unfailing authority, what Republican in 1944 can deny that it is the bounden duty of the Democratic Party to point out to America that although we will win this war in any event, still, change now might well prove to be the tragedy of this generation.

I believe the vast majority of Americans in both political parties want peace—and perpetual peace—based upon common international action supported by effective implementation to guarantee to the 10,000,000 returning veterans that their sons will be spared a recurrent war.

But it is folly to assume that because a majority of each party desires that end that, therefore, there is no reasonable difference between the two parties as to which gives the greater hope for that permanent peace.

When the President was striving to lead the Nation in preparation for our defense, the Republican leadership, seeking to damage his prestige, was demanding a foreign policy which would have played directly into the hands of the Axis war lords.

They called the recognition of Russia a fuzzy-minded departure from sound policy. They attacked lease-lend, the salvation of the lives of millions of our own boys, as threatening an end of free government in the United States.

Then they leaped from nonparticipation pillar to world cooperation post. Then they began to speak of "durable cohesion" and "solid relations" among the United States, Great Britain, Russia, and China.

And now, while mankind the world around is still engulfed in tragedy, the G. O. P. proposes to our suffering people that we hold the world together by that verbal hybrid of the new Republican lexicon "peace force," the paternity of which no one admits and which nobody understands and nobody will explain.

Compare that with the clear, courageous, and unmistakable language of the Democratic platform adopted at our convention in Chicago.

What about the writing of the peace? At the peace table Churchill, Stalin, and Chiang Kai-shek will be grasping each for his own post-war advantage, and justifiably so. The people want our representative to have an equal chance—to be big enough to hold his own.

Is a man of 42 to sit down at the table for us with Chiang Kai-shek who is 58, Churchill who is 69, and Stalin who is 64?

In Franklin D. Roosevelt is to be found a combination of knowledge and fervor rising to the heights of the growing soul of America, and matching the sublimity of the people's prayers for a just and durable peace. He knows the men with whom we shall have to deal. He knows the forces which will be brought into play. He has an enthusiasm for the field. The best is none too good for the United States of America.

Less than 60 days ago the greatest military expedition of all time crossed the choppy waters of the English Channel and landed on the beaches of Normandy.

There was launched the genius, the sacrifice, and 3½ years of the toil of our people.

That flotilla of 4,000 ships and 11,000 aircraft carried the best trained and best equipped soldiers we have ever sent to war.

They are neither Republicans nor Democrats. They are not interested in politics. But they want to see the Stars and Stripes above Berlin (and Tokyo, too, for that matter). Then they want to get home. And then they want to be assured that we have put an end to this succession of murderous conflicts.

They want another thing. They want economic post-war security. This administration has laid down early outlines for post-war reconstruction according to the Baruch report. Part of that plan has already been turned into law for the cancelation of war contracts, settlements, and plant clearance. This highly industrial state will seen be reassured by further legislation fostered by this administration looking toward the disposal of surplus commodities and the careful readjustment of millions of industrial workers. Human demobilization, plant demobilization, and surplus property legislation is now under active consideration and will be before the Senate next week. The G. I. bill, already law, takes care of the rehabilitation and readjustment of the returning veteran.

And right here let me make the observation that the Republican Party has sought to create the impression that because of the war Congress and the administration have deliberately undertaken to fasten upon the people by grants of extraordinary power to the Executive, certain controls, unlimited and indefinite as to time.

Not only is this not true, but on the contrary by the very language of these acts themselves the exercise of any perpetual or protracted unusual controls is specifically prohibited.

Every grant of extraordinary power carries with it its own limitation as to time, as witness lend-lease, stabilization, and war-power legislation.

All such extraordinary powers expire by lapse of time unless renewed by the act of Congress. Congress also has retained the right to terminate these powers at its own will by concurrent resolution of the two bodies, not requiring the approval of the President.

This administration demonstrated by a program of economic relief and social reform, both long and broad, that it has the knowledge, vision, and courage to achieve a sound reconstruction. Industry, on its own efforts, will do much to absorb the 10,000,000 men when they return and to reconvert to peacetime production, transportation, and assimilation of goods. But industry and organized labor, great as their achievements may honestly and wisely be expected to become, will sorely need to be complemented by the hands of a sound and experienced governmental administrator.

So, while we await the outcome of our soldiers' long, hard march to Berlin, now in the midst of their rendezvous with destiny, let this convention resolve to guarantee to them their best hope for an early victory, a permanent peace, and a secure post-war economy.

Let us leave this convention touched with the livid fire of conviction that Franklin D. Roosevelt is the most valuable public servant in the world today and that to retain his party in power until the job is done is a noble cause, and our best opportunity to serve the great State of Connecticut, and the names of all her illustrious sons and daughters, living and dead.

Japan's Soldiers Victims of the Opium Habit

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. COCHRAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 7, 1944

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, under the permission granted me, I include as part of my remarks an editorial from the Bangor (Maine) Daily News of Wednesday, June 28, 1944. It follows:

HIMSELF DUG THE PIT

Perfectly poetic justice works through the news that thousands of China's own invaders are falling victims to the opium habit. Tokyo's semiofficial Domei warns Japan's soldiers against the vice—and there would be no such public warning if there weren't a definite public peril.

Many months ago, United States Commissioner of Narcotics Harry J. Anslinger told how Nipponese conquerors set up and operated opium concessions as almost their first act after formal occupation of any seized district. It was a thoroughly established and carefully planned maneuver, with the intent of rendering the conquered people incapable of revolt.

What the Japanese overlooked is the rule that the drug traffickers are themselves dangerously open to those insidious temptations which they spread. Shakespeare said it:

"For 'tis the sport to have the enginer Hoist with his own petar."

Higgins Exposes Labor Black Market

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. F. EDWARD HÉBERT

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 7, 1944

Mr. HÉBERT. Mr. Speaker, on August 1 the House Military Affairs Committee made public an important report. This report, which was prominently displayed on the front pages of the Nation, condemned the vicious black market practice of hoarding and trafficking in skilled aircraft manufacturing labor by "engineering service" firms.

The committee's report, while otherwise to be commended, was noticeable for one serious omission. It failed to give proper credit to a man and to an aircraft company in my congressional district who have played a leading role in the exposure of this labor-hoarding at a profit. I refer to Andrew J. Higgins and Higgins Aircraft, Inc., of New Orleans.

The House committee report of August 1 related how Higgins Aircraft, Inc., had paid out $1,303,608.42 to three so-called engineering service subcontractors, but omitted to tell why Higgins Aircraft was forced to pay out this sum or how Higgins had over a period of months exerted every effort to have the Government end this monopolistic and costly practice.

Mr. Higgins already is known the world over for his invention and manufacture of the famous landing boat which bears his name, of PT boats of the type which spearheaded the invasion of Europe, nad of many other products. His immense war contributions have been praised by President Roosevelt, General Marshall, General Eisenhower, and Admiral King. Only 2 weeks ago, he delivered his ten-thousandth landing boat to the United States Navy. He takes justifiable pride in the fact that he is able to build things faster and better and cheaper than anyone else.

By its omissions and its failure to clearly lay the foundation of events in this matter, the committee's report has done a grave injustice to an organization which should merit he highest praise for its courage and zeal in taking the lead in exposing practices which it abhorred.

This injustice to Mr. Higgins is all the more striking in view of the fact that this is the second black market in the war production program which Mr. Higgins and his associates have brought to light. Some of you may recall that in the summer of 1942 during congressional hearings into the causes for cancelation of the Higgins Liberty ship contract at Micheaud, La., Mr. Higgins and his sons exposed a black market in steel. As a matter of fact, they first made the public conscious of the term "black market" as it existed in the United States.

I have taken the trouble to check the records and the documents in this case. The facts show conclusively that Mr. Higgins and his associates last winter started the ball rolling against this labor-hoarding racket; they called it to the attention of Government agencies and investigating committees; they protested and complained and crusaded. They were directly responsible for the first publicity which shed the light of day on these practices. Over a 7-month period they have waged a continuing campaign. Yet, the House committee report did not cover any of this early background.

It is my purpose here to show, by a simple recitation of the facts that Andrew Higgins and associates are due official praise and citation for exposing a nefarious practice which they abhorred but which was considered a usual thing by other airplane manufacturers. Higgins led the way in condemning this brokerage of skilled labor, and others followed in his wake.

Construction of Higgins Aircraft, Inc., was begun January 13, 1943, when the Army Air Forces awarded the company a contract for 1,200 plywood cargo airplanes. That plant, covering 48 acres, the largest in the country for building transport planes, was built in 8 months—far ahead of schedule. At its dedication October 24, 1943, the fact was brought out that it was one of the few cost-plus plants in the country completed within its cost estimate and ahead of scheduled time.

On August 3, 1943, the Army Air Forces shifted the contract from plywood to metal planes. For the next several months, the plant had to be untooled and retooled for metal construction. Then, as the plant became ready for tool-up production, the recruiting of personnel got underway. That was when Mr. Higgins and his men first became aware of this vicious racket operated by labor brokers disguising themselves as "engineers subcontractors' services."

The officials of the new aircraft company discovered that labor brokers in the guise of engineering concerns had obtained a corner on the market supply of certain types of scarce and highly skilled technicians. These companies, operating mainly in the vicinity of Detroit and Chicago, had set themselves up in business as suppliers to the aircraft industry of tool designers, machinists, loftsmen, and other specialized technicians. Their services were sold to the manufacturers at excessive and exorbitant rates of pay, higher than the rates which Higgins Aircraft, Inc., were permitted to pay in New Orleans under the wage stabilization program.

Mr. Higgins and his associates found themselves in the position of being compelled to subcontract for the services of these men. Aircraft had never before been manufactured in New Orleans and there was no local supply of skilled labor for the tooling up of this plant. Accordingly, Higgins Aircraft, by necessity and not by choice, entered into subcontracts with three of these concerns at rates of pay set by the engineering service companies, with the idea of utilizing these services only until the company could hire its own specialized personnel.

Almost immediately Mr. Higgins and Higgins Aircraft, Inc., began their compaign to end this evil practice. This campaign took the form of registering vigorous protests with the proper Government agencies in Washington and at the same time requesting of the War Manpower Commission the right to recruit its own personnel in other States in order to replace the employees of the so-called engineering services.

On February 11, 1944, Mr. Frank O. Higgins, vice president of Higgins Aircraft, sent a letter of protest to the Truman committee. This was addressed to Mr. Hugh Fulton, chief counsel for the committee. This letter is extremely significant because to our knowledge it was the first protest that anyone registered against this labor brokerage scheme. I am going to quote it here in full, and in so doing let me call attention to the fact that it was written 6 months before the House Military Affairs Committee report was made public. Following is the text of Mr. Higgins' important and detailed letter to the Truman committee:

FEBRUARY 11, 1944.

MR. HUGH FULTON,
Chief Counsel, Special Committee Investigating the National-Defense Program, United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. FULTON: The purpose of this letter is to bring to your attention, and to protest against, a deplorable condition which is seriously retarding our operations and increasing production costs, and as it is prevalent throughout the aircraft industry, must be similarly affecting other aircraft manufacturers.

Listed below are the classifications of craftsmen that it is necessary for us to employ in the performance of our contract to build C-46A airplanes, together with the maximum hourly rates that we are permitted to pay under the schedule approved by the Wage Stabilization Unit of the United States Treasury Department:

Tool designer	$1.75
Loftsman	1.50
Production planner	1.45
Jig builder	1.45
Tool and die maker	1.45
Template maker	1.30

From the moment that our first airplane contract was announced, we were prematurely besieged with offers from countless engineering service companies throughout the country to supply engineering talent to us at rates ranging up to $4.50 per man-hour, which we consistently declined, naively believing that we could avoid this exorbitant expense by direct employment. However, after months of determined but unsuccessful efforts to build up our own technical personnel, we came to the realization that the numerous engineering concerns had a monopoly on the services of men of this caliber, and in order to complete our processing, planning, tool designing, and lofting in time to meet our schedule, we were forced to negotiate with some of these firms to supply the men vitally needed, on a contract basis.

It is impossible for us to compete for the services of these men because, for some unknown reason, engineering service firms are seemingly exempt from the limitations of the Wage Stabilization Unit and hire them at rates as high as $2.50 per hour, plus a maintenance allowance of $48 a week. Notwithstanding the fact that we are prohibited from paying wages that would induce these engineers to work directly for us, an agreement to pay these labor hoarders as high as $4.50 per man-hour for straight time is recognized as an allowable, reimbursable item of cost by the Contract Section of the United States Army Air Forces.

The injustices of such a situation is obvious and its disastrous effects upon the progress and harmony of our organization are numerous and far reaching. Due to the freedom of action that these firms evidently enjoy, they pursue their operations in a manner characteristic of racketeers, even to the point of brazenly proselyting labor right in our own territory and even in this plant. We refer to instances where men we had hired were approached by spokesmen of these operators upon their arrival in New Orleans and lured onto their pay rolls at higher wages before they reported to us, and then loaned to us at their outrageous fee. Their recommendations as to the capabilities of the men they furnish cannot be depended upon, as they have no scruples against sending men who have had no previous experience and of questionable reputation, and our constant vigilance is required to detect and weed out such characters. The apparent immunity from regulations under which these manipulators thrive seems to contagiously encourage among their employees an attiude of irresponsibility and disregard of ethics, as they frequently violate our company rules and commit acts of personal misconduct for which we have to demand their recall. Our own men in these categories, working side by side with these subcontracted men, doing the same work at considerably lower pay, are disgruntled and are constantly attempting to obtain their release so that they can sign up with the engineering service companies. Of course, we can deny their release, but when workmen are forced to stay on the job, in such a frame of mind and under such inequitable conditions, the quality, efficiency, and volume of their work is lowered, resulting in an undermining of our entire organization. The additional expense to which we are subjected as a result of this arrangement is appalling. At the present time we have over 400 engineering service men working for us at an average weekly cost of $105,000, whereas if this same number of men were on our own pay roll their aggregate wages would amount to approximately $35,000 weekly.

Although at the present time we have agreements with only three of these firms—Michigan Designing & Engineering Co., Detroit, Mich.; Affiliated Engineering Co., Detroit, Mich., and Carney Engineering Co., New York, N. Y.—we are still being endlessly solicited by others who profess to have considerable quantities of available man-hours to place at our disposal. It is difficult to understand, in these times, how parasitical enterprises with no contracts of their own can maintain a monopoly of hoarded engineering talent at extravagant remuneration and subsist by victimizing aircraft companies with contracts vital to the war effort, who are at their mercy because of the critical shortage of technical personnel.

We can suggest one of two methods of remedying this paralyzing state of affairs. First, subcontracts for engineering services could be outlawed—disallowed as a reimbursable item of expense—in the performance of all Army and Navy aircraft contracts throughout the country, as well as all other Government contracts using this type of assistance. Obviously, this would necessitate the engineering service companies' recalling all their men working in the Nation's various aircraft factories and finally releasing them to seek individual connections at existing wage levels. Such a directive would have to be absolute in scope to be effective, but would result in a tremendous saving to the Government. The other solution would be to boost the rates approved for craftsmen in these classifications to a point that would permit aircraft companies to compete with the engineering services in the hiring of such personnel. While this procedure would not be so economical as the first suggestion it would bring relief to the aircraft industry by placing it in an equitable position to not only raise the morale of the men now in their employ but to break up these labor pools and eliminate the excessive profits now going into the coffers of these scavengers.

We earnestly recommend this matter to your committee for immediate investigation and correction because the taxpayers who must bear the burden of the exorbitant costs, and the armed forces who are deprived of maximum production as a result of this intolerable condition, are the ultimate sufferers.

The attached list shows the names and addresses of engineering concerns who have approached us both by letter and representative's personal vists, and we will be glad to supply any additional information in our possession that you may request.

Yours very truly,

HIGGINS AIRCRAFT, INC.,
FRANK O. HIGGINS,
Vice President.

Attached to this letter was a list containing the names of 40 engineering service companies which had solicited Higgins Aircraft, Inc., with offers to furnish technical personnel.

Acknowledging receipt of this letter and its attachment, Mr. Fulton, on February 16, wrote Mr. Higgins as follows:

Thank you for your letter of February 11. The committee is checking into the matter.

Sincerely yours,

HUGH FULTON,
Chief Counsel.

Mr. Higgins sent copies of his February 11 Truman committee letter to high officers of the Army Air Forces Material Command with a note to each officer which said "Anything that you can do to assist in alleviating conditions described will be greatly appreciated." Army Air Forces officers who received this correspondence were: Brig. Gen. O. R. Cook, Chief, Administrative Staff, Production Division, Wright Field, Dayton, Ohio; Brig. Gen. Raymond G. Harris, District Supervisor, Midwestern Procurement Division, Wichita, Kans.; Col. W. M. Morgan, Production Engineering Section, Wright Field, Dayton, Ohio; Lt. G. H. Moriarity, Chief, Industrial Service Branch, Wright Field, Dayton, Ohio; Lt. Col. Walter Winston, Administration Assistant, C–46 Production Committee, Buffalo, N. Y.

Acknowledging receipt of Mr. Higgins' letter and enclosure, Lieutenant Colonel Winston wrote Mr. Higgins February 25, as follows:

1. This office is in receipt of your letter dated February 16, 1944, subject as above, enclosing a copy of your letter dated February 11, 1944, to Mr. Hugh Fulton, chief counsel of the Truman investigating committee, on this subject.

2. The particular situation to which you refer has been a matter of great concern to this office and has been repeatedly commented upon by representatives of this office and other Army Air Forces personnel concerned.

3. Copies of your letter are being forwarded to the Material Command at Wright Field with the request that all assistance possible be rendered you in the solution of your problem.

4. Copies of your letter are also being furnished all executive members of the C–46 Production Committee for their information and further action if desired.

Mr. Frank O. Higgins also sent copies of his Truman committee letter to Chairman Donald M. Nelson of the War Production Board, and Mr. Charles E. Wilson, Executive Vice Chairman of the Board. In his letter to Mr. Wilson dated February 17, Mr. Higgins complained of "these practices which are seriously hampering our own progress here and undoubtedly asserting a similar effect on the aircraft industry as a whole."

Following is the reply of Mr. Wilson, dated February 22:

DEAR MR. HIGGINS: This will acknowledge with appreciation copy of letter written by you to Mr. Hugh Fulton, regarding engineering service companies. I am of the opinion that there is a great deal to what you present.

I appreciate your kind invitation to visit your plant, and I assure you that when possible, I will do so.

On March 11, 1944, Chairman Nelson acknowledged receipt of Mr. Higgins' letter as follows:

Thank you for your letter of February 26, and the copy of your letter dated February 11 to Mr. Hugh Fulton, chief counsel, Special Committee Investigating the National Defense Program, United States Senate, concerning the engineering service companies who have solicited your organization with offers to furnish technical personnel.

I have brought this matter to the attention of Mr. T. P. Wright, Director of the Aircraft Resources Control Office, who informs me that this practice of numerous engineering concerns circularizing the aircraft industry for engineering contracts was brought up in a recent meeting of the Aircraft Production Board, and steps are being taken to effect a solution as soon as possible.

From the Truman committee letter by Mr. Higgins we have seen how the vice president of Higgins Aircraft, Inc., on February 11 condemned and requested governmental action against the gouging black market in skilled aircraft labor. Now, let us trace the next steps which Higgins took in his efforts to end or remedy this condition.

In early March Andrew Higgins sent to Washington as his personal representative Col. John H. Jouett, executive vice president of Higgins Aircraft, Inc. In conferences with high officials of Government departments Colonel Jouett personally called this racket to their attention. As Mr. Higgins' representative he pointed out that these so-called engineering service companies were operating as brokers supplying technical labor at excessive fees to his company. He showed that such costs increased the cost of production at the Higgins Aircraft plant—a cost borne by the taxpayers of the United States. Colonel Jouett further pointed out that the presence of these over-paid employees tended to cause labor unrest among the men and women of Higgins Aircraft, Inc. Moreover, it was stressed by Colonel Jouett that such a condition violated the letter and the spirit of the stabilization and the manpower control programs.

In these conferences Colonel Jouett made clear that Mr. Higgins had accepted his cost-plus contract to build cargo airplanes at the lowest percentage of profit ever asked by any contractor. Mr. Higgins is not a war profiteer and was particularly upset that others were being allowed to profiteer excessively upon his own contracts.

On March 2 and 3 Colonel Jouett conferred with the Vice Chairman of the War Labor Board, with officials of the Aircraft Production Division of W. P. B., and with officers of the Army Air Forces.

Gen. Oliver P. Echols of the Army Air Forces appeared gravely concerned and quite surprised at the extent to which this activity had gone. He asked Colonel Jouett to supply him with complete information. Upon being given a copy of Frank O. Higgins' letter to the Truman committee, General Echols and his staff took the matter up with the War Manpower Commission.

Colonel Jouett also saw Comptroller General Lindsay C. Warren and his chief legal adviser. They, too, had no conception of what was going on in this racket and did not see how their office was concerned therewith. They took the position that the Comptroller General's office must approve payment for any services or costs which are made in good faith and are approved by the contracting officer if in line with costs or prices which have to be paid.

Writing from Washington on March 9, Colonel Jouett advised Mr. Higgins in New Orleans:

Our action has spread like wildfire throughout Government circles and the aircraft industry. The Glenn L. Martin Co. has filed a letter of protest against the engineering firms, and one or two others have officially expressed themselves also. They all abhorred the racket but none of them did anything about it. It was like Mark Twain and the weather.

At the present moment Higgins Aircraft is hailed as a constructive force.

Colonel Jouett concluded:

Since dictating the above, I have talked to Mr. Charles E. Wilson, Executive Vice Chairman of the W. P. B., and he is a thousand percent in favor of the action we are taking. He said that if the racket is not busted up, it will become a national scandal, and he is happy that Higgins is taking the lead.

The Baltimore Sun, supplied with information by Mr. Higgins and associates, published the first complete account of this manpower racket in its issue of March 26. The page 1 article, under a Washington date line, was headlined "Labor black-market operations described." Following are the lead paragraphs:

WASHINGTON, March 26.—Predicting that the War Labor Board very shortly will take action to abolish the racket, Government officials today confirmed the existence of a widespread black market in skilled labor that is smashing wage ceilings and disrupting industrial relations.

To illustrate its cost to the taxpayers, they cited the case of one war contractor who reported he had been compelled to hire—at the Government's expense—over 400 men "at an average weekly cost of $105,000," or about $260 per man.

The contractor added in a complaint to the Truman committee that, had he been able to avoid the black market and hire the same men at the ceiling wage rates fixed by the Government, the cost to the taxpayers would have been only $35,000 a week, or about $85 per man.

The operations of the black market are a combination of labor hoarding and circumvention of wartime wage ceilings, according to officials who—as representatives of the W. L. B., War Manpower Commission, and Army and Navy procurement agencies—have seeking, in a series of conferences here, ways to break it up.

This, they say, is the way the racketeers operate:

They form, or take over, a so-called engineering service company.

In that guise, they corral and attach to their pay rolls as many skilled machinists as they can pirate away from manufacturers with guarantees of higher wages than the latter are allowed to pay such men under wartime ceilings.

Aided by the scarcity of skilled labor produced by their hoarding activities, they compel manufacturers to contract with them for workers, who are provided as though part of a legitimate engineering service.

The workers involved are given fictitious semi-professional job classifications to take them out from under the wage ceilings fixed for the work they actually perform and are paid, instead as high as $6.50 an hour plus $6 a day for subsistence.

The racketeer, who collects from the manufacturer and pays the men, charges as high as $12.50 an hour for their time and pockets the difference as his fee.

The W. M. C.'s region No. 5 management-labor committee at Cleveland has provided an example of the profits accruing to the racketeers.

It is hardly necessary to identify the contractor in the second paragraph as Mr. Higgins.

Further down in the story the Sun credits Higgins with initiating action with the Truman committee, as follows:

PUT ON TRAIL BY HIGGINS

The Truman committee was put on the trial of the labor black market by Frank O. Higgins, vice president of Higgins Aircraft, Inc., New Orleans. Mr. Higgins appended a lengthy February 11 letter to the committee a list of 40 "engineering service companies who have solicited Higgins Aircraft, Inc., with offers to furnish technical personnel."

The Sun article concluded by quoting a number of paragraphs from Frank Higgins' letter.

In the first week of March, Bill Cunningham, syndicated columnist of the Boston Herald and other newspapers, visited New Orleans, and the Higgins plants. During the course of his stay, Mr. Higgins gave Cunningham information about the racket with the idea that additional publicity might bring official attention and possibly correction.

In his column of April 4, 1944, published in about 25 newspapers, Cunningham, without naming the plant, reported on details of the racket, as it existed at Higgins Aircraft. Here are the opening paragraphs of that article:

During that recent swing of the map, this reporter stumbled across a by-product of the labor situation that seems to cry to the stars in the Star-Spangled Banner for a congressional investigation and a neckbreaking crackdown. If it's what it seems to be, it's as deliberate a steal from the taxpayer's pocket as any profiteering vulture ever managed to operate.

It seems to be a straight case of extortion in war plants—the old badger game without benefit of badger. War plants in aircraft manufacturing are the principal victims. Plants in Detroit, St. Louis, and New Orleans have paid through the nose. The polite name covering the steal is Engineering Service.

The gist of it is that these engineering services form pools of skilled labor and then hire them to war contractors desperately in need of such men at extortionist prices, pocketing the difference, and it's a very rich difference, indeed. This is strictly a black market in skilled labor—a complete bypassing of the Wage Stabilization Act.

After pointing out that "the Government is doing nothing about these hoarders," Cunningham concluded his article as follows:

As it is, the ultimate sufferers are the taxpayers, who must support these cost-plus parasites, and the armed forces, deprived of maximum production and maximum war plant morale unless a broker's price is met, and even after it has been met.

It seems more than ridiculous, took at a time when talk of a labor draft, a IV–F draft, and all the rest keeps filling the air. These pools broken up and the labor placed in normal circulation would straighten out at least part of the picture. There's no secret about these firms. Their names and addresses can be had easily. They solicit openly, and it's more than possible they're perfectly legal as the laws are now drawn. But legal right and moral right can be two different things. This is wrong. It's absurd. It's theft. Congress should get busy.

After all of this ground work had been laid by Higgins Aircraft, Inc., five Government agencies on April 12 condemned the labor-hoarding racket in O. W. I. press release No. B 1933. Following is the lead paragraph of this release:

A program for combating on several fronts the so-called engineering service companies which purport to provide engineering service to war contractors but actually operate as brokers supplying skilled labor at exorbitant rates was jointly announced today by the National War Labor Board, War Manpower Commission, War and Navy Departments, and Maritime Commission as a result of conferences between representatives of these agencies who have for some time been studying the practices of some of these companies.

The release goes on to say that individual plans of action have been drafted by these various agencies which are concerned with the so-called engineering service companies which render little, if any, engineering service, but really serve as a labor broker supplying skilled workers for excessive fees.

The plans call for establishing stabilized rates that can be paid to workers.

Meantime, the "engineering service" companies continued to pursue their trade.

One Chicago firm, March 21, solicited Higgins Aircraft, Inc., attaching letters of reference and recommendation from officials of the Army Air Forces, United States Maritime Commission, and the office of the Secretary of the Navy.

On June 5 the Department of Justice announced that a Federal grand jury in Detroit had handed down an indictment charging four persons with defrauding the Government in the handling of subcontracts for machine tools used in construction of B–24 bombers at the Ford plants.

One of those indicted was Andrew Kalman, one of the proprietors of the Affiliated Engineering Co. This company, according to the Associated Press report of the indictment, made exorbitant profits through padding pay rolls, using fictitious time sheets, charging for the work of nonexistent persons and charging for the time of designers who actually worked elsewhere.

This is one of the three companies Higgins Aircraft had been crusading against.

The officials of Higgins Aircraft, Inc., have said that the employees of these labor pools were a disturbing element in their plant. They violated company and Army regulations, boasted to the Higgins employees of their superhigh wages and in some cases even tried to pirate Higgins' own men away from him. Let me cite an actual case. On February 8 an employee of Higgins Aircraft, in charge of a scheduling section in the plant, who had been on the job for 10 months, tended his resignation. Questioned as to why he was leaving he told a company executive that he had learned he could increase his income from the rate of $1.75 per hour to $2.50 an hour by accepting a position with a contract engineering firm. That these men were disturbing influences was admitted by the Michigan Designing & Engineering Co. in a memorandum issued March 21, 1944, "To all supervisors, leaders, and personnel of Michigan Designing & Engineering Co." This memo went on to say that men violating the time card punching regulations were committing fraud and subject to prosecution under Federal laws. The memo added:

There has been a tendency of some men in the past to come in when they felt like it, also coming in late and working just as their mood fitted the occasion—going home early and in plan old American talk, doing as they damned please. This practice must and will cease.

During the spring and early summer Higgins Aircraft, Inc., proceeded to replace the subcontracted engineering service employees with their own personnel as rapidly as competent engineering help became available in its allowable wage scale or could be trained. The employees of one of these companies was reduced from 258 men in early 1944 to less than 50 as of May 20. Meanwhile, Higgins officials had gone to the War Manpower Commission and repeatedly requested permission to recruit skilled and technical personnel in the States of Oklahoma, Kansas, Missouri, Arkansas, and others in order to procure its own production planners, loftsmen, and process men from such areas and thereby release labor brokers' employees. Clearance for this recruiting was finally granted May 1 and men are being brought in as rapidly as they can be hired. Meantime, the rates of these labor racketeers had been increased.

Michigan Designing & Engineering Co. advised Higgins Aircraft, May 20, 1944, that the new rate effective June 26, for overtime would be $5.50 per hour worked in excess of 8 hours in any one calendar day and in excess of 40 hours in any one week.

On June 5 Higgins Aircraft sent to Mr. H. Ralph Burton, general counsel for the House Military Affairs Committee, complete information as to its contracts with the Michigan Designing & Engineering Co., Affiliated Engineering Co., and Carney Engineering Co.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that these facts speak for themselves. When the House committee's report was released a few days ago Mr. Higgins issued the following statement:

I brought this engineering racket to the attention of the country when I revealed it to the Truman committee back in February.

On February 11 my son, Frank Higgins, general manager of Higgins Aircraft Corporation, wrote to the Truman committee asking them to investigate the racket of which we had been made victims, and asked that a stop be put to it. The committee held some preliminary inquiries, which were reported in considerable detail by the Baltimore Sun and some of the eastern papers early in March.

Our part in the matter was gratefully acknowledged by Hugh Fulton, counsel for the Truman committee.

Months later the House committee took it up and we supplied them with full data. Their failure to credit us with the exposure puts us at a disadvantage. Certainly it puts the committee in a questionable light. The record speaks, and eloquently, if they would permit it. I do not understand it.

At the same time I issued this statement:

Andrew J. Higgins should be given credit for the exposure of the engineering racket. He brought it to the attention of the Truman committee, the War Manpower Commission, and to others, including myself, back in February. He is given full credit for the exposure in the War Manpower Commission and in other Government bureaus where the facts are known. I do not understand why the committee failed to show this. It has done one of our great producers a grave injustice by letting it appear that he was a party to the practice. I intend to see that this wrong is righted.

The above facts shows conclusively that Mr. Higgins and other officers of Higgins Aircraft, Inc., by leading a fight against a practice which had been tolerated by other aircraft manufacturers, and for their efforts in first calling it to official and public attention, deserve credit and commendation for their interest in this matter.

In conclusion, I am offering for the RECORD, two editorials from New Orleans newspapers. Following is the lead editorial of the New Orleans States of August 2:

TAXPAYERS GYPPED

Revelations anent the operation of a species of labor racket by so-called engineering service firms that have been and are mulcting the American taxpayers out of many millions of dollars, would shock the people if they are not already immunized against shock by a long succession of weird devices of labor and management to raise the cost of war goods by enough to allow lavish and unwarranted rakeoffs to self-injected intermediaries.

This latest racket was brought to the attention of the Senate's Truman committee by Andrew J. Higgins, of New Orleans. Mr. Higgins' enterprises here are among the victims. Other victims are such well-known concerns as United Aircraft, Chrysler Corporation, and Brewster Aeronautic.

The method used, as described in this newspaper yesterday, was to recruit all the available engineering skill and labor for the so-called engineering service outfits. These outfits were in some instances merely a partnership of two or three relatively unknown individuals. In one case, a man and his wife operated an engineering service. The labor and skill thus engaged by these concerns at 50 cents to $3 an hour in one locality were then farmed out to the makers of war goods at $4.50 to $7.50 an hour. The difference between the two wage scales seemed to be the gross profit of the engineering service enterprise, which apparently was nothing more than a labor-renting agency. The profits were plenty lush, running from 100 to 500 percent, according to the details published.

The Higgins firm was the first to call this suspected gyp to the attention of Congress. A complaint was filed as far back as last February 11 by Frank Higgins, son of the head of the firm. This was addressed to Hugh Fulton, chief counsel of the Senate's Truman committee. The mere filing of such a complaint should have stirred the Truman investigators into prompt and vigorous action. Whatever activity followed appears to have been belated, reluctant, and half-hearted. The elder Higgins now complains that a House committee which finally did start an investigation, published only a portion of the actual or potential findings.

Under these contracts with the labor-renters posing as "engineering service" concerns, the Higgins enterprises have been compelled to pay wages and salaries totaling $2,112,583.30 over a period of time, whereas if these identical workers had been recruited locally with no fee going to the interlopers, the sum would have been $729,974.88. This means a loss to the taxpayers, who foot the entire bill, of $1,383,608.42 at the Higgins firm alone. Similar losses at all the other plants where the gouge was practiced might have brought the aggregate up to $5,000,000 or perhaps ten to twenty millions. Perhaps the probing Members of Congress considered such sums too trifling to bother about saving. As for the principle of the thing, a policy of gouge and gyp and graft and cut-in has prevailed so universally in the business of supplying war goods and tools that a sense of futility about attempting to fight it anywhere may have gripped the congressional committees.

In every war there have been slick profiteers and get-rich-quick contractors, and there are plenty of them in this war. Waging war is a terribly wasteful process, anyway. There is bound to be stupendous loss. Most of it is simply unavoidable at the time. Sometimes a part of the loss can be recovered later.

In the Higgins case the labor-renting contracts had the approval of the Army officers charged with the procurement of supplies. And these officers were undoubtedly actuated by a necessity of getting the goods needed as soon as possible, and never mind the cost.

Mr. Higgins deserves the country's congratulations for pointing a finger at this deplorable gouge. No other enterpriser seems to have bothered about making a complaint to Congress, which seems to indicate that all others were complacent about business practices victimizing their country and the taxpayers.

Members of Congress, newspaper editors, and others have been prompt and vigorous in exposing certain practices and policies of labor unions that stalled or retarded war production or increased the cost of it. This time the evils are on the side of management. They should be exposed just as vigorously and denounced as fearlessly.

Following is the lead editorial of the Times-Picayune of August 3:

WHAT'S THE LOOPHOLE?

Since the vicious practice by which Higgins and other aircraft manufacturers have been overcharged for engineering talent seems to be out, or on the way out, protesting about it now is much like closing the stable door after the horse has gone. The Government will hardly recover the millions of dollars the so-called hoarders of technical labor have made out of their contracts to supply workers to the aircraft plants at approximately triple the wages the companies would have been permitted to pay had they been able to do their hiring direct. The Higgins plant announces that it presently has no contracts with the engineering companies and the report of the House military committee states that the practice has been greatly curtailed.

In the report released Tuesday, the committee brought out that Higgins, Chrysler, United Aircraft, and Brewster had been paying engineering companies up to $4.50 per man-hour straight time and $5.70 overtime for the services of such skilled craftsmen as tool designers, jig builders, and die makers. The Higgins company revealed that the Treasury's wage stabilization unit had fixed the wage ceilings on such workers, if hired direct, at $1.30 to $1.75 an hour in this area. Finding itself unable to obtain directly the talent it needed, the Higgins Co. began last September to do business with some of the 40 organizations operating as engineering companies which overwhelmed it with offers to supply the talent. In February, Frank O. Higgins, vice president of Higgins Aircraft, wrote the chief counsel of the Senate investigating committee protesting the deplorable condition which he said was retarding the plant's operations and raising production cost. So far as we know the Higgins Co. deserves credit for being the first to come out in the open to fight the scheme.

While millions already have been given up to the engineering companies, it isn't too late to inquire by what defect in the stabilization law or Treasury ruling such overcharges have been tolerated. Although the Treasury long has been aware of the wage ceiling evasion, we have never seen an explanation of why it was allowed to continue. Surely the public is entitled to something more than just a House committee's report condemning the practice as reprehensible.

Exploits of Marines on Guam

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CARL A. HATCH
OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 8, 1944

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, many New Mexico boys have been and are contributing mightily to the war effort. I wish it were possible that I could include in the RECORD the many statements and articles which have been printed concerning the sons of New Mexico who are engaged in the war. It is impossible to do so at this time. Later I hope it may be done. But today I have in my hand an article appearing in the New York Times of July 30. It relates graphically the experiences of a New Mexico boy, and it happens, Mr. President, that that boy is the son of one of our own colleagues the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ]. I ask that this article be placed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COMMAND POST HAS WILD GUAM DAWN—25 MARINES LED BY SENATOR CHAVEZ' SON KILL 68 JAPANESE INTRUDERS

(By Robert Trumbull)

WITH THE FIRST PROVISIONAL MARINE BRIGADE, ON GUAM, July 24.—An audacious Japanese who walked boldly into an American command post near Agat and picked up a box of grenades touched off a dawn battle in which 25 Americans, commanded by Lt. Dennis Chavez, Jr., son of the New Mexico Senator, slew 68 Japanese.

The story is all the more remarkable because Lt. Chavez's outfit is part of a headquarters and supply company, which is not ordinarily expected to engage in rough-and-tumble combat, although it happens—in fact, Chavez's platoon sergeant, John Green, big, rugged West Virginian, was commended for a similar mix-up on Eniwetok in February.

The headquarters and supply company, commanded by Capt. Elliot Lima, of Fallon, Nev., the night of D-day dug in on a level stretch between two rugged knolls north of Agat. During the day they captured a Japanese Hotchkiss machine gun. Toward dawn a dark figure strode boldly past the sentry. Challenged, he said, "Watcha say, mate?" laid hold of a box of grenades and started to walk off toward the Hotchkiss.

A JAPANESE IS BLOWN UP

A marine noticed that the newcomer was a Japanese and fired. The bullet struck and detonated the grenades in the box, obliterating the Japanese. Captain Lima said a Japanese flag was found the next morning torn to small bits and ribbons and the Japanese's notebook was strewn like confetti over a 15-yard circle.

Shortly afterward, as the sky began to lighten, the marines relaxed, thinking they soon could get out of the wet fox holes. A group of men approached bearing boxes of ammunition. When they were almost inside the line guarding the command post of Col. Merlin F. Schneider someone spotted Japanese leggings on these men and opened fire.

Immediately the Japanese dropped into tall grass and deployed for an attack.

"Our position was good," Lieutenant Chavez said. "We were in fox holes, the Japanese in an open field of fire. But we had only two light machine guns and a few automatic rifles, while they sounded like a full machine-gun company."

"LAST REEL OF HORSE OPERA"

The Japanese suddenly rose and charged, some swinging swords and bayonets. One officer ran toward Pvt. (1st cl.) William Hurst yelling, "Marine, you die."

Hurst replied "The hell I will," and cut him down with an automatic rifle.

Another officer, "a story-book Jap with buck teeth," rushed at Lieutenant Chavez.

"He grinned kinda toothily just as I shot him," Chavez said, "and I kinda hated to do it."

"The end of it was like the last reel of a horse opera," Captain Lima said. "Two wounded marines crawled to me and said Lieutenant Chavez' outfit was running out of ammunition, lobbing grenades from fox holes and shooting like wild men. Meantime I had sent in another platoon under Lt. Reginald Fincke, of New York, to back 'em up. By sunup there were 68 dead Japs against 1 marine killed and 5 wounded."

Lieutenant Chavez, who is 31 but looks 25, discussed the engagement modestly and kept switching the conversation to New Mexico politics. It was some time before the writer wormed from him the reluctant admission that he had personally killed at least five Japanese with a tommy-gun.

Polish-Soviet Relations

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT R. REYNOLDS
OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 8, 1944

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, yesterday I was permitted to insert in the body of the RECORD and likewise in the Appendix of the RECORD articles which I had clipped from the press relating to the situation in Poland today. I have now before me an article by Mr. Constantine Brown, published in the Washington Evening Star of several days ago, in which he mentions the Moscow-sponsored and controlled Polish Government. I have also another article by Mr. Constantine Brown dealing with the same subject published in the Washington Evening Star of July 26, 1944.

I wish to read one paragraph from the editorial published in the Star. The editorial is entitled "Polish Puppets." I read as follows:

The Soviet Government, in announcing its intention to enter into an agreement with the new Polish Committee of National Liberation for the civil administration of liberated Polish territory, serves unmistakable notice on the rest of the world—

Which includes us—that it proposes to settle Eastern Europe's problems in its own way.

There does not appear to be anything that the other United Nations, especially Great Britain and this country, can do about it. It is the Red Army that is driving the Germans from Poland. The Soviets, to be sure, have had very substantial support from the United States and Britain, but there is no escaping the fact that it is the Russian Army which is liberating Eastern Europe and tearing the Wehrmacht to shreds. As a result, the word of Marshal Stalin becomes the law of the east. He can make whatever decisions he pleases, and the necessities of war prevent us from opposing them.

There being no objection, the editorial and the two articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Evening Star of July 26, 1944]

POLISH PUPPETS

The Soviet Government, in announcing its intention to enter into an agreement with the new Polish Committee of National Liberation for the civil administration of liberated Polish territory, serves unmistakable notice on the rest of the world that it proposes to settle eastern Europe's problems in its own way.

There does not appear to be anything that the other United Nations, especially Great Britain and this country, can do about it. It is the Red Army that is driving the Germans from Poland. The Soviets, to be sure, have had very substantial support from the United States and Britain, but there is no escaping the fact that it is the Russian Army which is liberating eastern Europe and tearing the Wehrmacht to shreds. As a result, the word of Marshal Stalin becomes the law of the east. He can make whatever decisions he pleases, and the necessities of war prevent us from opposing them.

There is small likelihood that this state of affairs will have an adverse effect on the prosecution of the war. Germany remains to be finally beaten, and the necessity for full military co-operation continues undisturbed by unfortunate political developments. But it is not a good omen for the peace.

What Russia has done here, in effect, is to recognize a puppet Polish Government. It refuses to deal with the Polish Government in London, which is the only Polish Government recognized by the United States and Britain. The Soviet Government, so far as can be ascertained, has come to terms with the puppet regime without consulting the United States or Britain, and apparently has bluntly rebuffed President Roosevelt's efforts to effect some reconciliation with the legal Polish Government. And Stalin has done this at the same time that he expects and receives a fully representative voice in the decisions affecting Italy and western Europe.

It also should be noted that the Soviet Government in recognizing the new Polish committee, apparently considers that the dispute as to territory east of the so-called Curzon Line has been automatically settled in its favor. The official statement on the decision to treat with the puppet group emphasizes that Russia has no designs on "Polish territory." But this plainly refers to the Polish territory that remains after the area in dispute has been incorporated in the U. S. S. R., and for all practical purposes this is a "settlement" imposed by force of arms on Poland.

We may hope that the future will produce a softening of this picture as it appears today. But there is nothing to be gained from self-deception. Russia apparently has embarked on a course which does nothing to encourage hope for a peace based upon mutual trust and real international co-operation. She has also committed herself to policies which the United States, while probably obliged to accept them, cannot possibly indorse in good conscience.

[From the Washington Evening Star of July 26, 1944]

THIS CHANGING WORLD

(By Constantine Brown)

Polish soldiers under the command of Gen. Wladislav Anders are fighting in Italy for the common cause of the United Nations. Other trained Polish soldiers in England may join the Americans and British in France. Besides these ground troops, there are about 12,500 Polish aviators in the Allied Air Forces, participating in the air attack over Germany and western Europe.

In Italy the Polish divisions have done well. In the the bloody assault on Monastery Hill above Cassino 3,000 Poles were reported killed. Only last week the Anders forces occupied the important city of Ancona. Polish flyers have been fighting the German Luftwaffe ever since 1940.

Such facts are being recalled now in Washington at a time when Premier Stalin has decided to give liberated Poland a government "ready made" in Moscow, composed principally of members of the Union of Polish Patriots. This organization is regarded as a creation of the Kremlin, claiming the right to rule Poland because it is backed by Moscow's political influence and the bayonets of Red soldiers.

The Russian victories are thrilling the American people. The Germans appear unable to withstand the Red onslaught in any section of the front. The Nazi armies, which at one time made their foe pay dearly for every inch of reconquered ground, are now melting away.

If military victories alone could bring about a real peace the Russian victories would be cheered even more loudly in Washington diplomatic quarters.

But, unfortunately, in a global war, peace is not obtained only by military victories. The governments of the victorious nations must piece together, in a manner acceptable to all the United Nations, the debris caused by the Axis aggression. Only frank cooperation by all can achieve such an objective.

Poland is a dramatic example. This war started because the great western democracies would not stand for the arbitrary dismembering of a nation of 35,000,000 persons. The Poles caved in a few weeks after the war started because they were attacked simultaneously by two nations totaling 260,000,000 persons.

The Poles continued, however, to fight outside their own homeland. At first a handful of aviators who managed to get away joined their British colleagues in the desperate battle against the Luftwaffe. Later, soldiers and officers who escaped or were freed by Russia formed contingents which now are fighting on our side. A government composed of good, bad, or indifferent Polish politicians was formed in London. Regardless of its composition, the Allies—including Russia—recognized that government as the sole representative of Poland until such time as the liberated country could freely choose the new men to govern it.

This principle was embodied in the now apparently moribund Atlantic charter which was solemnly signed in Washington in January 1942, by all members of the United Nations including, of course, the U. S. S. R.

The break in diplomatic relations between the Polish government in exile and Moscow over what appears to be a trivial incident, in the light of the great principles for which we are fighting, has thrown a monkey wrench in the relations among the United Nations. Soon after the break, Moscow created a puppet organization composed of Poles completely in sympathy with the Russian objectives of incorporating the border states into the U. S. S. R. The moving spirit of this Soviet-created organization is Wanda Wasilewska, the wife of Alexander Kornejczuk, a former Assistant Secretary of State of the Soviet foreign commissariat and a now foreign commissar of the nominally autonomous Ukraine republic.

It is this organization consisting of Poles completely subservient to the Kremlin which has been entrusted by Premier Stalin with the Government of new Poland.

The question of the future boundaries of Poland is of only relative importance as far as the United States is concerned. Boundaries in Europe always have and always will continue to be elastic. We are interested in the sovereignty of a Polish Government, elected freely by the Polish people. The Polish Government in exile may not represent the present view of the Polish people, but its existence is in accordance with the Constitution of Poland which has never been rejected by the Poles.

The Polish Government in exile was not created by the Allies. The new Government has actually been created by a foreign power. As such it is less representative of the Polish people than the Government in London.

During the official visit of Polish Premier Stanislaw Mikolajczyk in Washington last June, President Roosevelt recognized the sound basis of the Polish Government in London. He endeavored, somewhat timidly, it is true, to bring about an understanding between the Polish Premier and Premier Stalin. He urged the Russian leader to receive Mikolajczyk at the Kremlin and talk matters over.

Out of this conversation Mr. Roosevelt hoped that some sort of an arrangement might be reached for a skeleton independence of Poland and at the same time satisfy Stalin's objection for security on the Soviet's western borders. The Russian Premier's final answer to the President's friendly intervention was his creation Monday of a Polish puppet government.

[From the Washington Evening Star]

THIS CHANGING WORLD

(By Constantine Brown)

The fate of the "Dumbarton" conference, a parley among the Big Four for the postwar organization of the world, depends to a large extent on the result of talks held in Moscow this week between Premier Stalin and Stanislaw Mikolajczyk, Premier of the Polish government in exile.

Warsaw is expected to be liberated by the Russian forces this week.

The Russian Government created a Moscow-sponsored Polish Government with a heterogenous list of subservient men and women as soon as it became convinced that the defeat of the Germans in Poland was only a question of days.

The British and American Governments realized that the creation of a 100 percent Moscow-sponsored administration was a definite challenge to everything we are fighting for. Prime Minister Churchill decided to take the matter in his own hands and has had several direct communications with Premier Stalin since last Sunday. He insisted that Stalin receive the Polish Premier and discuss with him the question of forming a new government in Poland composed partly of members of the Government in exile and partly of members of the new Moscow creation. Mr. Churchill won his point and last Wednesday the Kremlin informed London that Premier Mikolajczyk would be received in Moscow.

The Polish premier lost no time and boarded a plane for Moscow in an endeavor to save whatever he could of Poland's sovereignty.

According to reliable information available in Washington, Mr. Mikolajczyk hopes to strike a bargain whereby the face of the Polish Government in exile might be saved. The basis of the arrangement he hopes to reach in Moscow is that Wladyslaw Raczkiewicz, the President of the Polish Republic, dismiss the cabinet and appoint another which would include some members of the present administration such as Mikolajcyzk, who is said to be persona grata with Stalin, and several others who are acceptable to the Kremlin. The rest of the Government would be composed of some leaders of the Polish underground and some Poles who belong to the Moscow-sponsored organization.

The American and British Governments feel it is vitally important that there be at least an outward appearance of legality in the formation of the Government of the first eastern liberated country. If Stalin accepts the compromise that the President of Poland shall dismiss the present cabinet and order the formation of another, even if all its members are carefully selected by Moscow, such a government would be constitutional and its acts, including a drastic boundary revision of Poland's eastern borders, would be legal.

Unless such a compromise is accepted by the Kremlin, the picture at the forthcoming international conference in Washington is going to be very gloomy. Mr. Churchill is said to have stressed this point to Stalin and the fact that the Russian premier has agreed at the eleventh hour to receive the Polish leader and his advisers has given renewed hope to Washington and London that a compromise is possible.

Following Mr. Churchill's advice, Premier Mikolajczyk will avoid discussing the question of Poland's future borders. This, it has been agreed by all concerned, will be a matter for the peace conference to decide at the end of the war. The only real problems which exist today between Moscow and the Polish Government in exile are the question of personalities in the new government, the legality of such a government from the international point of view and the administration of the liberated territories once they cease to be a war zone. Whether Stalin is disposed to make these concessions to the Polish Government in exile and to his two major allies is a matter of conjecture.

High officials in the State Department are optimistic about the prospects of the discussions between the two premiers. They point out that unless Stalin has decided to make some concession he would have persisted in his refusal to receive Mikolajczyk. All previous American and British attempts to arrange a heart-to-heart talk between them had failed. It is probable that the Russian Premier may have mellowed, on the surface at least, toward the government in exile with which he abruptly broke relations 18 months ago.

Mikolajczyk himself is a realist. He understands fully that unless he goes a long way in meeting Russia's terms he will be abandoned by the United States and Great Britain. But while he is reported to be willing to yield to almost everything asked of him in Moscow he is stubborn enough to refuse to sign any agreement which would make his country a mere dependency of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. He is aware that the future of Poland will be closely linked to Russia, but he is endeavoring to obtain at least a nominal recognition of Poland's sovereignty.

Inadequacy of State Unemployment Compensation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH F. GUFFEY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 8, 1944

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "State Jobless Pay Called Inadequate," published in the Washington Post of today, and containing an interview with Arthur J. Altmeyer, chairman of the Social Security Board.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE JOBLESS PAY CALLED INADEQUATE—SOCIAL SECURITY BOARD'S CHAIRMAN SEES PLANS FALLING SHORT OF RECONVERSION NEED

Arthur J. Altmeyer, Chairman of the Social Security Board, has filed a report with War Mobilization Director James F. Byrnes, indicating that State unemployment compensation systems will be unable to protect the Nation against widespread reconversion unemployment.

This report has assumed considerable significance in view of congressional consideration of proposals to supplement State unemployment benefits with Federal funds.

One high administration official who asked that his name be withheld emphasized yesterday that adequate provision must be made for unemployment compensation if workers are to be kept on war jobs until the war ends. At present officials are moving cautiously with reconversion planning to avoid stimulating a flight of workers from war jobs.

DEFECTS ARE CITED

Defects in State insurance systems listed by Altmeyer included—

Limited duration of benefits—28 States provided maximum benefits of 16 weeks or less, as of January this year.

Low maximum weekly benefit amounts—22 States limit the maximum weekly benefit to $15.

Limited coverage—only 13 States cover employers of 1 or more employees. Others exempt small employers. About 2,000,000 workers in Government arsenals, depots, and navy yards, and merchant seamen are not covered.

Unduly restrictive disqualifications.

"SPREAD" TOO NARROW

Failure to distribute the excessive financial burdens of reconversion unemployment over the entire country. Some States will exhaust their reserve to get by the reconversion period, while two to three and five-tenths billion dollars of other reserves may be untouched in the hands of other States.

"The most serious inadequacy of State unemployment compensation laws," Altmeyer said, "is the limited period during which benefits can be drawn.

"In some States, an unemployed person can draw only 2 or 3 weeks of benefits. Even in the rather good year 1941, for the country as a whole, one-half of all claimants were still unemployed when they had exhausted their benefit rights.

"In 36 States, over 40 percent of the beneficiaries used up all their benefits; in 3 States, over 60 percent exhausted all rights. Many workers remained unemployed for long periods after exhausting their benefits."

One proposal before Congress is to provide Federal aid to extend emergency benefits up to $35 a week until 2 years after the end of the war.

"The average weekly benefits of about $12.60 for 1942 and $13.80 for 1943 was only about one-third of the average weekly wage," Altmeyer said. "Thirty-two States pay higher rate for accident compensation than for unemployment compensation."

Benefits are often inadequate in States which have accumulated large reserves, Altmeyer said.

Oregon's reserve fund at the end of 1943 was large enough to pay benefits to 85 percent of employed workers, he said. North Carolina's reserve is large enough to pay benefits to 88 percent of employed workers, yet the average weekly benefit in 1943 was only $7.10—lowest for any State.

Present reserves total $5,000,000,000, enough to provide $20 a week for 20 weeks to 12,500,000 workers if they were in a national pool, Altmeyer indicated. Divided as they are among the States a pattern of poverty and plenty is presented.

7 PERCENT COVERAGE

He cited research indicating that only 7 percent of the actual wage loss through unemployment in 1940 was covered by benefits. It was estimated that the States, under present regulations, would be unable to underwrite more than 10 percent of the anticipated reconversion unemployment loss.

"It does not seem possible that in the remaining time before the war ends, most State unemployment compensation laws will be sufficiently extended and improved to intensify sufficiently the degree of protection against widespread unemployment," Altmeyer said. "The search for a solution to the problem must, therefore, proceed in other directions."

Article by David Lawrence on Misuse of Statements Made by President Roosevelt

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CARL A. HATCH

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 8, 1944

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article by David Lawrence entitled "Political Tricks Seen as Spur to Isolationism," published in yesterday evening's Washington Star.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

POLITICAL TRICK SEEN AS SPUR TO ISOLATIONISM—WRITER WARNS OF HALF-QUOTES FROM ROOSEVELT SPEECHES

(By David Lawrence)

Sometimes arguments made in the midst of a political campaign have an effect long after the election, and the danger today is that isolationism in America may be stimulated in the post-war years because of misrepresentation concerning the facts leading up to America's entry into this war.

Already it is apparent that even Republicans who are international minded are making the mistake of thinking they can get votes for Governor Dewey by citing President Roosevelt's promises made in 1940 to keep the United States out of the war.

Reference is being made frequently to speeches of Mr. Roosevelt, but in selecting quotations the stump speakers of the Republican Party ignore the fact that the President's main point always was that he would not send American boys abroad "except in case of attack," or that he would not favor American participation in any war that was a "foreign war" and hence did not concern directly the interests of the United States.

It is well known that Mr. Roosevelt in 1940 hoped that Hitler would not be so stupid as to provoke the United States, and that America by supplying airplanes and munitions of war, and taking all steps "short of war" could keep the European war from reaching the United States and becoming an American war instead of a "foreign war."

OFFICIAL TEXT OF STATEMENTS

The European war ceased to be a foreign war when the territory of the United States was attacked by Japan on December 7, 1941, and when Italy and Germany thereupon declared war on the United States. In the interests of fairness all the quotations from the President's campaign speeches in 1940 that bear in any way on the subject are given here as taken from the official text:

"WASHINGTON, September 11, 1940.—I hate war, now more than ever. I have one supreme determination—to do all that I can to keep war away from these shores for all time. I stand, with my party, and outside of my party as President of all the people, on the platform, the wording that was adopted in Chicago less than two months ago. It said: 'We will not participate in foreign wars, and we will not send our Army, naval or air forces to fight in foreign lands outside of the Americas, except in case of attack.'"

DAYTON, Ohio, October 12, 1940.—When we speak of defending this Western Hemisphere, we are speaking not only of North, Central, and South America and the immediately adjacent islands. We include the right to the peaceful use of the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans. That has been our traditional policy. • • •

"We are building a total defense on land and sea and in the air, sufficient to repel total attack from any part of the world. Forewarned by the deliberate attacks of the dictators upon free peoples, the United States, for the first time in its history, has undertaken the mustering of its men in peacetime. Unprecedented dangers have caused the United States to undertake the building of a navy and an air force sufficient to defend all the coasts of the Americas from any combination of hostile powers."

"PHILADELPHIA, October 23, 1940.—To Republicans and Democrats, to every man, woman and child in the Nation I say—your President and your great Secretary of State are following the road to peace.

"PLATFORM OF OUR PARTY

"We are arming ouselves not for any foreign war. We are arming ourselves not for any purposes of conquest or intervention in foreign disputes. I repeat again that I stand on the platform of our party: 'We will not participate in foreign wars, and we will not send our Army, naval or air forces to fight in foreign lands cutside of the Americas, except in case of attack.'"

"BOSTON, October 30, 1940.—I give you one more assurance, I have said this before, but I shall say it again and again. Your boys are not going to be sent into any foreign wars. They are going into training to form a force so strong that, by its very existence, it will keep the threat of war far away from our shores. The purpose of our defense is defense."

"HARTFORD, October 30, 1940.—The result of that effort is to make the United States strong enough in order to defend itself from attack from the outside. And you know, too, that we aim to defend only against an attack from the outside."

"BROOKLYN, November 1, 1940.—I am fighting to keep this Nation prosperous and at peace. I am fighting to keep our people out of foreign wars and to keep foreign conceptions of government out of our United States."

Italy's Independence Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT R. REYNOLDS

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 8, 1944

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an inspiring and very worth-while poem entitled "Italy's Independence Day," written by Mr. Horace C. Carlisle.

There being no objection, the poem was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ITALY'S INDEPENDENCE DAY

The identical banner that happened to fly
In the front of the Capitol Dome
Was the one that was flown, on the Fourth of July,
In Nineteen Forty-four, over Rome.
This was her Independence Day, as it was ours
Back when we threw off bondage's yoke,
And stood forth, fortified by our God-given pow'rs,
That grew stronger with every wise stroke.

Underneath this same flag that flew from near the base
Of our National Capitol's Dome,
When our Congress declared, with distress in her face,
War on Tokyo, Berlin, and Rome,
The surrendered Italians triumphantly sang
Forth the praise of the Stripes and the Stars,
From the balcony where Mussolini's words rang
Once "with war and with rumors of wars."

Freedom's flag is the ensign of peace, not of war—
And will fly after war-flags collapse—
Yet, Americans have an inspired hatred for
The unmerciful Germans and Japs,
And will never again let their leaders wage wars,
And lay waste peaceful nations' domains,
And endanger the land of the Stripes and the Stars,
Over which still the Prince of Peace reigns.

The American Ideal: The Common Denominator

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALEXANDER WILEY
OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, August 9 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 8), 1944

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the Record an address on the subject The American Ideal—The Common Denominator, which I delivered in Milwaukee on Sunday, August 6, 1944, before a group of Americans of Slovakian descent.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Fellow Americans, in Wisconsin, and in many sections of our land, Americans of Slovak origin constitute an important, highly respected, and very patriotic element of our citizenship.

At the outset of these remarks, permit me to extend my sincere respects to this group—and to other Americans of Slovak descent—or Americans from any other blood stream—for their deep loyalty to the Government of the United States.

Certainly the national Slovak groups have always had an abiding faith in the American cause, and throughout the war have done everything possible to further the war effort.

In the roll calls of our fighting men—in Normandy or on Saipan, or wherever we fight—there are many names whose origin was in the northern counties of Hungary or from lower Austria or from Moravia or from the Jablunka Mountains or from Silesia or from Galicia or from the Little Russia's boundary.

In this war—and in the history of our land—many Americans of Slovak descent have written glowing pages of outstanding achievement.

The Americans who came from the lands of the Slovaks—or whose fathers came from the lands of the Slovaks—as a natural heritage have an inbred understanding of the value of freedom.

For many years the Slovak nationality was suppressed in the lands of your forefathers. There was a time when the Slovaks of Europe in one area at least were denied the right to use their language in church and school, and the result of that was a large emigration to America.

With this background of suppression, we can readily understand why the American of Slovak descent cherishes our American ideals so fervently.

Despite a European background of many troubled years, the Slovaks are fundamentally a peaceful race, a race of people fond of music and song.

Early in this great war, many Slovak groups sent resolutions to Washington consecrating every effort as a part of the united war effort.

Early in this war Slovak groups pledged wholehearted and unconditional support to protect the American ideals of right and humanity.

In September of 1942 a number of Slovak groups met in Pittsburgh, and in their resolutions they referred to the rulers of Slovakia which was separated from the Republic of Czechoslovakia in March of 1939 after the Pact of Munich. The resolutions referred to the alliance of the rulers of Slovakia to Nazi Germany.

Our Americans of Slovak ancestry pointed out that the people of Slovakia, as lovers of democracy by inheritance, could not be in accord with the unholy alliance of their rulers and Nazi Germany.

In the dark and turbulent hours of this alliance, the people of Slovakia were shackled by Nazi might and terror. But Americans of Slovak descent continued to believe that any nationality "no matter how small, has a right to its own nationhood." And consequently, Americans of Slovak descent felt in voicing their own patriotic convictions that they were also voicing the convictions of their Hitler-enslaved Slovak brethren across the Atlantic.

Americans of Slovak descent have condemned the betrayers and the murderers of the Slovak people who declared war on the United States of America—a liberty-consecrated land which gave asylum to all Slovaks who for the last half century have desired to escape European oppression, the oppression of almost a thousand years.

Fellow Americans—we know that the Hitler horde by ruthless tactics of treachery, rape, and robbery have reduced many peoples to serfdom. In this land Americans of many bloodstreams have watched closely the oppression and the slavery visited on the lands of their fathers.

All of these Americans know that liberty and freedom are a priceless heritage which must be defended at any cost.

Americans of Slovak descent realize also that their forefathers came from an area where there were many related but divided nationalities. That is one reason why Americans of Slovak descent are so keenly conscious of the priceless value of unity in this land of ours.

It is not my purpose today to talk of the many European problems and particularly the many problems in the lands of your forefathers.

We are all concerned first of all with the problems of this land, because we realize that without a strong America, freedom may be menaced in many lands.

The subject of my talk today is "The American Ideal—the Common Denominator."

In other words, let us talk briefly of the common thread which runs through all Americans.

Americans are not all alike in terms of material things.

Some of us are rich; some of us are poor. Some of us are farmers; some of us are laboring men. Some of us are office workers; some of us are lawyers or doctors. Some of us have been educated for many years; and some of us have only the education of the little red schoolhouse.

Some of us live in sections where there are tall mountains, and some of us live in the part of the country where there are many lakes. Some of us live along the fertile Mississippi, and some of us live in the broad wheat fields of Kansas. Some of us live in the shadows of great forests. Some of us live in the Badlands; some of us live in deserts. And some of us live where we can look to the sea.

Some of us are Catholics; some of us are Protestants; some of us are Jews; and some of us are Gentiles. Some of us are white and some of us are black. And there are some Americans who have red skins or yellow skins.

But, my friends, we are all Americans.

If we are all so different—if we have such differing ancestries, so many blood streams, such varying geographic backgrounds, and so many physical differences—what is it that makes us all Americans?

My friends, there are many things which make us all Americans.

More than a century and a half ago men fought and died that you and I might be Americans. They left us certain great charters of human liberty. They left us the Bill of Rights. They left us the Declaration of Independence. They left us the Constitution. They left us with freedom of religion, freedom of speech, freedom of press, the right to a trial by jury, government by the consent of the governed.

They left us with a permanent love for liberty, and they left us with the right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

These are the things which each of us has whether we be rich or poor, black or white. This is the common thread. Our liberties, our rights, and our duties—these are all part of our common heritage, and that heritage, we can perhaps refer to as the American ideal.

One force which has given strength to our land has been the fact that we have always been a haven and a refuge for the oppressed. Because we have been such a sanctuary, men and women from many lands and many blood streams have settled here. And if you will pardon a personal reference, I might add that my own parents were immigrants from Norway.

These people of many blood streams added to the vigor of our land. They added something to our culture and to our character, and they fused with the people of this country so that we became one mighty, united people.

We are a united people today. We still share that common American ideal. Our only allegiance to this land and only hope for the future freedom in this country or for the future freedom in any country lies in the victory of the United Nations.

It is possible that other lands can find their inspiration and their route to peace from the example of the American people. If the peoples of other lands can submerge their racial differences in one common ideal of freedom, then they, too, can look forward to a peaceful horizon where men may have the right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

You people know the mistakes that have been made in the Old World—mistakes that have been made for a thousand years—mistakes that are still being made.

Our job is to see that those mistakes shall never be made in this land—and our job is to help so that they shall not be made again in other lands.

We must always fight against bigotry and intolerance. We must always fight against oppression—political oppression, social oppression, or economic oppression—and above all, we must forever keep aflame the American ideal and what it means to us. As a part of that job, we must also do everything in our power to insure that in the future it will never again be possible for bad men or bad ideals or bad government to run amuck throughout the world.

Editorials Advocating the Reelection of Hon. Scott W. Lucas, of Illinois

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CARL A. HATCH

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, August 9 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 8), 1944

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, it is with some considerable satisfaction that I have recently read several editorials from newspapers in the great State of Illinois, some of them Republican, I am informed, endorsing and advocating the reelection to the Senate of the United States of our Democratic colleague, Hon. SCOTT W. LUCAS. I ask unanimous consent that these editorials be published in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Chicago Sun of August 3, 1944]

REPUBLICANS FOR LUCAS

Formation of strong independent committees for Senator SCOTT W. LUCAS, both downstate and in Chicago, demonstrates wide support for the Senator among what might be called normally Republican circles.

Thoughtful Republicans have good reason to advocate Senator LUCAS' reelection. His opponent, Richard J. Lyons, is a perennial office seeker with no distinction save the extent of his ignorance on foreign affairs, and no promise save that of an obedient errand boy for the Tribune.

Mr. Lyons won nomination by the brute power of Governor Green's State machine, which put him over as ordered, to reward him for being a good boy and not trying to unseat Senator Brooks in 1942. As an isolationist and a narrow nationalist, he does not represent the foreign-policy views of the party's rank and file. Yet, once in the Senate, he would unquestionably attempt to wreck cooperative peace settlements.

Wise Republicans know that would be good for neither the Nation nor the future of the Republican Party. They know that the best way to break the grip on their party of a little band of die-hard nationalists is to defeat Mr. Lyons. That is why there were 142,000 Republican votes against him in the primary, and why there will be many more against him in November.

[From the Quincy Herald-Whig of July 31, 1944]

REPUBLICANS FOR LUCAS

A dispatch in Sunday's papers told of the Republicans-for-Lucas League which has been formed in this State and which is made up of some of the most prominent Republican businessmen of the State. There will be clubs of this kind arise all over Illinois. The first reason is that SCOTT LUCAS has been the kind of a Senator that Illinois has needed. He has been right on foreign problems at all times and has been discriminating in the kind of support he has given administration domestic measures, displaying an independence that has been more than encouraging in these days. The second reason is that the comparison between the two candidates is so striking that Republicans are quick to see the difference.

SCOTT LUCAS will appeal to great numbers of voters this year who appreciate keeping able men in the Senate. Quincy businessmen who are Republicans would do well to become affiliated with the Republicans-for-Lucas organization, throughout the State.

[From the Chicago Daily News of August 5, 1944]

INDEPENDENTS' OPPORTUNITY

Formation both downstate and in Cook County of bipartisan organizations to support the candidacy of SCOTT W. LUCAS for reelection to the United States Senate, is a commendable and encouraging manifestation. This presidential year it is evident that both major parties are split. It is to be hoped that this will result in more party members joining the ranks of the independent voters and splitting their tickets. Neither party has a monopoly on able men nor sound principles of government. The intelligent voter will vote for men in whom he has confidence and for principles in which he believes, regardless of party labels. SCOTT LUCAS, on his record, merits reelection. In the words of A. A. Sprague, chairman of the Businessmen's League for Lucas:

"It is unthinkable * * * that our State, with its great traditions, should be represented in the United States Senate by a man of the type of Senator LUCAS' opponent."

[From the Illinois State Register of July 31, 1944]

REPUBLICANS FOR LUCAS

There is a favorable augury in the formation in Springfield Saturday of a Republicans-for-Lucas League headed by such men of independent thought and action as Otto Beich, Bloomington candy manufacturer; George W. Barrette, editor of the Republican Peoria Journal-Transcript; and Dr. A. F. Barnett, surgeon, of West Frankfort.

Headquarters are to be established in Hotel Abraham Lincoln in Springfield, and the organization extended into every congressional district in the State.

We say this augurs well because it indicates independent thinking. We are in the midst of a cataclysmic war. Victory seems at hand as an approach to peace. The problems confronting the Nation and the world are as vast as the war itself.

Senator Lucas has a record of long and constructive service in Congress. He has disagreed with the President on some domestic policies. He has done much independent thinking and voting. He was a stalwart supporter of the program of preparedness for war when some opportunists in both parties were wavering—when isolationists were blind to the inevitable.

The senior Illinois Senator not only stood firm against the HAMILTON FISH type of hate-spreaders, and powerful groups which failed to see the approach of war until the crash came at Pearl Harbor, but he led the fight for votes for soldiers. He fought consistently to safeguard the Nation and its fighting forces.

The Republicans-for-Lucas League will become an important factor in the approaching campaign. It will encourage independent voting which is one of the essentials of this critical period when the future of the world hangs in the balance.

Congress Should Be on the Job

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR CAPPER

OF KANSAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, August 9 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 8), 1944

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senate to an excellent editorial entitled "Congress Should Be on the Job," published a few days ago in the Kansas City Times. I am heartily in sympathy with the sentiments expressed therein. This statement comes from one of the ablest editors of the West, and I think reflects the overwhelming sentiment of the people of that section of the country. They believe that the problems now before the Congress are of the highest importance, and feel it is a time when the Members of Congress should stay on the job. I ask that the editorial be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CONGRESS SHOULD BE ON THE JOB

The excuse for futher congressional inactivity, after a recess extending over a period of more than 5 weeks, is that important bills having to do with various phases of reconversion are not ready for action. If not, where does the responsibility lie except with the majority in Congress which controls all committees? The bills were supposed to be made ready in the recess period of 5 weeks so that Congress could reconvene this week and go right on with its work.

Instead of that, Majority Leader MCCORMACK, of the House, criticizes Senator VANDENBERG, of Michigan, for urging a resumption of congressional work on the ground that the war in Europe might end sooner than expected and preparation for such an event should be made. Mr. MCCORMACK says, "This is not the time for responsible political leaders to build up an expectation of an early return to the ways of peace," but "it is rather the time to inspire a grim determination to go forward and win the war."

And how could Congress do its part in going forward and winning the war? By loafing on the job, staying at home and mending political fences, or by getting back to work? Even Majority Leader MCCORMACK would agree that staying on the job is what war workers and everybody else at home should do. Is Congress exempt?

River and Harbor Improvements

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. HUGH A. BUTLER

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 10 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 8), 1944

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by Maj. Gen. Eugene Reybold, Chief of Engineers, before the National Rivers and Harbors Congress, New Orleans, La., on July 27, 1944.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

No other organization to my knowledge has exercised a greater influence on the field in which it serves than the National Rivers and Harbors Congress. Its long record of service reflects vision, sound judgment and unselfish devotion to the development of our Nation's waterway possibilities. I have attended many of its annual and special meetings and have observed with interest the discussions and deliberations that have taken place relating to proposed projects. Initiated by its resolutions and supported by its subsequent activities, outstanding additions to our national waterway program have been enacted into law.

Responding to the desires and wishes of the administration with respect to the use of transportation facilities, you have made it your business to avoid meeting in convention for over 2 years. And in keeping with good judgment and common sense, it has been your announced policy to defer nonmilitary construction for the duration.

The purposes, as outlined by President Short in his official call for this special session, are representative of the constructive thinking that has always guided your studies and actions. I am delighted to be with you again—particularly here in New Orleans where the importance of flood control and waterway improvements have long been appreciated.

Twice before during my service as Chief of Engineers, it has been my pleasure to address your meetings. The first time was at Miami, a scant month before this country's declaration of war in 1941. There we recognized that the times, even then, were laden with grave responsibilities. To preserve the democratic processes of this Republic, under our Constitution, we saw the necessity of presenting a united, determined effort against the totalitarian flood that threatened to engulf the entire world.

Never in human history has there been a darker chapter than that which followed during the next few months after your Miami meeting. The Axis fortunes were at high tide. With most of western Europe at his mercy. Hitler drove his powerful forces east and south in a series of lightning advances. Although they exacted a heavy price for every foot of ground they yielded, the dauntless Russians were pressed back toward Moscow and Stalingrad. In north Africa the Nazi armored forces rolled on toward Egypt. Japanese aggression spread octopuslike to the Aleutians, to the islands of the Central and South Pacific, and to the very doorway of Australia. They took Hong Kong, Singapore, Batavia, and Rangoon.

Had the two Axis partners been successful in joining hands in the Near or Middle East, the hopes of man for generations to come might have been blasted.

When we met at Chicago in May of 1942 a grave situation confronted the world. As a nation, in joint efforts with our allies, we were seeking desperately to stem the flood-tide of Axis might. We were deploying all available men and equipment to this end. We were establishing supply lines to our troops overseas and to the other United Nations. In every possible way we were rushing preparations to meet the surge of power which the enemy had developed over a period of a decade. Against that background we examined, at your Chicago meeting, our great inland-waterway system, and found it ready for a heavy responsibility in the full development of American striking power.

The oceans that had long been considered as protection against attack from other countries presented a major problem. To bring our striking power effectively against the Germans and the Japanese, we had to engage in the greatest overseas military operations the world has ever known.

The magnitude and efficiency with which these operations have been carried out are a tribute to our Navy, to our Coast Guard, to our merchant marine, and to others who have kept the supply lines open and flowing. This record is also a tribute to the wisdom and foresight of those who provided for improving our transportation outlets to the overseas world—of those who provided our inland waterways that are carrying raw materials and fuel to production centers and finished products to our coastal ports. This inland-waterway system—fostered over the years by the National Rivers and Harbors Congress—has relieved other forms of transportation of a war shipping burden that might well have caused them to break down at the most critical time in our history.

Our national transportation system has functioned with credit to all its components. The railroads have established a grand record in pressing to the very limits of their capacity the movements of troops and war goods. The trucking industry, carrying on in the face of fuel and equipment shortages, has maintained a vitally essential service. A network of pipe lines has supplemented other transport in the movement of liquid fuels, and the aviation industry has come of age in a way that forecasts its profound influence on future commerce.

Equally spectacular has been the performance of our inland waterways. Their history of past performance and their record of present service are your inspiration and encouragement to press forward with determination in the cause for which you have long supplied leadership. Our inland waterways accommodated steadily increasing tonnages throughout the so-called depression years, and with the outbreak of war, they were ready to adapt themselves to the sudden heavy increases in war shipments.

The shipping requirements of World War No. 1 have been dwarfed by the tonnages now moving to the battle fronts. In May of this year, almost 4,000,000 measurement tons of Army cargo moved overseas. The peak tonnage in the last war was in November 1918, when we shipped less than 1,000,000 tons.

The overseas movement of war cargo is but the end product of a whole chain of freight movement in this country—raw materials and fuel to processing plants, components to assembly plants, and completed units to depots and ports. The increases in our inland waterway shipping have been correspondingly great. The channels of the Great Lakes are carrying far more tonnage than during the last war. The Mississippi River system last year handled over 3 times as much tonnage as it did in 1917, and similar increases are evident on other rivers and waterways.

But we were ready to accommodate these increases. The work of improving and extending our waterways has gone steadily forward. Since 1918 we have made substantial investments in these developments. We have spent a quarter of a billion dollars improving our major coastal harbors, over a hundred million dollars on our intracoastal waterways, and an equal amount on the channels of the Great Lakes. Navigation investments as a whole in our rivers, harbors, and other waterways since the last war amount to more than three-quarters of a billion dollars. Savings in transportation costs during peacetimes justify these investments, but of timely significance is the fact that they have been our insurance against transportation break-down in war.

Our inland waterways have also enabled the shipbuilding industry to move much of its production to interior points, to areas adjacent to supplies of materials and manpower. Flood-control works have given protection to important industrial and agricultural production areas. Commerce and industry have been freed from many of the costly disruptions caused by floods. Hydroelectric power, generated in connection with certain of our waterway developments, is serving war plants and other military installations.

There is an incidental benefit to the Nation from river and harbor and flood-control works. It has been demonstrated beyond any question of a doubt that the actual experience during peacetime of supervising large construction projects has made the civil functions of the Corps of Engineers well nigh indispensable in preparing engineer officers for the emergencies of war. Our process of developing engineer officers on civil works in years of peace has paid dividends in developing officers for their assigned tasks in modern war—tasks that call for every extreme in the planning, engineering, and construction of military works both at home and in the active theaters of war.

The results thus far speak for themselves. Whether we measure them in terms of equipment, methods or leadership, the test of the present war has demonstrated the superiority of American engineering. This war has become man's greatest construction job. It has called for vast production and training facilities; for airfields by the hundreds, both at home and abroad; for ports and roads and railroads and bridges; for pipe lines, storage tanks, hospitals, warehouses and shops.

It was no accident that the American Army was the first in the world to adopt heavy construction equipment as standard troop issue. The Corps of Engineers, by vitue of its varied experience on civil works, knew well the value and the potentialities of such equipment. It took such equipment to give flood protection to the lower Mississippi valley, to build the Fort Peck and Denison Dams, and to prosecute other major construction. It takes such equipment, as well, to handle the construction requirements of modern war.

Planning for new waterway projects and the continued maintenance of existing projects are primary objectives of this meeting. Since sound national policies have been developed over a period of more than a hundred years, you have a foundation upon which to proceed. These national policies have been constructively established and should be securely and religiously maintained. In spite of the greatest military responsibility of all times, we of the Corps of Engineers have been able, within certain limitations, to continue our program of planning, designing and engineering of worthwhile waterway projects. However, this class of work, I am sure you will agree, should continue only when and where it does not interfere with the war effort. In fact, there is no other answer—our war effort comes first in everything.

As a result of our pre-war investigations and planning, and that which we have been able to accomplish during the war, we now have a potential backlog of beneficial Federal improvements in the interests of navigation, flood control and other water uses totaling some $4,600,000,000. These projects are widely disseminated among our important river basins and among our States. They are geared to the fullest ultimate use of our rivers. For navigation, they include dam and lock construction, dredging and rock excavation, river regulation works, and revetment and breakwater construction. For flood control, they include reservoirs, flood walls, levees, diversion channels, channel improvements and related works.

When conditions of manpower and materials again permit, these projects can be placed under way and prosecuted as rapidly as the Congress may direct. There will be no delays for the preparation of plans and specifications.

These improvements for the national welfare will be carried out in the same systematic way that our flood control and navigation works of the past have been carried out. The several Federal agencies involved in the development of comprehensive plans for our river basins work in cordial and effective cooperation. While misunderstandings and differences of opinion arise from time to time, the end result is always the same—mutual respect and thorough coordination. Any failure along these lines exists only in the minds of selfish pressure groups who seek to gain their own narrow ends by trying to excite a rivalry which does not exist.

While we are fighting this war to perpetuate the right to plan and to work for the greatest good to the greatest number of people, the National Rivers and Harbors Congress should rededicate itself to the challenge that still lies in the wealth of our water resources—to control destructive floods, to accommodate our rivers and other waterways to the expansion of commerce yet to come, and to build into our river basins the other benefits that can come only from well-conceived and well-executed comprehensive plans. It is well enough to dream and to scheme, but at the same time, we must keep our feet planted firmly on the solid ground of reality. We must maintain the perspective to see clearly ahead for 10, 20, and perhaps 50 years, but always we must preserve the judgment to plan valid and logical steps toward the attainment of long-range goals.

Through our Federal legislative procedures, proposed improvements for navigation and flood control have always been investigated and reported upon by direction of the people; they have been authorized for construction by and with the advice and consent of the people, and they have been prosecuted to completion, maintained and operated with funds appropriated and expended with full knowledge and understanding by the people. It rests with these same people—the people of the Nation—to see that this democratic and thoroughly proven process is never tampered with and that it is kept everlastingly on the beam. You who are here today, together with your Nation-wide memberships, are on the lookout bridge of this ship of democracy and you can do much to keep it on its charted course.

Out of the struggles and sacrifices of this war, we are finding a new breadth of vision, a new strength, and a new courage. We have always worked for progress like civilized human beings. But in certain other countries, there are those who are intent upon bringing us all down to their level of barbarism. Until this danger is removed we must fight with unity and a singleness of purpose.

With every hope of the future still at stake, there is no place for piecemeal efforts—no time to jeopardize victory by faltering when the initiative is at last ours. The glorious traditions of America are being rewritten with new brilliance by our fighting forces along the war-torn and bloody roads to Berlin and Tokyo, and by those at home who support their efforts. When and where this awful strife will end, no one can know. The armies of Hitler and relegated Tojo are still strong and well equipped. We of the Allied Nations must remain prepared for long months of struggle and sacrifice. The price is too great to gamble with victory.

The total defeat of those who seek to spread their savage doctrine by subtle propaganda and by force of arms must be achieved before security can be restored to the world. Then, and then only, can we resume the full scope of our peacetime works for the benefit of man.

An Appeal to Governor Dewey on the Soldier Vote

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN J. ROONEY
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 10, 1944

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an item which appeared in this morning's New York Times entitled "An Appeal to Governor Dewey on the Soldier Vote."

This article, which is apparently a paid item submitted by Republican, Democratic, and independent voters of an organization known as the Citizens' Nonpartisan Committee for the Serviceman's Vote, impresses me because it very definitely and succinctly explains the unfair deal being accorded New Yorkers in the armed forces as well as those serving in the merchant marine, Red Cross, and U. S. O., who will not be permitted to exercise their right of suffrage next November. It clearly lays the responsibility for this shameful situation at the door of Governor Dewey who has arbitrarily refused to reconsider the Republican legislation that he approved only a few months ago and which, in effect, bars men willing to sacrifice their lives upon the altar of their country from casting their vote in our coming national election. The article follows:

AN APPEAL TO GOVERNOR DEWEY ON THE SOLDIER VOTE

Governor Dewey: Recently you issued a statement to the press.

In your statement you said:

"The New York soldier-vote law is a model of simplicity."

Why, then, Mr. Governor, have only 130,000 applications for war ballots been received—and these are your own figures—when 900,000 New York State servicemen are eligible to vote? Compare this with Pennsylvania, where, under a Republican administration but a simpler soldier-vote law, more than 450,000 servicemen have already applied, out of an eligible 500,000.

If the law is so simple, why, Mr. Governor, did William T. Simpson, your own appointee, as head of the State war ballot commission, declare that he expected no more than 250,000 New York State servicemen to vote?

Mr. Simpson's doubts were very well founded for the following reasons: In Pennsylvania, for example, any friend or relative can have a ballot sent to a serviceman, but in New York the serviceman must apply in writing himself. Imagine, Mr. Governor, the men in the fox holes of Normandy and the steaming jungles of the southern Pacific taking time out to study the complicated New York law and writing to Albany for a ballot. The soldier's first job is to fight; it is your job and ours to find a simple method whereby he may vote.

Remember, Mr. Governor, that last year your attorney general permitted ballots to be sent to men overseas without their sending in applications for them. But what was considered constitutional a year ago has suddenly become unconstitutional in 1944—and now only the soldier himself can apply. Why did this happen, Mr. Governor? Isn't the willingness to die for his country application enough for any soldier?

And if the soldier does apply, Mr. Governor, what guaranty have we that his vote will be received by November 3? Why do we require the serviceman's vote to be in before the civilian vote—4 days before election day? In 1942 and 1943, ballots from servicemen overseas were counted if received by December 10.

Examine the red tape involved in the voting procedure, Mr. Governor.

First, the soldier must apply in person for a ballot.

Then, but not until September 7, the ballot must be sent to the soldier.

If the ballot reaches the soldier, he returns it to the State war ballot commission.

Then the State sends it to the county.

Then the county sends it to the assembly district and the election district—and all this incredible process must be accomplished within 57 days.

Governor Dewey, do you really believe this to be a simple law?

In your statement, Mr. Governor, you said: "A group has been playing partisan politics with the right of New York State's fighting men to vote."

But, Mr. Governor, the New York Times, the New York Herald Tribune, the Citizens' Union, and many other publications and civic organizations have objected to the complexity of this law. Surely, they cannot all be accused of partisan motives.

Mr. Governor, why not remove, once and for all, the whole issue from politics. This can be done by simplifying the law and making it as easy as in Pennsylvania, for example, for the soldier to vote. You can do this by permitting anyone to apply for ballots to be sent to servicemen, by extending the time limit for receiving ballots, and by broadening the law to include merchant marine, the U. S. O., and Red Cross workers. If you think these changes can only be accomplished by a special session of the State legislature, we urge you to convene one immediately.

This is not a partisan appeal, Mr. Governer. There are Republicans, Democrats, and independent voters on our committee. We ask only that men willing to die for their country be allowed to vote in its next election. We beg you—simplify the soldier vote law and make certain that all New York servicemen will be able to vote.

CITIZENS' NONPARTISAN COMMITTEE FOR THE SERVICEMAN'S VOTE.

A Hero of the Beachheads

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LOUIS LUDLOW
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 10, 1944

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, when the history of World War No. 2 is written the achievements of a modest 20-year-old Coast Guard man of Indianapolis will shine with undying luster.

On three occasions, twice at Salerno last September, and again on D-day at Normandy, this young man, who is an expert swimmer, carried a life line from landing craft to the beachhead in the face of withering fire that brought death to all around him.

His deeds were of a quality that a master of literature like Milton or Shakespeare might immortalize in an epic of the battle fronts.

Gene E. Oxley is the name of this returning, soft-speaking youth. Gene is the name by which he is known among the boys and girls of the Broad Ripple section of Indianapolis where he grew up.

Notwithstanding the extremely perilous nature of his exploits in the theaters of war, Gene did not receive a scratch.

After being feted for several days in Washington as one of the outstanding heroes of the war, he left today for Indianapolis to visit his mother whom he has not seen for over 2 years.

A vivid description of Oxley's valorous conduct on D-day is contained in the following press release issued by the Public Relations Office of the Coast Guard:

INDIANAPOLIS COAST GUARD MAN HAS THREE SHIPS SHOT OUT FROM HIM—LOSES ONLY SEAT OF HIS PANTS

AT A SURVIVOR BASE IN SOUTHERN ENGLAND, June 25.—How a 20-year-old Coast Guard man, Gene Oxley, R. R. No. 16, Indianapolis, Ind., voluntarily swam ashore in the face of heavy German .88s and machine-gun fire to secure a lifeline to the beachhead and subsequently lost the seat of his pants and three ships, was disclosed here today.

On D-day, Oxley's ship, a Coast Guard LCI, nosed her way toward the beach with a load of soldiers. While still some yards off the shore and in the midst of unexploded mines, she was stopped dead by six hits from German .88 shore batteries. Oxley volunteered to swim ashore with a man rope, so that the soldiers could pull themselves into the beachhead.

"I swam the line ashore while machine-gun bullets were dropping around me like rain," Oxley related. "I stood on the shore holding the man rope. As four soldiers were coming down the ramp an .88 shell blew the ramp away. From then on, 36 soldiers came over the side.

"They started pulling themselves toward the shore through the withering fire. Only six made it."

The ship's stern anchor winch was knocked out by shell fire and she began to drift. German batteries, firing at point-blank range, put shells through the wheel house, chewing the clothes off Chief Quartermaster Charles O. McWhirter, Dallas, Tex. The vessel, blown to a shambles, sank a short time later.

Oxley left on the beach, dug a foxhole along with the surviving soldiers. The beachhead at that point was only about 15 yards deep.

"The tide came in," Oxley said, "and forced us out of our shallow foxholes. It pushed us too high and Nazi snipers got some of the soldiers.

"I had to crawl on my belly," Oxley continued, "and then run for it. When I first jumped out of the hole, they started spraying machine-gun fire at me.

"I finally got aboard an LCI and they started firing at it." The Coast Guard craft, already suffering from several shell hits, put out for another load of troops with Oxley aboard.

The LCI took on her cargo of troops and threaded her way back to the beachhead through unexploded "teller" mines. Oxley, who had already survived two sinking vessels, said to a crewman of the craft, "I think I'm a jinx!"

Just then the Germans got the range again. The Nazi batteries whizzed two through the wheel house, landed two on the starboard box, put a shell in the troop officers' quarters, and riddled the port side with 155 millimeter shells.

By that time Oxley had left the craft and was on the beach again surrounded with German fire.

"I lay there in a foxhole from 3 p. m. to 5:45 p. m. It was hell! Dead soldiers were all over the beach. The destroyer U. S. S. Doyle was sent in to pick us up but she couldn't take us all. I waited till the last trip.

"The back of my trousers was shot off sometime while I was running on the beach," Oxley remarked.

"I was pretty scared, but I guess that was natural. I stayed over in France 3 days and sweated out the air raids. When I got back to England I found the guys all thought I was dead. I guess I was just lucky."

Win the War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. AUGUSTINE B. KELLEY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 10, 1944

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, the June 22 issue of The Progressive Labor World, published in Philadelphia, carries a lyric poem by James Patrick McGovern which is so timely and inspirational as to be worthy of a musical setting by one of our Nation's great composers. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The verses are as follows:

WIN THE WAR

Win the war,
There's nothing comes before;
Win, win, win the war.
This vital call rings clarion-clear
To all who have the will to hear,
To all who hold their country dear;
To every woman, child, and man,
To every American—
Win the war.

Win the war,
There's nothing comes before;
Win, win, win the war.
This goal transcends all civil strife,
Now that the need is doubly rife,
Now that the millions fight for life;
So let each woman, child, and man,
Let every American—
Win the war.

Win the war,
There's nothing comes before;
Win, win, win the war.
The soldier fights where hell holds sway,
He bleeds through twice 12 hours a day,
He dies with duty his aim and pay;
Then have each woman, child, and man,
Have every American—
Win the war.

Win the war,
There's nothing comes before;
Win, win, win the war.
The fronts abroad and home are one,
A shot may mean we've lost or won.
Whate'er your part be sure it's well done;
Then may each woman, child, and man,
May every American—
Win the war.

Win the war,
There's nothing comes before;
Win, win, win the war.
The slacker smites at each one's breast,
He serves himself who serves the rest,
The country of all, by all be blessed;
So must each woman, child, and man,
Must every American—
Win the war.

Letter From Technical Sgt. John H. Hill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN TABER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 10, 1944

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter from Technical Sgt. John H. Hill, Company E, Eighteenth Infantry, First Division.

Technical Sergeant Hill is an only son. He has been overseas for about 2 years and as a soldier in the famous Fighting First took part in the Tunisian and also the Sicilian invasions and campaigns. The New York Times reported that the First was one of the first divisions Gen. Omar Bradley asked for for the invasion of France. Technical Sergeant Hill was awarded the Bronze Star Medal with a citation for high courage, fine leadership, and unswerving devotion to duty. He is 22 years old and recently married Miss Morrison, of Paisley, Scotland. He is the son of the Millard Hills, of Union Springs, N. Y. The Famous First has written one more page of glory in its great history.

His letter follows:

SOMEWHERE IN FRANCE,
July 1, 1944.

DEAR DAD: Here I am, Dad, with a few lines. Mom says that you never got my other letter. I don't know what I am going to write now that I have started it. I guess I might as well tell you what has happened so far. I won't mention any places so I guess it will pass. I don't like to write things like this to Mom.

Here is what it is like:

On D-day it was very windy and the channel was rough as hell. We were on a big transport about 14 miles out in the channel. As day broke we could see our planes overhead. There were hundreds of them. All the men on the ship were tense and nervous. Many of them had never seen combat before. As I stood on the deck and watched the planes I gained confidence. We could see them bombing the coast and the battleships and destroyers shelling the coast, too. As I watched the tremendous barrage on shore I figured that it would be very easy to seize the high ground.

The time came for us to go. We scrambled down the nets with our equipment into small assault boats, about 30 men to a boat. We were around in the rough sea for about an hour until all our unit was ready to go. Then we started ashore and went past the battleships and destroyers. Things looked very good. Each man had a heavy load of ammunition and rations, plus other things with which to destroy enemy installations. Many men were sick before we hit the shore.

Now we could see the hill with pill boxes on it and obstacles in the water. They consisted of triangular pieces of railroad track driven into the sand with mines attached to them. You can see for yourself what that would do to a boat if it hit one. Then the Germans opened up with 88 mm. guns and heavy mortar fire. Things looked bad now and you wondered how they could have survived the pounding the Air Force and Navy gave them. A few of the boats are blown up before they hit the shore. The waves are very high and they immediately wash the bodies ashore.

As they let the ramp down on your boat, machine-gun fire is immediately brought upon you. Other boats have sunk when they hit the obstacles but a few get ashore. You have 900 rounds of steel coming at you each moment plus the mortar and artillery fire. It is this way all along the beach. They have a chance to fire now because our Navy has lifted their fire so they won't hit us. You hit the beach and see many dead and wounded being washed ashore and hear their cries for help. You can do nothing for them so you move along looking for shelter from the flying shrapnel and small arms fire.

You have with you maybe a squad when you left the ship and you turn around and find only one or two men with you. Naturally you don't know whether they are lost, killed, wounded, or what happened to them. I had one squad of my men in my boat and the other four were in four different boats.

Days before the landing you are given an objective. You must take it or die in the attempt because you have your back to the water and ahead of you are the machine guns. You can't get a shot at them because they are dug in and on a hill, while you are on the bare beach with a small sand dune ahead of you.

An "organization" of men is a hard thing to do under fire. That is why it is so hard to retreat. Everybody is thinking of his own hide and is very panicky. Finally, you manage to get a handful of men together. An assembly position is given to the battalion for the purpose of reorganization, but you haven't yet reached it. You know where it is from your study of maps and the prominent terrain features. So you start over the hill and get plugged at all along. Finally some of the Huns pull out and you get almost to the top of the hill if you have been lucky. All of a sudden you see a puff of black smoke go in the air. The concussion knocks you down. A minute ago there was a man in front of you, but when the smoke clears there before you lies what's left of him, nothing but a leg. Others near him have been wounded by the explosion.

You shake yourself and wonder why you are still alive. That is the way it was with me. You suddenly realize you are in a mine field. It is just as safe to go ahead as to turn around. So far the doughboy is the only one ashore. The artillery hasn't landed yet and the Navy can't give you close supporting fire because they would kill too many of their own men. So you go on, hoping things are going to be O. K.

Men are screaming for first-aid men, but they are all busy. All of them are covered with blood where they have been working on men. There's about one aid man for every 40 men. It really keeps them busy. As you pass the men, lying there wounded, you want to help them and can't.

Now you are at the top of the hill and you see why you couldn't get the Hun. He was dug in so well. In many of the holes he had deep tunnels and living quarters. Many of them had electric lights. Now you are about 400 yards off the beach and the men in front of you have run into the thick hedgerows full of Jap-trained snipers with rifles and machine guns. Again you have more casualties, but you have cleared a way through the mine field and more troops are rapidly moving up to help you out. It was just like jungle fighting.

The enemy is now retreating and you are bothered with only an occasional sniper for a mile. The artillery comes ashore and things start moving. Bulldozers are working and tanks land in support of the infantry. It is early evening and you push inland and dig in for the counterattack you know is to come. Then you organize your outfit to see what you have left.

I could go on and on, but that is the way it was on the first day. It is a small picture, but it will give you some idea of why I consider myself lucky. I was pinned down by fire for about 4 hours and lost my outfit. A lot of the guys thought I was gone, but I turned up next day. This is about all there is to write about, and I hope it gets by. If it does, keep it and when I get home you see if I don't tell the same story. Now I must close. You can let Mom read it if you wish. It just gives you an idea of what the "Fighting First" did in achieving and accomplishing its mission so others could land. Say hello to Mom.

As ever,

JACK.

A Living Memorial

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 10 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 8), 1944

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address entitled "A Living Memorial," delivered by me at Whitefish Bay, Wis., where I dedicated an honor roll of boys from Whitefish Bay who are in the service.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chairman, fellow Americans, it is a great honor to be asked to speak at a dedication of your community honor roll. It is an honor and a privilege for us to pay our respects and our homage wherever our fighting men are memorialized.

I approach this occasion with the deepest humility. I am keenly conscious of the inadequacy of anything I can say here today.

This memorial, fine as it is, and our words, however fine they may be, can only be symbols of something greater than words and physical memorials.

This honor roll is a symbol of every service flag in a Whitefish Bay window. It is a symbol of the still, quiet shrine deep in the hearts and minds of every mother, father, brother, sister, and sweetheart of a serviceman.

It is a symbol of flesh-and-blood sons, brothers, husbands, fathers, and sweethearts fighting for loved ones back home.

It is sometimes a symbol of those who have gone out forever in the vast quiet spaces where they can watch forever over those of us who remain as trustees and guardians of the great American and spiritual values and the great loves they left behind.

How empty our words must be beside the fulness of their deeds and their sacrifices.

We can erect our honor rolls and our memorials. It is right that we do so, if only to mark our recognition of the trust each of these who have gone forth have left for us to cherish.

Lincoln said it better than any of us can here today. He said, "It is for us the living to be dedicated to the unfinished task which had been so nobly advanced."

I say again that our words today and our honor roll here can only be a symbol—a pledge sacred and enduring.

It is not enough for us to pay homage to these men. It is not enough for us to do them honor.

Our memorial must be a living memorial.

We must cherish the heritage these men have left us. We must preserve the values for which these men fight. We must enshrine the ideals for which these men die.

We must abandon domestic bickering and squabbling. We must submerge all selfishness in the larger task up ahead.

The war is not yet won and the peace is not yet won. To win the war and to win the peace will take every last ounce of initiative, courage, and sacrifice which we can muster.

It is not necessary to say these things here today. You people gathered here today to do honor to soldier sons and daughters—you above all know that these things are true.

It is perhaps fitting, however, that each of us search our souls for a complete understanding of the task of creating a living memorial for these men.

What does that living memorial mean?

It means, first, making certain that when our service men and women return they find this still a government—as Lincoln said, "Of, by, and for the people." A land where government is the servant and not the master as it is in the lands where these men fight to free oppressed people.

2. A living memorial means that we must keep aflame the fires of liberty and Americanism kindled in American hearts by the Declaration of Independence, the Constitution, and the Bill of Rights. These men of ours have lived in the shadows of emperor worship and Gestapo government—governments by edict and lust. The great documents which are our charter of human liberties will mean more to these men then they have ever meant to us because they have seen the fires of freedom blotted out. Our safeguards for liberty as written into these great human documents will be more than words to these men. They will be something very real—and something very precious, and something very alive—something to be given continued life in every step of our daily life, and something to be given continued life in every step of our national governmental life.

3. A living memorial means that we enshrine the ideal of a land where intolerance and bigotry and racial hatred are forever barred.

4. A living memorial means a land where freedom of opportunity has been preserved—a land where a boy can begin his career as a newsboy, and still aspire to be President of these United States—a land where initiative and thrift and diligence and enterprise are fostered; a land where science and technical achievements are not fetered; a land where there are no economic horizons; a land where servicemen will not return to peddle apples on street corners; a land where there will be jobs and the traditional American opportunities which have always characterized our country.

5. A living memorial means that we must preserve and continue to develop the traditional character of the American people. There must be no repetition of the post-war neuroses which hit our country like a vicious blight after the last World War. We must preserve as a very vital part of our national character the devout dependence on God which our forefathers incorporated into their earliest documents. We must preserve the sturdy, self-reliant, God-fearing character of a people of integrity and honor—integrity and honor not only as a nation but as individuals.

6. A living memorial means that we must obliterate class hatreds and disunity which would make us a divided people.

7. A living memorial means that we must never again permit the sacrifices these men have made—we must never again permit these sacrifices to be made in vain. We will be false to our trust if we do not painstakingly explore every last avenue of future peace. We will be recreant to our faith if we do not place the full weight and strength of every American heart and every American mind and every American arm behind any workable program for an enduring peace.

All of these hopes and all of these ideals, however, become meaningless lip service if they do not have behind them the fervent deep-rooted convictions of every one of us. Plans and formulas are not enough. Pacts and treaties are not enough. Governmental declarations alone are not enough. Only individual men and women making up an army can fight a war, and only men and women all over this land and all over the world can make an enduring peace, only if they prove themselves adequate—spiritually adequate—for the job. May the light from God shine in our hearts so that we shall not fail them.

And so, fellow Americans, it is my high privilege to dedicate this honor roll today—to dedicate it with the fervent hope that it represents our individual dedication to the ideals of a living memorial to our fighting sons.

Enforcement Activities of Treasury Department

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN J. COCHRAN
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 10, 1944

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, a very interesting report has just been released by the Treasury Department. This report includes a brief statement relative to interesting cases developed by the enforcement agencies of the Treasury Department. Under the permission granted me I include the release as part of my remarks. It follows:

Owners of $11,000 now held in a special blocked bank account are going to have to do some explaining away of suspicious circumstances before they regain control of the money, the Treasury indicated today.

The $11,000 figured in one of several incidents involving attempts during the 1944 fiscal year to smuggle into this country money suspected of being Axis loot. Elmer L. Irey, chief coordinator of enforcement, reported the case to Secretary Morgenthau in a résumé of important investigations made by the six Treasury enforcement agencies during the year.

Attempt of an airplane passenger to bring the $11,000 into Miami in his baggage led him to grief. The money was uncovered by customs search after the passenger had declared $50, the maximum importation of currency permitted without license under Foreign Funds Control regulation. Investigation traced the money to a prominent citizen of a Latin-American country, but satisfactory explanation of how this person obtained the currency has yet to be presented.

In a similar case a seaman on a Portuguese vessel drew a year in jail for smuggling currency into Philadelphia and attempting to take the proceeds out in the form of travelers' checks.

The Foreign Funds Control also discovered and blocked substantial funds held in a New York bank in the name of an American citizen on behalf of a German residing in Tokyo and employed there by a large German chemical company. Criminal action in the case is under consideration.

Sharp-eyed Treasury agents found one man who made money on the races—at least temporarily. This case was developed by agents of the intelligence unit of the Bureau of Internal Revenue, and resulted in a 5-year prison term and a $5,000 fine for tax evasion for James J. Gavin, of Jeffersonville, Ind. Gavin "beat the races" during the period 1935 to 1938 to the extent of $125,000. He failed to share his luck with Uncle Sam, on the professed theory that sooner or later he would lose it to the bookies.

Sudden evidence of affluence aroused the curiosity of a revenue agent making a routine check of the man's income-tax returns. The Intelligence Unit then developed the evidence of evasion.

A 3-year prison term and a $40,000 fine was assessed Almon B. Hall, and an 18 months' term and $20,000 fine imposed on his brother, Louis C. Hall, on tax evasion charges. The brothers engaged in a chicken-raising business at Wallingford, Conn., and were found to owe approximately $300,000 additional tax.

Almon B. Hall is the individual who testified at the trial, several years ago, of former Judge Martin T. Manton that he paid $62,000 to obtain a favorable court decision by Manton in a pending case.

A little matter of 143 miles of elastic (unstretched) figured in one of the most interesting customs cases developed during the 1944 fiscal year. The case involved Icek M. Mondlak, a European war refugee, who abused United States hospitality by engaging in two-way smuggling operations on the Mexican border, dealing in such items as zippers, light switches, ladies' hosiery and underwear, and other war-scarce merchandise, as well as the bales of elastic and jewelry. Customs officers have seized contraband worth $20,000, and bail bonds of $8,500 have been forfeited for Mondlak and an associate. The smugglers operated near El Paso.

Customs officers at Buffalo, N. Y., broke up a lucrative business in smuggled Canadian silver fox furs with the arrest of Harvey A. Milne, Ferne A. Milne, and William Siegel. One hundred and twenty skins appraised at $6,000 were seized. Harry Friefeld, of New York City, also was indicted in this case, and claims totaling $55,000 are being pressed against handlers of other shipments totaling 520 skins.

Major narcotics case developed during the year involved William Levin, identified by the Bureau of Narcotics as a member of the notorious "Black Tony" Parmagini gang, only recently released after serving a 17-year prison sentence for trafficking in narcotics. Levin reestablished connections with another old offender, Jack Siemen, of Vancouver, British Columbia, and organized a traffic in narcotics out of Mexico, using Morris Irwin, Canadian customs employee, as a courier. Irwin was arrested at Glendale, Calif., February 9, 1944, as he boarded a Canada-bound train with a large shipment of opium. Levin and his wife, Elizabeth, were arrested the following day with more contraband and attempted unsuccessfully to flush down a drain $5,000 they allegedly had received from Irwin in payment for the opium. Canadian authorities arrested Sieman.

William Levin was sentenced at Los Angeles on April 17, to 10 years in prison, and his wife to 18 months. A week later, Irwin was sentenced to 5 years, and Sieman subsequently was tried in Canada, and given a 7-year term.

United States Secret Service officials foresaw a new post-war problem in fighting the forgery racket with the arrest on June 12, by Atlanta agents, of David Flagg, Jr., on charges of theft and forgery of nine $100 checks issued to soldiers as mustering-out pay. Among check forgery cases developed during the year was one involving two 19-year-old Altoona, Pa., girls identified as passers of a number of Treasury and commercial checks; a case involving six 12- to 14-year-old boys at Louisville, Ky., in numerous letter box thefts of checks, and one involving a Chicago woman whose stock in trade consisted of a baby in arms to facilitate passing the stolen checks, and a screw driver with which she pried open mail boxes.

Wholesale thefts of mail in Harlem, New York City, in which Army and Navy allotment and allowance checks were taken, were curbed with a series of arrests made by the Service in cooperation with New York City police and post office inspectors.

Substantial jail or prison terms were handed down by the courts in a number of black market liquor conspiracy cases brought to trial on evidence developed by the Alcohol Tax Unit of the Bureau of Internal Revenue.

At Newark, N. J., Harry Sorowitz, Emanuel Kremer, and four others pleaded guilty to selling large quantities of whisky at over-the-ceiling prices, and drew sentences totaling 2½ years to serve, and fines totaling $22,000. Five persons involved in a similar case at Ashland, Ky., drew sentences totaling 20 months and fines totaling $40,000. At St. Paul, Minn., Sam Taran and six others drew fines amounting to $51,000 in addition to prison sentences totaling 2 years.

An Intricate Analysis of a Simple Subject, the Nature of Money

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. COMPTON I. WHITE
OF IDAHO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 10, 1944

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, much is being written about money these days. Anyone who seeks information concerning money by reading current articles on the subject usually finds himself threading through a maze of devious and intricate analyses as presented by our economists, when, in fact, the fundamental principles of money are as simple and controlling as the laws of gravity.

I have just read an illuminating (?) article by the economist Anatol Murad, published in the Southern Economic Journal, entitled "The Nature of Money," which is submitted for the consideration of my colleagues. However, as a preface to the eminent economist's treatise, I will insert my conception of money and the principles of economic law controlling the money function.

In considering the money subject we must differentiate between cash and credit. Many things are susceptible to being used as a medium of exchange, including checks and other credit tokens. But anything to be real money must be legal tender. Money has three functions—a measure of value, a medium of exchange, and a storage of wealth.

The creation of money is naturally a government monopoly. Money, to be stable in value, must increase in volume evenly with the growth of population and commerce. While values are almost universally measured in terms of money, credit and credit tokens are in general use in domestic transactions as a medium of exchange in place of money. The volume of money in circulation in conjunction with the volume of credit and credit tokens used as money, affected, of course, by the law of supply and demand, establishes the commodity price level—a drastic reduction in the volume of credit used as money will cause a fall in prices and reduce the commodity price level, thereby increasing the purchasing power of money, which is usually attended by a depressing effect on business and employment.

A money volume that is increasing evenly with the growth of population and commerce, roughly estimated to be 3 percent a year, is the best safeguard to a stable national economy and the prevention of financial depressions and a reduction in employment.

Credit is an unstable element, dependent on business confidence, and is subject to being withdrawn from use as a medium of exchange when most needed, with a disturbing effect on prices, business, and employment.

The money problem was met and solved by the founders of our Government at the time this Nation was established, when a monetary system had to be adopted to supply the money function with which taxes might be levied and paid, and settlements made for services and commodities. Congress simply decreed that 27 grains of standard gold and 416 grains of standard silver each was a dollar and made the dollar in the metric system our standard of value, legal tender for all debts and dues public and private. There was nothing complicated or intricate about this money plan. Gold and silver dollars were made the money of ultimate redemption by law and all obligations and credit tokens were redeemable in dollars of gold or silver specie. The price of all things adjusted themselves to the value of the dollar. The production of the gold and silver by the miners who could take these money metals to the mint and have them coined provided the steady increasing supply of money of ultimate redemption that kept pace with the growing money needs of increasing population and commerce.

This money system gave to the young American Nation the wherewithal to purchase Louisiana, Florida, add Texas, California, and the Oregon country to our national commonwealth during the period of our country's greatest growth and expansion in the gold and silver money era between the Revolution and the Civil War.

And now for the intricate explanation of the nature of money by one of our eminent economists:

THE NATURE OF MONEY

(By Antatol Murad, University of Southern California)

This paper is devoted to a critique of the commonly accepted definition of money. A correct and unequivocal definition of money is in itself of sufficient importance to command the attention of the student of economics. The critique here presented is, however, not concerned with verbalistic polemics, but attempts to unravel some basic misconceptions and confusions which seem to lie hidden beneath the customary definition—misconceptions and confusions which have a crucial bearing on some aspects of monetary theory and policy.

I. THE TRADITIONAL DEFINITION OF MONEY

1. Money is commonly defined as a commodity serving as a medium of exchange, a standard of value, a standard of deferred payments, a store of value, and a reserve for bank credit. Some elementary textbooks on money omit one or the other function from their definitions; others include additional functions or subdivisions of the functions of money. While the emphasis placed upon the several functions varies, the great majority of textbooks single out the medium of exchange function of money as primary, relegating the remaining functions to secondary or subsidiary status. Except for such minor differences, this definition of money is accepted as axiomatic. Writers on more advanced phases of monetary theory, presupposing the readers' knowledge of so elementary a proposition, usually neglect to refer to it even in passing.

If money is a commodity serving primarily as a medium of exchange, it must, of course, possess certain qualifications which make it eligible for such service. Elementary textbooks teach us that the money commodity must be (1) portable, (2) indestructible, (3) uniform, (4) cognizable, (5) divisible, (6) malleable, (7) useful, (8) of stable and high specific value. Precious metals, particularly gold, possess the largest measure of these qualities and for this reason are supposed to have superseded the earlier and less practical money commodities, such as cowrie shell, cattle, hides, etc.

The prevailing view, then, is that money is an article, a useful thing, a commodity; that this commodity must possess certain qualities enabling it to function as a medium of exchange; that it becomes money by virtue of the primary function; and that, in addition, it has some subsidiary functions. Presumably, if there were no such exchange commodity, there would be no money.

2. It can be readily understood that such an interpretation of the nature of money should have appeared convincing and self-evident when money exchanges (purchases and sales) actually involved the transference of a piece of metal, coined or uncoined, or of some other "money commodity." But it is difficult to see why it should continue to command such a wide following even today, when checks, bank notes, and similar credit instruments constitute the bulk of our media of exchange, while payments in coin account for only a small fraction of total payments; when, furthermore, all coins are token coins—their metallic content being utterly irrelevant and of no interest whatever to the recipient, who would accept a piece of paper with equal readiness; when the "exchange commodity" par excellence, gold, is not used as a medium of exchange at all, is no longer coined anywhere in the world, and its use for monetary purposes is forbidden in most countries; when, finally, these facts are not only recognized, but even emphasized by all writers on money.

The apparent contradiction between the definition of money as the commodity used as a medium of exchange, and the fact that we do not use any commodity at all as a means of exchange, should at once arouse doubt regarding the validity of that definition. Yet, instead of subjecting their basic concepts to rigorous criticism in an attempt to fit their definitions of money to the observed facts, most writers on the subject torture the facts into the framework of their a priori definitions.

II. THE MEDIUM OF EXCHANGE

3. The definition of money as the medium of exchange implies that the media of exchange must be money. If the media of exchange happen to be credit instruments, then these credit instruments must properly be regarded as money. Some authors following this line of reasoning therefore speak of credit money, bank money, or deposit money.

Yet it is generally recognized that credit instruments are not money, but evidences of debts (or claims) stated in terms of money. To say that credit instruments are money is to say that money is an evidence of debts (or claims) stated in terms of itself. Such a statement is obviously absurd. If credit instruments must be stated in terms of money, they themselves cannot be money. Money clearly, therefore, must be something else than the pieces of paper and other tokens (all expressed in terms of money) which are used as media of exchange.

4. It may be thought that the difficulty could be escaped by admitting that the credit media of exchange are not themselves money, but merely claims to money which because of their unquestioned and immediate convertibility into real money are capable of functioning as a substitute for money. Some textbooks, accordingly, take the position that bank money is not really money, even though it performs the medium-of-exchange function.

There are several objections to such a view.

In the first place, if the medium of exchange is not money, but something that circulates in the place of money, then money is not the medium of exchange.

Secondly, if the medium of exchange is not money, but at best a money substitute, the question remains: a substitute for what? What is the real money commodity?

If it be answered that money is that into which the credit media of exchange are convertible, we are once more trapped in a cul de sac. Though there is apparent historical justification for regarding the power of credit instruments to perform the medium of exchange function as resting upon their convertibility into the money commodity (gold, silver, etc.), the present-day situation clearly does not support such a view. Credit money today is convertible, not into any money commodity, but only into whatever the Government decrees to be a legal tender in the payment of debts. Such legal tender universally consists of central bank credit in one form or another, and of Government note currency, usually—like bank notes—in the form of a promise to pay a certain sum of money, and always stated in terms of money.[1] In other words, credit money is convertible only into other credit money.

The contention that the actual media of exchange (credit instruments) are but substitutes for the real media of exchange (money) into which they are convertible, only serves to make confusion worse confounded. Money, apparently, is nowhere to be found. One is led to the conclusion that there is no money, but only money substitutes—credit media of exchange—unless the latter are defined as money. And that course is foreclosed by the uncomfortable fact that media of exchange must be stated in terms of money and, consequently, cannot be money.

[1] Nor can coins be regarded as the money commodity, or real money, into which the credit media of exchange are convertible, since these coins are without exception token coins containing an amount of metal worthless than their face value and circulating entirely by face value. Therefore, like credit instruments, they must be regarded as media of exchange stated in terms of money—and not as money itself—even if they possess unlimited legal tender power.

5. Some writers, unwilling to include all actual exchange media in their definition of money, yet unable to exclude them all from it, settle on a compromise course. They treat, by implication at least, all legal tender media of exchange as money, relegating other currency, especially check currency, to the status of substitute money. Justification for such procedure would seem to lie in the fact that the money into which credit media of exchange are convertible is legal tender currency.

Once more, however, logical difficulties force a rejection of such a view.

In the first place, there remains the fundamental difficulty that all legal tender media of exchange today are credit instruments (or token coins) stated in terms of money and, therefore, cannot be money themselves.

Secondly, it is conceivable that the State may not confer legal tender powers upon any of the means of payment. It is true that today every State has endowed some currency with legal tender power, but, after all, "the development of the legal tender concept is a comparatively recent phenomenon."[3] Money was used and talked about long before there was a legal tender. Certainly it could not be held that money would not, and did not, exist in the absence of legal tender laws.[4]

6. One other consideration casts doubt on the validity of the proposition that money is a commodity functioning as the medium of exchange. The notes and checks which are our actual media of exchange can hardly be regarded as commodities. Checks may be useful as devices for transferring purchasing power from one person to another, but the material of which they are made is obviously not useful or valuable except in a sophistic sense. Banks hand them out free of charge. If these credit instruments are, nevertheless, regarded as the objects endowed by law or custom with a value which enables them to function as media of exchange, this is simply due to a confusion of the amount of money indicated on the face of the credit instrument with the instrument itself. It would be tantamount to regarding a freight car loaded with gold as more valuable than a freight car loaded with coal. The conveyance itself is, clearly, something else than the value which it conveys.

Furthermore, it is quite possible to conceive a monetary system which does not include any thing passing from hand to hand as a medium of exchange. Even today a large volume of payments is made, not by the exchange of tangible credit instruments but by offsetting bookkeeping entries. Payments between banks in the United States are largely effected by credit and debit entries on the books of the Federal Reserve Banks. The Giro system which is widely used in central Europe does not involve the passing of credit instruments. If such a system were perfected to the extent of doing away with all tangible media of exchange and if central bank book credits were declared to be the only legal tender, then certainly it could not be held that the medium of exchange is a commodity, an article or a thing. According to the customary definition of money there would then be no money, since there would be no commodity or article circulating as a medium of exchange. Obviously, however, this could not be the case, since debits and credits on the books of the banks (as well as prices and debts generally) would still have to be stated in terms of money, even as today.

7. These considerations lead to the conclusion that money, whatever it may be, is not the medium of exchange. Media of exchange, or means of payment, are debits and credits, usually (though not necessarily) evidenced by tangible credit (or debt) instruments. Credit instruments possess varying degrees of negotiability or circulation power. Those endowed with the highest degree of circulation power—the most current credit instruments—are currency. Currency, in turn, may or may not possess legal tender quality.[4] Finally credit instruments—the tangible evidences of debts and claims—may be made of any material found convenient for the purpose: Paper, metal, wood, porcelain or anything else. The material is entirely irrelevant to the basic credit nature of the means of payment. A credit instrument made of copper, silver, or gold cannot be money any more than a legal tender note or a traveler's check. The mere fact that a certain commodity, e. g., gold or silver, may be employed as the material of which credit instruments are made does not warrant the definition of such a commodity, or of the credit instruments made of it, as money. A correct definition of money, therefore, must not imply that money is the medium of exchange nor that the medium of exchange is a commodity.

III. THE STORE OF VALUE

8. Value may be stored in the form of real property, chattels, rights of all descriptions, or in the form of current media of exchange. Only value stored in the latter form is, or could be, held to be money, for otherwise all commodities, all things of value, would have to be called money. For this reason the store-of-value function of money is generally thought to derive from the medium of exchange function. But if the medium of exchange is not money, then it follows that money cannot be the store of value (in the sense of media of exchange) either.

Writers on money who do not regard credit currency as money frequently point out that the use of money as a store of value has become unimportant in the western world, where people generally store their value in the form of securities or bank deposits. Usually they turn to the Orient for illustration of the use of money as a store of value. In India, for instance, people are said to insist on hoarding money—gold and silver.

On what grounds can such metal stores be called money? When the Indian ryot purchases a silver ornament or a few ounces of silver bullion at the bazaar, he buys not money, but a commodity which in time of need he can sell again—which he can reconvert into perhaps more or less of the same currency in which he paid for it. It so happens that age-old custom impels him to invest his surplus funds in precious metals rather than in real estate, bonds or savings accounts preferred by his more gain-loving occidental fellowmen.

When, on the other hand, he hoards coins, he merely amasses a supply of media of exchange, representing purchasing power by virtue of their nominal money value, and not because of their metallic content. That the Indian peasant mistakenly believes the value of his coin hoard to lie in the metal of which the coins are made, and that, consequently, he sometimes refuses to hoard bank notes or other paper currency which would serve his purpose equally well, especially if they possess legal tender power, proves only that he shares the misconceptions regarding the nature of money prevalent among economists.

Sometimes it may indeed prove wise to hoard coins rather than bank note currency or bank deposits, because of an anticipated depreciation of the latter types of currency due, for instance, to bank failures; or because of an expected rise of the metal value above the face value of coins resulting from upward revision of the mint price of metal or from abandonment of the "metal standard."[5] In the first case, the preference for coin is but an expression of a demand for legal tender currency, in the second case it represents speculation in the metal of which the coins are made. When only token coins are available such speculation would naturally lead to purchases of the metal in the market, which would be cheaper than the hoarding of coins.

Whatever money may be, it is not the commodity serving as the store of value, even as it is not the commodity serving as the medium of exchange, or currency. Conversely, currency, whether used as a medium of exchange or as a store of value, cannot be defined as money without involving an obvious contradiction. For if currency were defined as money, a new name would have to be invented for that in terms of which currency must be stated.

IV. RESERVE FOR BANK CREDIT

9. If money is not a medium of exchange and, therefore, not a store of value, it cannot be the commodity serving as bank reserve, either. The thought that banks must keep a reserve of "real" money in order to be able to convert their notes and other credit instruments circulating as money "substitutes" is obviously a carry-over from the time when such bank currency actually had to be convertible into metal, and when metal was universally believed to be money. Today banks must still maintain reserves since they must still be able to assure the convertibility of their obligations, but these reserves do not take the form of metal nor, as a rule, even of any kind of tangible currency.

101. Any commercial bank must always be ready and able to convert its obligations (deposits) into such other means of payment as its creditors may legally demand. Demand for conversion is most frequently demand for a deposit with another bank. Bank A, let us say, is asked to convert a part of its deposits into deposits with bank B. Bank B, in turn, will be willing to create the desired additional deposit liability only in consideration of a sufficient inducement. Quantitatively, the most important inducement which bank A can offer to bank B are claims upon the latter. In other words, conversion of bank deposits is largely effected through clearing. if bank A cannot offer bank B a sufficient amount of claims against B, it could offer a claim against itself instead. More frequently, however, bank B will want something better than a claim on A. It will want a claim against banks in general, or generalized bank credit. Central bank credit is such generalized bank credit. Therefore, conversions of bank obligations, insofar as they cannot be effected through clearing, are accomplished through transfers of central bank obligations.

Demand for conversion of bank obligations may also be demand for legal tender means of payment. The bulk of legal tender currency (except coin) consists of notes issued

[3] Nussbaum, Arthur, Money in the Law, 1939, p. 44.

[4] The same objections must be leveled against Knapp's definition of money as anything which the State accepts in payments to itself. Today payments to the State are made predominantly by check. Again, there was a time when the State was nonexistent, or at any rate did not receive payments other than payments in kind. Yet money undoubtedly existed even when no payments were made to the State.

[4] Legal-tender power, however, need not necessarily be attached to a tangible thing, but may equally be conferred upon intangibles, such as book credits with central banks.

[5] It is, of course, perfectly possible for the abandonment of the "metal standard" to be attended by a decline in the price of the metal in question. Germany's abandonment of the "silver standard" and Sweden's temporary suspension of the "gold standard" during the World War may be cited as examples.

by the central bank—again, central bank obligations.

The bank's ability to convert its obligations into whatever the creditors may demand is, therefore, assured as long as it has a sufficient supply of central bank obligations or even the power to obtain such obligations at short notice, for instance, by rediscounting. For this reason banks maintain primary reserves in the form of central bank deposits, and secondary reserves in the form of assets readily convertible into central bank deposits.

Neither of these reserves could in any sense be regarded as money—the commodity serving as bank reserve. Secondary reserves are securities—interest bearing credit instruments. Primary reserves are demand deposits. They are neither commodities nor money, but demand obligations stated in terms of money. Bank reserves, then, consist of central bank credit, not of money; and money cannot be defined as the commodity serving as bank reserve.

11. This conclusion might be considered irrelevant on the ground that the reserves, which, according to the textbooks, consist of money, are not the reserves of commercial banks, but those of the central bank itself; that granting the fact that commercial bank reserves are but another form of credit—central bank credit—these reserves, in turn, must be secured by reserves of real money, if the whole credit structure is not to collapse.

If bank reserves are required to assure convertibility of bank credit, and if central bank credit represents the highest stage of conversion through which a credit instrument may be carried, then the question naturally arises, Why should central banks maintain any reserves at all? Legal tender central bank obligations (whether in the form of deposits or notes) are by definition not convertible into anything but themselves. The central bank could always meet any demands for conversion of notes or deposits by giving its creditors again notes and deposits. Any "reserve" under such circumstances would seem to be, and actually is, entirely superfluous and fictitious. A central bank reserve consisting of central bank credit could, moreover, not be regarded as the money commodity any more than commercial bank reserves which consist of the same intangible central bank credit.

Central banks, nevertheless, maintain reserves, not because they must be able to convert money substitutes into real money, but because as a general rule they are expected to maintain convertibility of domestic currency into foreign currencies at a fixed, or at least at some rate of exchange. For the reason central bank reserves consist largely of claims upon foreign banks and central banks.

A reserve consisting of gold would, of course, answer the same purpose as long as all countries are prepared to buy and sell gold at a fixed price, for then the possession of gold becomes synonymous with the power to obtain foreign exchange. Under the so-called international gold standard a majority of all countries actually had established a fixed price for gold and central bank reserves could, therefore, take the form of gold. Gold was a means to an end, the end being conversion of domestic into foreign money claims. As long as there is a "gold standard," gold may, for brevity, be identified with these foreign money claims. It functions as a sort of international money claim. But gold as such is, of course, a commodity bought and sold, like any other commodity, at a price, i. e., in terms of money. Price being value in terms of money, money could have no price, and, therefore, gold (a commodity bought and sold at a price) cannot be money. Even the stanchest metallist could not regard gold bullion as money. Central bank reserves, then, again are credit instruments. They are claims stated in terms of foreign money, but are not themselves money.

V. THE STANDARD OF VALUE

12. If money is neither a medium of exchange, nor a store of value, nor a reserve for bank credit, what is money?

Textbooks tell us that money is also the commodity serving as a standard of value and as a standard of deferred payments.

Apparently we are to understand that a distinction must be made between these two functions. The standard of value supposedly serves as the common denominator in terms of which we express the value of commodities; it enables us to put prices on commodities. The standard of deferred payments, on the other hand, permits us to use a common denominator for debts and claims.

Now, debts and claims arise from contracts involving valuations of commodities. Insofar as these valuations are made in terms of the standard of value, the debts and credits must also be stated in terms of the standard of value. In other words, the standard of value is also the standard of deferred payments and therefore is the standard of deferred payments. To say that money is the standard of deferred payments in addition to being the standard of value is very much like saying that the kilogram is a standard of weight and a standard for contracts to deliver a certain weight of something in the future.

The definition of money as the commodity serving as the standard of value and standard of deferred payments is tautological.[6] There is no separate standard of deferred payments. Moreover, if there were a standard of deferred payments in addition to a standard of value, one or the other would have to be something else than money. And yet money is asserted to be both.

13. The process of elimination followed up to this point leads to the conclusion that money must be the standard of value and that it cannot be anything else. The standard of value in terms of which we state prices and debts is money. To assign the same name to the means of payment would involve a confusion in concepts, since, as shown before, the means of payment are not the same as the standard of value, and must themselves be stated (like all money claims or debts) in terms of the standard of value. But to deny the name money to the standard of value would be simply quibbling about terms.

While money is certainly the standard of value, it remains to be seen if the standard of value can be a commodity.

14.[7] By definition, a standard is a measure of things, a commonly accepted unit in terms of which certain characteristics such as length, weight, or value can be measured. The extent to which an object possesses the characteristic of length could be expressed by saying that it is twice as long, or half as long as some other object. A difficulty, however, would arise if the length of the reference object is not known to the person to whom the length of the first object is to be conveyed. To obviate this difficulty, the relation between any particular length or distance and any other length or distance is always expressed in terms of a standard unit of length which is universally known and which, therefore, can promptly be translated into the length of any object. To say that an object has a length of 1 meter, is to say all at once that it has twice the length of an object half a meter long, half the length of an object 2 meters long, one-tenth the length of object 10 meters long, and so on. The standard unit of length, then, expresses the length of any object relative to the length of any and all other things.

Similarly, the standard unit of value expresses the relative degree to which a thing possesses value. The only kind of value which such a standard unit could express is, of course, exchange value—or the power of that thing to command other things in exchange for itself. The purchasing power of, say, a bushel of wheat could be expressed by saying that it could be exchanged for 2 bushels of corn. However, this would mean nothing to someone who does not know to what extent a bushel of corn possesses exchange value, or the power to command other goods. Here again, it is necessary to express the degree of exchange value (purchasing power) possessed by any particular commodity in terms of the values of any and all other things possessing exchange value—or in terms of all other commodities. This is accomplished by expressing exchange value in terms of standard units of value, even as length is expressed in terms of standard units of length. To say that a bushel of wheat has an exchange value of one unit (e. g., $1), is to say all at once that it has an exchange value twice as large as that of a commodity with an exchange value of half a unit (50 cents), half as large as that of a commodity worth two units, and so on. The standard unit of exchange value or purchasing power, then, expresses the exchange value of any commodity relative to the exchange values of any and all other commodities. It expresses exchange value in general or command over commodities in general.[8]

These observations make it clear that standard units are always magnitudes of the characteristic which they are employed to measure; they are never things possessing these characteristics. The standard unit of length (foot length, meter, etc.), is a certain length, not an object possessing that length. The standard unit of exchange value (e.g., dollar, pound, franc), is a certain exchange value or a certain degree of command over goods in general, not a commodity possessing that exchange value or command over goods in general. The standard of value could under no circumstances be a commodity.[9]

15. Nevertheless, the thought that the standard unit of length is something possessing length and that the standard unit of value is something possessing exchange value is deeply imbedded in our minds. Some of the familiar standard units of measurement even bear the names of things or objects—as foot, grain, ton. This identification of the standard unit with a thing is primarily due to the fact that a common unit of measurement originally had to be derived from something which was universally known and which possessed the relevant characteristic in a fairly uniform degree. For instance, the length of the foot of a grown man is known to everybody and since the variations in the size of feet are not very great, people in a more primitive age could express the length of any object by comparing it with their feet. Thus, the foot became the standard unit of length. To have insisted that the standard unit was not the foot, but the foot length, would have seemed to them, as it would to most people today, pointless quibbling. In practice, the distinction may actually be unimportant. While in the quest for greater exactness later generations have transformed the originally vague concept of a normal or average foot into a more precise concept of length and no longer use a real foot to measure length, the foot is still approximately the length of a man's foot.

[6] Cf. Professor F. M. Taylor's criticism on the same point in his Some Chapters on Money, 1906, p. 29. However, he denies the separate existence of a standard of deferred payments on the ground that any contract must be stated in terms of the things to be delivered. Under a money contract, money must be delivered. He thereby identifies the standard of deferred payments not only with the standard of value, but also with the medium of exchange.

[7] Sections 14–17, inclusive, are based on arguments presented in Murad, A., The Paradox of a Metal Standard, 1939, ch. 8.

[8] Ibid., pp. 176–177.

[9] Ibid., p. 183.

To establish a standard unit of exchange value the same procedure would have to be followed. The exchange value of a fairly uniform commodity known to all members of the community is chosen as the standard unit of exchange value. Thus, in a pastoral society, where practically everybody is raising sheep, the exchange value of a sheep may be used as a common denominator for all exchange values. An ox, then, is worth 10 sheep, a pound of gold is worth 100 sheep, and so on. The sheep has become the standard of value—and again, it might sound like hairsplitting to insist that it was the exchange value of a sheep, not the sheep itself, which had become the standard.

The importance of the distinction will, however, reveal itself upon further development of the examples cited above. The foot which has become the standard unit of length is a length familiar to everyone. Now, if it were supposed that a certain vitamin diet doubles the size of feet, it would be quite natural and correct to say that the average foot measures two foot—or two standard units of length. To insist that the actual (average) foot is the foot, would, in fact, be to change the standard unit of length pari passu with the changing length of human feet. Fortunately, no one insists that the standard unit of length is a real foot or the length of a real foot. The average length of feet undoubtedly fluctuates, but these fluctuations do not in any way affect the foot.

Similarly, the sheep which has become the standard unit of exchange value, is a value, a degree of command over goods, familiar to everyone. It expresses command over one sheep or one-tenth of an ox, or one-hundredth of a pound of gold, and so on. Now, suppose that a disease reduces the number of sheep, so that the exchange value of sheep is doubled. A sheep would now be worth two sheep—or two standard units of purchasing power.[10] To insist that the actual (average) sheep is the sheep, would, in fact, be to change the standard unit of value pari passu with the exchange value of the sheep. Since the exchange value of sheep, or of any other commodity, is subject to continuous variation, this would mean that the standard unit of exchange value would have to be changed continuously.[11]

Moreover, if the community has outgrown the pastoral stage, most people will no longer be familiar with the value of a sheep. The change in the purchasing power of the sheep would have to be announced by some public authority—and the only way this change could be announced would be by reference to the already established standard unit of value. The new sheep would have to be expressed as two old sheep. Similarly, if the prevailing average length of feet were accepted as the standard unit of length, this average length would have to be conveyed to the people as a ratio of the already established standard unit. The new foot would be declared to equal two old foot. Since the only purpose of a standard unit is to provide a commonly accepted measure of a particular characteristic, there would be no point in making such a change which could be accomplished only by reference to an already established standard unit; and it is quite clear that the established standard unit is not the average length of feet or the exchange value of a sheep (or of any other commodity).

16. There are some important aspects in which the parallelism between the standard units of length and of value does not hold.

A. The standard unit of length is a constant, static magnitude of length. A foot means the same to us as it did to our forefathers. The standard unit of value, on the other hand, is a changing, dynamic concept. A dollar does not mean the same to us today as it did 10 years ago or as it did to our forefathers. Today, let us say, it represents command over 10 cigars, or 2 pounds of butter, or 1 theater admission, etc. All these commodities, however, are subject to value fluctuations—and since their exchange values are expressed in terms of dollars (or prices), any change in that exchange value must be expressed by a changing price. Any alteration in the price of even a single commodity, in turn, will change the amount of purchasing power expressed by $1. Such a change in the value of the dollar would be infinitesimal. People would say that the dollar has remained unchanged, but that this or that particular price has changed. But if material shortages or intensified demand cause the exchange values of many commodities to rise successively, the amount of purchasing power expressed by $1 will diminish noticeably and after a while the value of the dollar will be said to have fallen. Conversely, if decreased demand and abundant supplies set off a chain of price decreases, the value of the dollar will appear to have risen. While from one day to the next a dollar expresses its meaning may change drastically over approximately the same purchasing power, longer periods of time. Rip Van Winkle, awakening from his 20 years' sleep, would find his concept of foot unchanged, but he would have to learn from scratch the meaning of "dollar." [12]

B. The foot conveys a precise idea of length. A distance of 1 foot can have precise meaning because it is always the same. On the other hand, the fact that the amount of purchasing power expressed by the standard unit of value is continuously modified as a result of the interplay of all changes in the relative values of goods, implies that this standard unit cannot establish a precise concept of a definite magnitude of purchasing power in the minds of the people. The most that can be expected of a standard of value is to signify to the individual an approximate degree of command over goods.[13]

C. Because it is precise and unchanging, the foot can be embodied in a concrete measuring instrument—a footrule. On the other hand, the standard unit of value could not possibly be embodied in a concrete measuring instrument, e. g., a sheep or a piece of gold. The exchange value of a piece of gold fluctuates continuously; and while the standard unit itself expresses a continuously fluctuating amount of exchange value, there is no reason to assume that the two would fluctuate identically. Even if it were conceivable to find a commodity with an exchange value varying directly with the exchange value expressed by the standard unit, it would still make no sense to employ it as a measuring instrument since its exchange value would have to be determined by recourse to the market. It could not operate as a gage of continuous and permanent applicability. It would be comparable to a footrule of ever-changing length which has to be continuously adjusted to an ever-changing foot. Recourse to the market alone can give us from one instant to the other the necessary corrections and adjustments for our concept of value. There is neither any reason nor any opportunity for applying a gage or measuring instrument of value.[14]

17. Summing up these general and specific characteristics of the standard unit of value, the following definition may be formulated:

The standard unit of value is a vague concept of an ever-changing magnitude of purchasing power which is not capable of embodiment in any concrete measuring instrument.[15]

On no account, therefore, could the standard of value be regarded as a commodity, such as sheep or gold. Gold could certainly not be the standard of value any more than it could be the standard of length or weight. These standards must be a unit of value, a unit of length, a unit of weight, respectively. Nor could gold (or any other commodity) be the material measuring instrument of value (as it could be the measuring instrument of length or weight) since the exchange value of gold is not stable vis-a-vis the standard unit of value and since that standard unit itself is a constantly changing magnitude.

The identity between the value of gold and the standard unit of value under the so-called gold standard is, of course, simply the product of a price-fixing arrangement. As long as the monetary authorities stand ready to buy or sell unlimited quantities of the metal, they can actually bring the fluctuations in the value of gold into conformity with the fluctuations in the magnitude of value expressed by the standard unit. This results in making the standard of value a stable and exact expression of command over gold, not over commodities in general. Certainly it does not make gold the instrument for measuring value.[16]

18. The thought that money is an abstract concept of value, not representing any particular commodity or represented by any particular commodity, is not new. Perhaps the first reference to it was made by Plato who, explaining the economic organization of the city-state, stressed the need of money as a symbol for the sake of exchange.[17] The "moneta imaginaria" in terms of which media of exchange were customarily tariffed between the thirteenth and eighteenth centuries again indicates a recognition of the abstractness of the measure of value. Debts and claims could be stated in terms of moneta imaginaria, and coins—the media of exchange—were decreed to be valid tokens for the transfer of purchasing power expressed in terms of moneta imaginaria.[18]

[17] Cf. Monroe, Arthur E., Monetary Theory Before Adam Smith, 1923, p. 5; Nussbaum, Arthur, op. cit., pp. 8–9, n. 31. Professor Nussbaum suggests that Plato did not use the term symbol in the abstract sense at present associated with the term, but that he simply indicated "that money, technically appearing as a token, is the customary medium of exchange." Even if this interpretation were accepted as correct, the question still remains; a token of what? If money is regarded as a commodity it must be held to be the equivalent in exchange, rather than a token assuring the future delivery of equivalent value.

[18] Cf. Nussbaum, op. cit., pp. 10 ff.

Professor Nussbaum maintains that in spite of the apparent tariffing of coins in terms of an abstract unit, "the value of the coins did not depend on the value of the unit, but the value of the unit was determined by the value of the coins" (p. 11). It is true only that the metal contained in the coins had a value independent of the relation arbitrarily established between the coin itself and the abstract unit. If that value happened to be greater than the tariffed value of the coin, then, of course, the coin would be clipped or converted into bullion. To avoid such tampering with the currency, the coin had to be "raised" to bring the market value (in terms of imaginary units) of the metal contained in the coin into line with the nominal value (also in terms of imaginary unit) of the coin. Thus it seems that the imaginary unit was adjusted to the metal value of the coins. But when the nominal value of the coin exceeded its metal value, then the value of the coin was clearly determined by the value of the imaginary unit. As long as tariffed coins circulated as currency, i. e., by face value, their value was derived from the imaginary unit.

In modern literature the concept of the abstract unit of value appears with increasing frequency under various names, such as "unit of value," [19] "unit of account," [20] or "money of account." [21] This abstract unit, whether it be named "the dollar," "the pound sterling" or anything else, is, of course, the standard unit of value, or standard of value,[22] in terms of which prices, debts, and credit instruments (including currency) are expressed. Nevertheless, these same authors who recognize the abstractness of the standard unit of value which is money still insist on reserving the term, "money," to designate the means of payment. The use of terms is unfortunate since, as pointed out above (section 13), it leads to a confusion of concepts, if not in the minds of the writers themselves, certainly in the minds of the readers.

19. Mr. Keynes, for instance, opens his Treatise on Money by stating that "money of account, namely, that in which debts and prices and general purchasing power are expressed, is the primary concept of a theory of money," [23] and later says that "the age of money had succeeded to the age of barter as soon as men had adopted a money of account." [24] He then proceeds to call currency (or the money things) money itself.[25] But, by his own statement, money of account (the standard unit) is fundamental to the existence of a money system. It is possible for a money system to exist without money-proper (tangible media of exchange), but money proper could not exist without money of account, since it "derives its character from its relationship to the money of account." [26] Accordingly, it would be possible for a money system to exist without money itself. Mr. Keynes' meaning is, of course, quite in line with the thesis of this paper, but his terminology seems unfortunately confusing.

If the abstract unit of purchasing power which is the standard of value is the decisive criterion on which the existence of a money system depends, then logic demands that it be given the name "money." To insist upon a terminology which reserves that name for the tangible media of exchange which are not essential to the existence of a money system and which themselves must be stated in terms of money, is to be subservient to a custom rooted in multiple confusion and is, to that extent, to perpetuate that confusion.

Not only is the designation "money" for the abstract standard unit of value a logical one; it is also one that agrees with common usage. People use the term "money" when they mean currency as well as when they mean the standard of value. The popular confusion of these two distinct concepts, implied by attaching the same name to both, is not only natural in view of the confusion which pervades monetary literature, but is probably also innocuous. It is not important that the proverbial man in the street should have a correct understanding of the complexities of money. But there is no justification for the argument that even economists should continue to use the term "money" for coins and paper currency on the ground that it is generally used in that sense. People generally use the term "money" also when they mean the standard unit of value. They express prices in money, they state debts in money, they are concerned about the value of money, they bargain for money wages. The man who bargains for money wages is hardly concerned with the specific method of payment. He will take his wage in coin, in notes, in checks, sometimes in credits with the bank or the company store, or even in merchandise. On the other hand, the worker is very much concerned with the value of money as indicated by recent widespread demands for wage increases to meet the higher cost of living. The "man in the street" would probably be much more baffled if he were told that is bargaining not for so much money a week, but for so many ideal units or units of money-of-account, than if he were told that his weekly pay check is not money, but a credit instrument stated in terms of money, or if he were told that his check is not money, but currency.

Money is certainly that in which prices are expressed and debts and claims stated. The value of a thing is stated in terms of money—dollars, pounds, francs, etc., not in terms of coins, notes, checks, or book entries. The dollar, then, is money, not the coin, note or check stated in terms of dollars and it seems unnecessary and unreasonable to deny the designation money to the former and to reserve it for the latter.

20. The distinction between the standard unit of value and the medium of exchange, and the application of the term "money" to the former, also helps to clear up some common and glaring historical misinterpretations. We are told, for instance, of the cattle money of antiquity and are expected to believe that the ancients used cattle, sheep, and other domesticated animals as media of exchange.[27] Certainly it does not show great reverence for the high civilization of the Greeks to imply that they were too unintelligent to find a commodity more highly endowed with the qualities of portability, indestructibility, divisibility, uniformity, etc.—in short, the qualities required of an exchange commodity—than an ox. Oxen are certainly not uniform. Hercules himself could not have carried an ox very far; dividing the ox means to destroy him. In fact, the only requirement which the ox possesses in a high degree is that everyone can recognize it as an ox.

It should be obvious that oxen were never used as common media of exchange,[28] but as a common measure or standard of value. Every community entering the era of indirect exchange had to derive its standard of value from the value of a commonly known commodity. In a cattle-raising community the value of cattle naturally became the standard—hence, the cattle money of the Greeks. Only the confusion of the standard unit of value with the medium of exchange can account for the suggestion that the Greeks carried oxen in their purses. We know that cattle were used as the standard unit of value even at a time when coinage was already firmly established.[29]

VI. SUMMARY AND CONCLUSION

21. It has now been shown that it is erroneous to regard the media of exchange (which are also used as a store of value) as money; that these media of exchange are all tokens of claims or debts in amounts determined by reference to money; that money is the standard unit of value; that the standard unit of value is an abstract concept of an ever-changing magnitude of purchasing power and that it could never be a commodity nor even the purchasing power of a commodity.

Therefore, the definition of money as the commodity functioning as a medium of exchange, a standard of value, a store of value, a standard of deferred payments, and a reserve for bank credit is wrong. It harbors two fundamental misconceptions.

The first of these is that money is both the medium of exchange and the standard of value (all other functions are derived from these two). The means of payments are qualitatively different from the standard unit of value. They are the tangible or intangible manifestations of debts and claims, arising from indirect exchange and expressed in terms of the standard of value, or money.

The second misconception is that money is a commodity. Neither the means of payment nor the standard of value could be regarded as a commodity. The standard of value is bound to be abstract. The means of payment may assume concrete form; they can be made of paper, nickel, silver, gold or some other commodity, but they can never be media of exchange by dint of this materialization.

A correct defintion of money must not imply that there is any connection between the standard of value and a commodity, nor that the standard of value and the medium of exchange are two aspects of the same thing.

22. The importance of a correct defintion of money becomes apparent when applied to the central problem of monetary theory—the value of money. The traditional view of money as a commodity serving as the medium of exchange and the standard of value inevitably had to lead up to the quantity theory of money. Changes in the value of money had to be explained in the same manner as changes in the value of wheat or apples, namely in terms of demand and supply. Just as a shortage of apples would force up the price of apples, so, it was thought, an inadequate supply of money would surely raise the value of money. Conversely, an expansion of the money supply would inevitably result in a lower value of money, or a higher price level. No matter how modified and qualified, all versions of the quantity theory must necessarily be rooted in this fundamental proposition. In fact, monetary theory as a separate branch of economics could not exist save on the preconception that fluctuations of price levels (and, therefore, indirectly of output and employment) are due to special monetary causes not encompassed by the theory of (relative) value.

The error of such reasoning is at once revealed when the distinction between standard of value and media of exchange is observed.

The value of money is clearly a phenomenon of the standard. No other meaning could be attached to the statement that the value of the dollar has decreased than that the magnitude of purchasing power expressed by $1 is smaller than it was before. Now, the standard of value, being an abstract concept, could not possibly have a value per se in the same sense that apples or wheat have a value which is influenced by changes in supply. Nor could there be any such thing as a supply of the abstract concept of value which is the standard.

The "supply of money" or "quantity of money," on the other hand, obviously must be interpreted as a phenomenon of the medium of exchange. There can be more or less "money" in circulation, more or less deposits, notes and coins. But how could it be maintained that a change in the quantity of credit instruments (or a change in the volume of transactions giving rise to credit instruments, including currency) could eo ipso bring about a change in the value expressed by $1? A credit instrument of a face value of $1 represents purchasing power to the extent of $1—whatever that may be. The "value" of the credit instrument is determined by the amount of purchasing power expressed by $1, not the other way around. To state the opposite would be like saying that the quart becomes a smaller measure of capacity if there are more quart bottles.

Changes in the "value of the dollar," i. e., in the magnitude of purchasing power expressed by $1 are, in fact, never determined by quantitative changes in the supply of media of exchange, but are the result of the continuous interplay of all the forces of supply and demand affecting each and every commodity. There are no separate monetary forces responsible for changes in price levels. Any attempt to seek the explanation for fluctuations in price levels, output and employment in changes of the quantity of exchange media is to pursue a mirage. Similarly, any attempt to control or prevent such fluctuations through quantitative control of the media of exchange is necessarily doomed to failure. The both grow out of a fundamental misunderstanding of the nature of money.

Mr. Speaker, it might be well to point out to our economist that when the mints of the world were open to the free coinage of gold and silver these metals were money wherever they existed, the finder or owner had only to transport his gold or silver to the mint to have the metal coined and handed back to him to be stored or spent into circulation, as he might elect. The old prospector of placer mining days had only to weigh out the dust from his poke to purchase any merchandise that was for sale. His gold had a fixed value at the mint.

Arnold Faces Congress Uproar Over His Continued Use of the WASPS—Miss Cochran's Lady Flyers Now Replace Instead of Releasing Men

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ED. V. IZAC

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 10, 1944

Mr. IZAC. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following excerpt from the Washington Merry-Go-Round, by Drew Pearson, which appeared in the Washington Post on August 6:

WASHINGTON.—Air Forces commander General "Hap" Arnold may not know it, but he is facing a regular cloudburst from Capitol Hill as soon as Congress gets back to a full-time job.

The Congressmen are up in arms over Arnold's efforts to sidetrack the law by continuing to use the WASPS while more than 5,000 trained men pilots, each with an average of 1,250 flying hours, remain idle. All this has happened after Congress refused to let the WASPS be incorporated into the Regular Army.

Fact is that the Government has spent more than $21,000,000 training lady flyers, primarily at the behest of vivacious aviatrix Jacquelin Cochran, wife of financial magnate Floyd Odlum. Magnetic Miss Cochran seems to have quite a drag with the "brass hats" and has even persuaded the Air Forces' smiling commander to make several secret trips to Capitol Hill to lobby for continuation of her pets, the WASPS.

Though not generally known, 25 WASPS have already been killed while ferrying planes in the United States. Further, after almost 2 years of training and the expenditure of millions of dollars, only 11 WASPS are able to fly twin-engine pursuit planes and only 3 are qualified to pilot 4-engine bombers. Bulk of the WASP work has been on training planes, production of which has been practically eliminated.

BACK-DOOR STRATEGY

After Congress refused to let the WASPS into the Army, Arnold and Miss Cochran adopted back-door strategy. It was arranged to sign the WASPS up as WAC's, then have them reassigned to the Air Forces, this despite Congress' clear ruling that the WASPS should not be taken into the Regular Army.

When Col. Oveta Culp Hobby, head of the WAC's, got wind of this deal, she sent emissaries on forced marches to Capitol Hill to have her rank raised from colonel to brigadier general. Oveta was afraid that Jacquelin Cochran would be made a colonel in the WAC's and wanted to outrank her.

All of which has made Air Corps pilots and transport flyers see red. Hundreds retiring from active combat are anxious to stay in the Army as transport ferry pilots. More than a thousand discharged pilots are unable to get jobs with the air transport command, but still Jacky Cochran trains more WASPS. These flyers point out that the WASPS, like the WAC's, claim they were recruited to release men for active service. Now they say the WASPS are "just replacing men, period."

Last May, the Ramspeck Civil Service Committee began a determined inquiry into the WASPS, was ready to recommend that they be dropped immediately. However, fast-working, charming "Hap" Arnold made a quick trip to Capitol Hill. After that, one sentence was eliminated from the report. It read: "We urge that the WASPS be wiped out completely."

Thus, the battle of the WASPS continues.

We Honor the Boys and Girls in Our Country's Service

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. FLANNAGAN, JR.

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 10, 1944

Mr. FLANNAGAN. Mr. Speaker, in February of this year the citizens of Bristol, Va.-Tenn., erected an honor-roll plaque in honor of those now in the armed service and those who may hereafter join. The plaque already contains the names of all those in the armed service from the Twin City, and other names will be added from time to time as our other boys join the colors.

Dr. Robert Yost, one of the Godliest, one of the ablest and one of the best beloved men in our section, delivered the dedicatory address. For years he has been one of the outstanding teachers at King College and has exerted a wonderful influence for right living and true Americanism upon all the boys who came under his guidance. His address is so replete with words of truth, so expressive of the true American spirit, that I think it should be given wide circulation.

Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks, I include therein Dr. Yost's address:

This large representative gathering speaks emphatically and prophetically for American patriotism. It is an optimistic declaration. We are here in behalf of our country and her soldiers. Though this plaque is quite common in the materials of which it is made, it is marvelously uncommon in what it represents. It is made of iron, clay, sand, marble, pebbles, and water. That is all so far as materials are concerned. Skillful trained hands took this common wayside dust, molding it into this silent symbol. Back of the hands is a brain whose magic cells dreamed the idea, in its completion. And back of the brain is the passion and heart of Bristol.

It is a worthy attempt to express the highest and noblest of sentiments. Once a people in exile, learned in bitterness the meaning of this sentiment and in the consciousness of their irreparable loss, wailed their woe as a warning to succeeding generations. "If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, may my right hand forget her cunning and may my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth." And once a sinless man, standing on a lonely hill, looked upon the capital of his native land, and foreseeing its utter destruction and waste, cried "O Jerusalem, how often would I have gathered thee" and then that lonely hill was stained with tears, divine. I make no apology but emphatically repeat, the noblest of sentiments is coming from Bristol's aching heart today. By this act we are striving, as best we know how, to express to our men and women in uniform our gratitude for what they have done, our faith in their ultimate victory, our earnest, passionate hope, that victory may be decisive and speedy, and our love for what they are—our first line of defense. There are no fox holes or caves or dugouts in Bristol. We have no need for them. We wear no gas masks to protect us from the deadly poison of a pagan foe. There is no fear this sabbath afternoon that we will be disturbed by death rained from the skies, as some Zero sails through on its deadly mission. Nor from some armored tank on State Street grinding our helpless bodies to dust. We are not afraid that our old men and women and little children will be herded like cattle and shot like wolves. We do not even suffer the trifling inconvenience of a black-out. Our so-called irregularities are so insignificant and inconsequential, that life is almost normal. With three-fourths of the human family living in terror, in agony of body, soul, and mind, why are we exempt, and so at peace?

Because our Bristol soldiers, united with millions of other American soldiers, have pushed that defense line across the ocean, thousands of miles from our peaceful shores. And if any citizen can contemplate that fact without feeling overwhelmed with a flood of gratitude that torments him and thunders for expression; all I can say is that I am profoundly sorry for such a soul. He must be mentally deranged, or have a heart of stone. Linked with that gratitude is an honest faith in the righteousness of our cause and its final triumph. Being right it must be victorious. Will not, the Judge of all the earth do right? God has never failed us yet, and it is too late to begin now.

Neither have our warriors ever failed us, and we may depend upon it, that defense line will not break. Centuries ago the great Chinese people built a wall of stone where every invader's threat would end. After the last war, France built the Maginot line, a challenge to every foreign foe. Belgium likewise threw up a defense line on her frontiers and felt secure. China's wall has been crumbling, but let it be said not her people. France's Maginot line is occupied by the enemy.

Belgium's stone defense crumbled in a night's time. Their lands overrun, despoiled, robbed, their people enslaved, starved, murdered and raped. What reason have we to believe our defense line will stand before the pagan might? Just because our line is movable as to space and place, and eternal, being made not of stone and steel, but of the American spirit. That is a wall our enemies have failed to comprehend. Dr. David Starr Jordan, president of Stanford University, made this statement: "As long as there were Romans, Rome endured. So long as Americans keep the American spirit there will be an America." The men whose names are here enrolled are made of that spirit. They are coming home as conquerors. The flag will still wave o'er the land of the free, and the home of the brave. It will return with added splendor. That is the tribute to, and our faith in our Bristol soldiers.

But this plaque has a message for the home front. There must be Americans of the same unyielding spirit here as there. Now and always. Its message is both a challenge and a trumpet blast. It is most gratifying to record that Bristol citizens have boldly met every financial demand our Government has made for the prosecution of the war. I have no doubt we shall continue that course to the bitter end. Should that spirit be lost through carelessness or indifference we shall stand at the bar of judgment, condemned and doomed. It can be lost. I mean that defense line, the spirit of Amer- —that guarantees our security and free- n. The pages of history are replete with examples. That was the way Venice ended a thousand years of glorious independence, in slavery and shame. That was the way ancient Rome fell an easy prey to the hordes of barbarians sweeping down from the north.

There were no Romans left. America will endure so long as Americans live. We are not a warlike people. We are not taught from childhood to hate, murder, and destroy our national neighbors. But a real American is one who though loving the ways of peace, has the iron resolution to do what he ought to do when he ought to do it, whether he wants to do it or not. That is the trumpet call from this monument. May we need it—and thus guarantee to our warriors that America is worth suffering for even unto death. That is the spirit of our country.

Free Enterprise Defined

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RICHARD M. KLEBERG
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 10, 1944

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Houston Post of June 12, 1944:

"FREE ENTERPRISE" DEFINED

What is "free enterprise," anyway? One of the chief dangers to its survival lies in the misunderstanding, confusion, and suspicion as to the meaning of the term that is being heard so often these days.

Many laboring people think "free enterprise" means the return to business conditions of 20 years ago, with benefits solely to the owners and management, and the loss of gains made by organized labor. To many farmers the private enterprise system means oppression of the farmer in the interest of labor and business. Even businessmen differ in their understanding of the term, their conceptions ranging all the way from the old autocratic czarlike capitalistic system to the more progressive liberality which forward-looking modern executives have found desirable.

As clarifying an explanation of the phrase as we have heard or seen was given Monday by James A. Farley, of New York, former Postmaster General and chairman of the National Democratic Executive Committee, in an address at French Lick, Ind.

He told how the founding fathers of our Government had guaranteed to the free people of the United States, through the Bill of Rights, freedom of religion, of speech, and of the press; the right of petition, the right of the people to be secure against unreasonable search and seizure, the right of trial by jury, and protection of private property against seizure without just compensation. All these rights and safeguards have made possible and brought into being the "American way of life"—trite words themselves, variously construed, which yet "have a real significance in their every interpretation that is predicated on the pride of those enjoying the privileges they indicate." And, continued Mr. Farley:

"These privileges in their essential elements are what makes us a free people. They compose the very basis of our liberties. They are the distinguishing factors that set us apart as Americans. Their meaning can best be demonstrated in the simple declaration that under our system of a free government for a free people, every American has a right to live his or her life in any way he or she pleases, so long as any citizen's action does not infringe on the rights of his or her fellow citizens. Consequently, since the American way of life is predicated on these basic individual liberties, it can only continue to prevail if these liberties are secure."

A noteworthy part of his definition of free enterprise was an exposition of a point which, to many, somehow does not seem consistent. That is that under our system some may voluntarily surrender these rights to an association of mutual benefit, while others may, if they wish, work out as individuals their own economic salvation.

"Some there are who prefer to have the protection of groups. Others prefer to select their own mode of working and individually make their own terms of employment. Both must be protected in their choice of method. There are surely in our complex economy opportunities sufficient to make successful the operation of legitimate trade unions without infringing on the heritage of liberty possessed by those individuals who go it alone. In business also there is ample opportunity for associated capital to gain the benefits that may accrue from cooperative management without shutting out the opportunities of others who, as individuals, can profit from the fruits of their energy and intelligence. To insist on complete control of any segment of our economy along any single path would be regimentation. To keep open all roads of advancement multiplies opportunity, promotes industry, and encourages incentive in the true American way."

Such is the system of free enterprise; the system that has made possible the development of the world's greatest civilization within a century and a half; the system which has enabled this Nation to meet the demands of the present holocaust; and the only system whereby we can solve the economic problems that will confront the country at the close of the war.

Germany Will Be Strong After the Shooting Stops

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. BUELL SNYDER
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 10, 1944

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an editorial from the Evening Standard of Uniontown, Pa., by S. W. Calkins, president of Uniontown Newspapers, Inc., on suggestions relative to post-war problems:

A military decision for ourselves and our Allies on the continent of Europe is now in sight.

Whether or not that decision means complete victory or merely thwarted ambition of world conquest depends upon conditions in post-war Germany for generations to come. Its defeat will be bitter, and at a time when everything will seem lost to Germany, let us be sure that no spark of hate and revengeful ambition be allowed to kindle a flame that will sear the instruments of peace and decent living and leave the ugly ashes of war on our doorstep for future generations to put out.

The loss of life to all the countries of Europe has been terrifying but it has been much less in Germany than in the countries where the European battles have been fought. Germany will emerge after the war with a tremendous advance in science of war and with the manpower of her European enemies decimated out of all proportion to her own.

Where are the men who made up the armies of France, Belgium, Poland and the other countries that felt the crushing blow of the Nazi heel? What has happened to the women and children who struggled in the path of battle? These dead represent their countries' greatest sacrifice. We must be true to the memories of these dead and to the broken bodies of the living. We must forever carry their trust into living, breathing action that will bring lasting peace and liberty.

This cannot be done by making another Treaty of Versailles. It cannot be done by the smug business of earning dollars and seeking additional comfort for ourselves. It could be done by allowing the German homeland to be overrun as the German armies overran other lands and let annihilation run unabated until the proportion of dead be equalized. But this must be ruled out as inhuman.

It has been suggested that the rabid Nazis be forcibly exported to some of the undeveloped areas in Africa. This has two advantages. It would help to restore normal living and thinking in their homeland and the Lebensraum problem would be solved. In practice it would serve a political purpose for Germany as French Guiana furnishes a criminal problem purpose for France.

After the incurables have been eliminated a 100-year protectorate should be placed over Germany and the following program put into effect:

1. Forced education equivalent to our own high school for all.

2. Elimination of war colleges. Textbooks on war eliminated.

3. Establish production on a basis of 80-percent agriculture; 20 percent industry.

4. Rotate the outside executives governing official Germany every 10 years.

5. Establish a universal language and encourage the free exchange of ideas with other nations for the creation of better living.

6. Let there be a single power in Europe and in Far East sufficiently strong to keep the peace in their respective spheres of influence and with all people free to use the natural resources of the world for peaceful purposes and in equity.

The Tax Problem of Small Business

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR.

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 10, 1944

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech delivered by me before the City Business Club of Philadelphia on August 4, 1944:

On the beaches of the Normandy peninsula I saw long lines of German prisoners being marched to the ships to be taken to prisoner-of-war camps. These German prisoners were astounded at the immense amount of materials for making war to be seen on every street and on every Norman farm. Many Nazi soldiers commented: "You have so much of everything. If we had half as much, we could have knocked you back into the sea."

"You have so much of everything."

I want you to know and I want you to realize with pride that you put those words upon the lips of the captured enemy. You put that bewilderment, that surprise, that astonishment before the Nazi soldiers' eyes. You fixed the helplessness of the German war effort in the Nazi soldier's brain.

How did you do this? You did it on the production front, which forges the tools of victory. The war front is utterly, wholly dependent upon you.

If the emphasis has been on what great generals have achieved, if the story has been presented to us from a standpoint of famous leaders and sweeping movements, similarly the emphasis on the production front would appear to have been upon the output of huge industrial plants.

Today I want to discuss what the smaller industrial plants are doing in this great national war effort. I want to discuss it in somewhat the same spirit that motivated Ernie Pyle in telling us of the achievements, the viscissitudes, and the problems of the man in the ranks. I am not comparing the small producer with G. I. Joe. Rather I am pointing out that our smaller war-production plants have also made impressive contributions to the cause and merit both recognition and official consideration.

Do you remember, back in 1942, those urgent, dramatic demands of both Army and Navy? "Give us the stuff we need. Our boys are dying. They must have it now."

And do you remember how industry, both large and small, responded with a wholehearted, all-out drive? That response was almost miraculous. American production exceeded Washington's most sanguine hopes, astonished the world, confounded our enemies, and—it may now be said—made victory certain.

What made it possible for this Republic—the unprepared, the peace-loving—to create in a few months a volume of fighting equipment that quickly surpassed the output dictator nations had spent years in constructing, and tipped the scales in history's most crucial moment? Why could this Nation, alone of all the world's nations, perform a miracle of adaptation and production?

Here is the answer. It was our ability to make the small plant of today into the big business of tomorrow. Our industrial greatness springs from a pattern as clear as a blueprint, and as American as the Stars and Stripes. Here are the familiar steps.

First, a man with vision and courage starts a small manufacturing plant of his own. There follows a period of dogged and desperate effort. If he is weak or incapable he fails—as many do. If strong and able, he survives. Then comes a season of growth, of the plowing back of profits into better production facilities, of judicious expansion, larger pay rolls, more factory space, until finally—often within the mature lifetime of a single individual—another giant industry takes its place in our great American system.

More than any other element, the wholesome, natural growth of small business into large, epitomizes the idea of opportunity which the name "America" has come to mean throughout the world. It fills a tremendous proportion of our Nation's pay envelopes, and holds open to every man the door to opportunity. Through the establishment of his own small business he may progress to goals limited only by his own enterprise and abilities.

Picture, if you can, the United States without small business. A drab future for our returning sons, or for any young fellows with the will to succeed. All would be employees of either great corporations or of Government. There could be no new ventures started by individuals. There could be no room for the constructive developments of an Edison or a Budd.

Americans are by tradition a venturesome people. The history of America is the story of enterprise, plus opportunity. We must keep opportunity alive. It is our great national asset; our great distinction among nations—this chance for any citizen to rise to the utmost peak of his own abilities, to contribute to his country's industrial leadership, and to share in its benefits.

But to achieve these things he must be free; free not only to create a new enterprise, but free to develop and enlarge it. He must be permitted the right and the means to install new and more efficient machinery, to expand payrolls, to improve distribution. He and his plant must, in short, be free to grow. Take an example:

An obscure machinist starts a small business of his own—the manufacture of horseless carriages. He might still be making them—one at a time, and by hand at that—if he hadn't been free to use his initiative and pour a swelling stream of earnings back into new equipment, new methods, better facilities.

A farmer was once asked if he would not like to share Henry Ford's wealth. His reply showed one of the clearest concepts of the real nature and achievements of American industry that I have ever heard. "Well, sir," he answered, "it seems to me that wealth is doing a good job right where it is. It's not in cash or bank balances. It's in machinery that makes good jobs for hundreds of thousands of men and women and produces real wealth for nearly everybody in the country."

What if Henry Ford and others like him had not been permitted to plow back earnings? Let's consider such a situation:

Sam and Joe form a partnership. They contribute equally in time and money to establish their venture. At the end of the year partner Sam says: "All right, we made $10,000. That's $5,000 apiece. I want mine in cash."

Joe protests that while the profit was made it isn't in cash. It's in new equipment, raw materials, reserves for losses, and bad times that are sure to come.

But, Sam insists, profits are profits. He wants his in dollars on the barrel head. So either the money must be borrowed to pay him, or the business must be liquidated. It's one of the two—no choice. Obviously such a practice can't continue without crippling and finally killing the whole enterprise.

"Far-fetched," you say? Well, not so long ago you would have been right. But today things are different.

For today a "partner"—an unreasoning and unreasonable partner—intrudes into many small businesses, contributing neither time nor skill nor knowledge nor money. He demands, not just half the profits, but 80 percent of the profits—cash-on-the-line. He is the Federal tax collector, who, due to impractical tax legislation, is in many instances blocking the earnest war efforts of small business by leaving it stripped of the funds needed to operate, to meet pay rolls, and to produce.

This is a serious situation. It is doubly serious at this critical period. For American industry—small as well as large—has not only had to draw upon its reserves to meet pyramiding demands of preparedness, lend-lease, and, finally, all-out war production, it also, at the same time, had to solve the problems of financing for conversion, expansion, and ballooning pay rolls.

In the case of big industry, this was done partly through great cash reserves, but mostly through loans and credit. But the small fellow, serving for the most part through subcontract, often found private borrowing or Government financing unavailable or unsuited to his pressing needs, and the accompanying red tape prohibitive.

Did he then settle back on his well-polished trouser seat and say, "Aw, the heck with it?" He did not. Production was his way of contributing to victory and, come high or low water, he was going to produce. So he plowed back everything he made or hoped to make, and put it into the things his plant must have to meet the Government's call for more guns, more tanks, more airplanes, more ships, more—more—more!

The record shows that the small factories of America, by furnishing parts and services to big industry, actually have carried the major part of our total war production load. One of the biggest companies (Chrysler) is said to have farmed out 80 percent of its production to small plants throughout the nation.

During 1943, for example, half of the construction materials contracts from the Maritime Commission exceeding $10,000 were awarded to plants hiring fewer than 500 persons. Of 7,000 subcontracts let by the shipyards on maritime construction work, 68 percent were handled by small firms.

It is further estimated that small business produces more than 60 percent of all materials supplied to our armed forces and those of our allies. Its pay roll reaches amazing weekly totals, and it employs more than half of all workers in American business.

Much of our rapid expansion for production occurred in 1941 and 1942. Then, on October 21, 1942, Congress passed a tax law, rightly designed to "take the profit out of war." How did this affect the small industrialist who had put back every available dollar into greater production facilities? He found himself in an appalling situation. The tax collector demanded 80 percent of what he earned that year. But these earnings were already invested in equipment, machinery, office desks, building additions—all the stuff he laid in to build his capacity to meet urgent war appeals. So, as a result, today he simply hasn't got the money. The tax collector has him in a hopeless impasse. For the tax collector's job is to collect. His not to reason why. His duty is to liquidate the business if necessary, but get the money.

It requires no student of higher mathematics to figure out that this doesn't make sense; that it threatens the very heart of the American system, and heads directly toward a socialistic, Government-owned economy. Legislators freely admit that this impossible condition escaped their notice when the tax laws were written. It was neither their desire nor their objective. Nevertheless, the law now stands. Prompt relief from its onerous effects is imperative.

Take, by way of illustration, one essential industry, made up entirely of small companies which can be considered typical of small business in war work. Records show that, in response to urgent demands for more output to meet desperately imperative war needs, these firms have plowed back as much as 55 percent of their net income to enlarge production. Obviously they aren't able to pay out 80 percent of these same earnings, and thus they lack the money to pay the 1942 tax levy. These firms face serious deficits, running from $4,000 to $47,000 for that year's operations alone—deficits they had to carry over into 1943 operations, when taxes again demanded 80 percent of profits, so that in 1943 they could not depend upon even 20 percent of their own earnings.

As though this were not bad enough, the renegotiators now enter the picture and say "even 20 percent of your profits are excessive. We'll just cut that some more," leaving in many cases as little as 3 percent on sales. When asked how the company is to pay for equipment installed and have a reserve to meet possible losses, these gentlemen blandly reply: "That is not our problem."

The figures just quoted are from a highly specialized industry of vital importance to our huge war production schedules—the heat treating of metals, having to do with the vital parts of tanks, planes, artillery, and the like, and with many parts of merchant vessels and warships, which must be scientifically heat treated to give them the required high strength, toughness, and endurance to stand up under gruelling punishment of modern war.

To prepare for mass production—to meet this urgent call—no one of these small companies used more than $100,000 in any year from earnings. Yet they saved Government the tremendous cost of building and equipping new, additional plants, which might later be useless.

Here is one instance of what such companies have done. A manufacturing plant, early in the war, got a contract to produce aircraft parts. To take care of the necessary heat treating, the Government ordered furnace equipment costing $75,000 to be delivered to the contractor. But he had no space to house it. That meant another $30,000 for buildings and more delay.

Then a commercial heat treater entered the picture. By investing a few thousand dollars to expand his own furnaces, he was able to take over the entire heat-treating job, at a total billing of less than $10,000 in 12 months, including necessary labor, fuel, and all other costs. This one case saved the American taxpayer a round $100,000. And not only money was saved, but precious time, and perhaps lives, as well.

Another example:

A foundry obtained a subcontract for a large lot of trench mortar shells for lend-lease. A furnace was ordered to handle the heat treating, but this could not be delivered for 6 months. Meanwhile, a commercial heat treater, at his own expense, rebuilt and remodeled certain equipment, was ready for operation in 60 days, and completed the entire order during the next 4 months—before the primary contractor's furnace was even ready for operation.

These two cases are typical of what the small, independent plant can do if free to exercise its own initiative.

Now, let's look at the effect upon the war effort of assessing an 80-percent tax on earnings reinvested in war production facilities by these and other firms.

The 20 percent left to the manufacturers is tragically inadequate to provide necessary cash in bank to meet enlarged pay rolls and material turnover under expanded war schedules, to say nothing of renegotiation. So the small concern has no funds whatever available to obtain the endless items, large and small, needed to produce for the war.

More serious still, suppose the small manufacturer needs another $1,000 truck, machine, tool, or furnace to do a job. He has to figure that this item will actually cost him $1,000 plus 80-percent tax, or $1,800, because he is using current income to buy it, and must pay $800 on that earned $1,000 invested. No matter what the basis of figuring, he cannot enlarge his facilities to meet war schedules on 20 percent of his earnings and still have pay-roll cash.

From a practical business viewpoint, the logical thing for him to do, therefore, in self-preservation, would be to sit tight, hoard up every earned dollar, and use only facilities on hand, turning down any suggestion for increasing output that would require investment. Had this hard-headed policy been followed by the majority, war production would be far behind its present point and the taxpayers' bill a lot higher.

The first function of profits is to pay off losses—not only past losses but the inevitable future losses that will come in the change from war to peace production, to say nothing of operating losses during depression periods when volume drops to small fractions of today's all-time high levels. Unless adequate reserves are set up now from current income, as a backlog of industry, the post-war period may find us without equipment to make, or firms to manufacture, items essential to our national recovery.

Today, many small businesses are swimming hard—but they are gasping. To make matters worse, small business is still so preoccupied in meeting the cry for war materials that it can give little thought to the fight necessary to survive the smothering effect of taxes that threaten its very life. It is traveling on momentum, using up its reserve on a day-to-day basis, and expecting relief as a matter of justice. But financial starvation cannot be withstood indefinitely.

With all its difficulties, small business offers no complaint about the huge size of the tax bill. It is willing to pay, and keep on paying, but it simply must have time to work the thing out. A fair and simple arrangement has been suggested to permit continued operation at efficient levels, that would lose Government nothing. Briefly stated, it proposes that:

1. The Congress should recognize by amendment to the revenue laws, that earnings up to some limit, say $100,000, reinvested in facilities needed for war production in any one year, be considered as overhead cost for that year.

2. Where these facilities become an asset, and, therefore, a profit, that one-fifth of their value be added to current earnings for tax purposes each year for 5 years. For example, if earnings were reinvested in war production facilities in 1942, they would be added to operating expenses for that year, but their taxable value as an asset would be distributed over the years 1943 to 1947, inclusive.

By this plan, Government would get the taxes in full, while small business would escape the danger of being strangled to death by Government's effort to squeeze from it money that it just hasn't got.

By this plan, small companies could meet obligations and not be forced into insolvency. Such a plan would meet the needs of small firms the country over, including contractors and subcontractors who found it impracticable to get a certificate of necessity. The latter, now revoked, provided no real tax relief for the small concern, since the 20 percent annual write-off obviously failed to offset the 80 percent tax payable the first year, and was in other ways not suitable for the needs of most small concerns.

Big corporations with securities listed in the stock market can raise capital at low interest rates for plant expansion by selling an issue through investment brokers. Small business can't raise capital this way, nor has it reserves for expansion, depreciation, replacements. In other words, it lacks access to the funds that large business gets with comparative ease. (The new War Contract Termination Act is of no help in this situation.)

To some, the word "profit" means getting rich out of the war. They think of profit as cash left in the till after a transaction. But it's seldom as simple as that. Under businesslike management—the only kind that permits survival—most profit is put aside to replace worn-out equipment, or to see a firm through the inevitable rainy days and lean years. Such reserves are by no means "windfalls." They are legitimate essentials for any firm that expects to stay in business.

I have found in my talks with smaller industrialists that they do not ask "tax forgiveness." They want to shoulder their full load, both materially and financially, in these serious days of war and the critical days to follow. But they ask fair consideration. Their only chance seems to lie in this suggested relief from Washington—a step which would be in line with the announced congressional policy of giving consideration to the small taxpayer.

For some time the Ways and Means Committee of the House has been studying the need for revision of our present tax laws, especially as they affect industry.

Committees of the Congress welcome constructive ideas from our citizens. The weight of your opinion counts. If you are in accord with the ideas expressed here today, it would be well to bring the matter to the attention of your Representative, asking him to impress upon the members of the Ways and Means Committee the serious and urgent nature of this problem, so that remedial action may be taken without delay and small business be given an even break.

Let us learn to be fair in our dealings, one with another. Government cannot survive without a prospering economy. And 11,000,000 uniforms must some day be laid aside. We had better be ready with working clothes for their occupants.

Jackson Hole

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 10, 1944

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial appearing in the Boston Globe of August 7, 1944:

JACKSON HOLE

A lawsuit trial opening in Wyoming this month is as much the concern of New Englanders who may, after the war, desire to see their own country as it is of the disgruntled cattle owners who have instigated an attempt to deny to the public the newest of their national monuments. A bill in Congress, introduced by a Wyoming Congressman, has the same object: To invalidate the Jackson Hole National Monument established last year.

Jackson Hole is a Federal reservation of some 175,000 acres, established to protect for all Americans for all time a site of scenic grandeur where the Grand Tetons raise their Gothic spires above a plain that reveals one of the most spectacular records of glacial action on this continent. It is an historic spot, and wintering ground of the largest elk herd surviving in the United States.

To preserve this magnificent valley that retains the sagebrush flavor and rugged splendor of the old West, steps have been in progress for 20 years. Four national administrations have participated in its development. John D. Rockefeller purchased some 35,000,000 acres to donate to the public and so round out other land already in the public domain. The recreational importance of the spectacular valley at the headwaters of the Snake River is evidenced by the thousands of tourists who visit it annually and constitute a principal commercial asset of the region.

There are only 241 residents of the area now designated a national monument, who graze about 6,300 head of cattle on a small part of the public domain. Their rights of grazing and cultivation and residence are wholly protected. They and other cattlemen have enjoyed a privilege of drifting their cattle across the public lands and grazing them in the national forests. They would like to consider this privilege a permanent lien and a private right in the public domain and they fear that the need to protect food for the unique wildlife of the reservation may some day limit their grazing privileges, even though these have been specifically guaranteed them and their heirs and assigns. The State of Wyoming owns in State Park about one-half of 1 percent of the monument area, and this it will continue to manage in full control. But the private interests in the valley—so scanty as to make a travesty of their claim against the whole public and future citizenry of America—have raised a bogey of States' rights over the Jackson Hole reservation.

It is late in the day to suggest that the Government is not the appropriate sponsor and preserver of those parts of the public domain which Congress designates as desirable to reserve and protect for the enjoyment of the public. The "rights" which the cattlemen assert in these public lands are actually only a special consideration that has been shown them and which is not now to be taken away. But the attitude of those who have instituted the lawsuit in the name of the State of Wyoming against the United States, and of the backers of the Barrett bill to invalidate the Jackson Hole National Monument, is a hang-over of that view of the public domain and the public interest which has lingered overlong in the West. It is that the public interest is anybody's to exploit, and that what the public owns nobody owns and anyone can take.

Cattle interests, railroad interests, oil interests, have historically taken that attitude to exploit the public lands and ignore the public interest. But this cannot go on forever. The America of tomorrow will have no public lands to enjoy, no monuments to its great continental heritage to possess, unless the public rights in its own domain are protected now. For too long the voice of selfish interests with axes to grind is the only voice that has been effectively heard when such an issue is involved. Too often the defense of the public interest is left wholly to a few public officials. It is time that public opinion was expressed on behalf of that great public whose present rights and future enjoyment are at stake. Jackson Hole belongs to all of us, just as much as Boston Common. We shouldn't let anybody take it away from us.

UNCLE DUDLEY.

After the Bombing Stops

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. BUELL SNYDER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 10, 1944

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, there is pending before the Congress, either in committee or on the calendars, legislation dealing with these propositions:

Reconversion of war plants.

Demobilization of war workers.

Demobilization of men and women in the armed services.

Disposition of surplus property, including materials, and plants erected with public funds.

Unemployment compensation.

Whether the wars in which we are engaged shall come to an end next month, next year, or 2 or 3 years hence, it is generally recognized that legislation dealing with such propositions must precede the peace.

It is unfortunate that this legislation was not enacted earlier, because, coming at this time, it contributes to the seemingly growing popular belief that peace is near at hand, and that in turn does not contribute to the continued maintenance of an all-out effort on the home front.

The wars may come to a close sooner than any of us anticipates. No one, I care not whom he may be, can foretell when peace will again prevail. I feel myself that it will not come completely for many months ahead. The best way I know of to hasten its arrival is for all on the home front to continue to do their utmost to see that our armed forces are kept promptly and abundantly supplied with the sinews of war essential to the speedy accomplishment of the fighting job. There should be no relaxation on the part of anyone until the day the word is heralded that all of our enemies have laid down their arms. Any other course would be certain to prolong the conflict and every added day means more American dead, more American wounded, more American widows, more American grief-stricken homes. I want to drive that alternative home to the people of America. I know when they realize it that all will strive to the utmost to hasten the day of complete and final victory.

As I said before, certain preparatory measures must precede the peace, no matter how soon or how remote it may be. Back in 1942, in the early months of the war, in addressing the House of Representatives, I said:

Outside of contributing in every way at our command to winning the war, I submit our next responsibility is to be ready when that job is done with jobs—jobs on useful work for men moving out of the defense industries, and for the demobilized soldiers and sailors. There should be no delay then in looking for ways and means to effect the enormous readjustment that must occur. It is imperative, in my judgment, that we build up a backlog of worth-while projects to cushion the readjustment from war to peace.

I reiterated that statement in the House in April, 1943, and added that the provision I was advocating became "increasingly important with each passing day of war."

The problems ahead are manifold and ramifying. Involved in demobilization and readjustment are matters which must await the peace treaties. I wish to cite and remark upon some of them.

It is inconceivable that America will not in the future maintain a large Navy, a strong Marine Corps, a much larger peacetime Army than formerly, buttressed by civilian components of considerably larger proportions than of yore and thoroughly equipped and trained, aviation forces of such dimensions as will insure supremacy at any time, including the means for rapid replacement or augmentation, and a merchant marine that will be adequate, at least, to meet defense requirements over such period as may be determined to be sufficient until replacement or augmentation may be provided.

The measure of military and civilian demobilization, it seems to me, must await the determination of these matters, and such determination likewise will influence the measure of industrial readjustment.

These are matters that presently are under consideration by the respective responsible executive agencies. Final conclusions and recommendations obviously await the termination of the wars. Contraction of considerable proportions no doubt will be determined upon and advocated, to be effected upon the conclusion of hostilities, but the permanent peacetime levels must await the ratifications of the peace treaties.

THE NAVY

I visualize a sea arm wholly adequate to support any United States naval policy determined upon by our military and naval leadership and the Secretary of State. Such force, whether it be kept wholly or partly in full commission, no doubt will be maintained as to combatant units relatively as large as presently projected. Certainly that will be true until the international situation becomes stabilized, and the measure of defense that we should maintain becomes more manifest.

THE ARMY

The Regular Army must be sufficiently large to maintain adequate defense garrisons at all outlying establishments, appropriately to man establishments within continental United States, to provide instructors for the civilian components, to conduct military schools, and to look after the development, procurement, production, storage, and issue of matériel and the care of a reserve thereof.

A restudy unquestionably needs to be made of the civilian components. The National Guard must be considerably more numerous than formerly and the training thereof must be longer and more intensive. Final determination, I should say, should wait upon the time when the guardsmen now with the armed forces will be free to voice their sentiments and advocate their views. There need be no alarm on the part of anyone as to the continuance of the National Guard. The subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations handling military appropriations, of which I have been chairman for several years, has seen to it and will continue to see that the National Guard is continued and fostered and made more efficient and valuable than ever.

We have insisted upon the maintenance during the war of the National Guard Bureau in the War Department as a separate entity, and we have continued available since the guard's entrance upon active duty several millions of dollars of appropriated funds for its immediate needs upon release from active duty. Well before the war my subcommittee annually added to the Budget estimates for the National Guard and cooperated with the National Guard Association year after year in making the guard more efficient. I am sure there is not a high ranking officer of the National Guard, on active duty or otherwise, who will not bear me out that my subcommittee championed the National Guard on every occasion, and the best part of it was we were supported in every instance by the House, because the guard was universally popular and I am confident that it will remain so.

I have given some thought to using the National Guard in handling universal military service, should such a policy be determined upon at some future time. State quotas would need to be established and, possibly, a determination made of purely State militia needs in order to arrive at non-Federal costs. Essential officers, particularly for field training, would be available through the Officers' Reserve Corps. This is just an idea, but one that I should like to see thoroughly canvassed if there is to be universal military training.

OFFICERS' RESERVE CORPS

I look to an enlarged and better trained Officers' Reserve Corps, to be built up to and maintained at the approved level through the Reserve Officers' Training Corps. There will need to be a more liberal allowance of funds to permit of a larger number of eligibles in senior units than formerly to qualify for commissions in the Officers' Reserve Corps.

FIELD TRAINING

Any post-war plan, in my judgment, must contemplate holding annually field exercises and maneuvers on a far larger scale than formerly, and of a month's duration, and all members of the civilian components should be required to participate therein.

AIR FORCES

The Air Forces, Army and Navy, I look for to be maintained at levels commensurate with needs determined by the heads of such forces in conjunction with the heads of the military and naval services and the Secretary of State. There will need to be appreciable contraction after the war, but the forces then maintained should insure us supremacy at all times over any potential enemy or enemies. There will be need to engage in research to the fullest extent practicable. I look for civilian aviation to become tremendously popular, and hope that the demand for planes will assume such proportions that, in conjunction with peacetime military and naval aviation production, there will be maintained production facilities adequate to provide replacement and augmentation to meet the demands of the armed forces during the early stages of a future emergency situation or war.

We must, upon the conclusion of peace, do everything consistent and practicable to continue research in all fields looking to the availability of the latest, most efficient, and most potent means of conducting war, offensively and defensively.

MERCHANT MARINE

The Government has spent a tremendous sum upon merchant ships. Peacetime demands probably will not support the tonnage that has been and is being built, and that which is needed no doubt will have to be subsidized. There will be need also to lend encouragement in other directions to make sure the greatest utilization of American bottoms. It may be in the interest of national defense to carry a certain amount of tonnage in reserve. That would depend upon the success of other measures employed to keep vessels in operation. We must not lose sight of the need to continue the existence of our best shipyards. The way to do that is to fix upon a maximum peacetime tonnage commensurate with maximum defense requirements on a future M-day. The supporting cost would be lessened by the amount of operating tonnage and reserve tonnage, which would need to be reconditioned periodically and replaced from time to time.

Industrial Peace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LISTER HILL

OF ALABAMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 10 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 8), 1944

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an interesting and informative address delivered by Paul L. Styles, vice chairman of the fourth regional war labor board, before a meeting of personnel directors and labor officials at Brunswick, Ga., on August 2, 1944, on the subject of industrial peace, together with an editorial from the Atlanta Journal of August 2, 1944, commenting on Mr. Styles' address, under the caption "For industrial peace."

There being no objection, the address and editorial were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS OF PAUL L. STYLES, VICE CHAIRMAN OF THE FOURTH REGIONAL WAR LABOR BOARD

In appearing before this meeting tonight I am running true to form in that I am following the habits and superstitions of my neighbors in my native State of Tennessee. As some of you probably know, a good many mountaineers, when approaching old age, buy themselves a coffin and place it in the attic, and begin to accumulate their laying-away clothes. We, of the War Labor Board, would like to start building our own coffin and start preparing our laying-away clothes now.

However, to the end that we may have a decent burial rather than have our careers wind up in a lynching party, I would like to make certain suggestions as to the manner in which the body should be interred.

The Fourth Regional War Labor Board is convinced that management and labor in the South must learn in the next few months to make collective bargaining work on a voluntary basis. The Board is unanimous in this conviction. Industry, labor, and the public members of the Board agree that too many cases are coming to the Board in which the full processes of collective bargaining have not been exhausted. We are convinced that the parties in these cases are not bargaining in good faith. We are further convinced that too many employers and unions are in effect saying, "let George do it," and are calling in the United States Conciliation Service merely as a vehicle to obtain certification to the War Labor Board.

Government arbitration of labor disputes is certainly a weak substitute for sound, legitimate collective bargaining. No one knows better how to settle a controversy than the people who are involved in the controversy. I would like to make several suggestions here tonight on the conduct of negotiations between employers and unions with special emphasis on the general public's stake in these negotiations.

All too often the parties to a labor dispute are of the opinion that the dispute affects only themselves. This, of course, is not true today—I doubt if it ever was true. Our economic system is so closely geared that we are in the same position as three men riding in a canoe. Our canoe and its riders can best be illustrated by saying that labor and industry have the paddles and the public is engaged in bailing out the water which ships over the sides. Obviously, if the two paddlers insist on paddling in opposite directions it will be impossible for the third member of the trio to keep the boat on an even keel and bailed out.

Unless capital and labor settle down and start paddling in the same direction, the general public is going to insist that it be given the right to decide who is going to paddle and where he is going to paddle.

Just that sort of thing has happened during this war. The public in the person of the National War Labor Board has settled the labor disputes in this country. This condition, unsatisfactory as it is, is necessary during the war. However, the minute the war emergency is over the War Labor Board will cease to be. Management and labor will no longer be able to say, "let's let George do it," but will have to sit down once again and settle their problems.

Leadership must be developed by both industry and labor. This leadership can only be developed among men who are willing to assume responsibility in the field of labor relations. The best training for this leadership is actual association with and knowledge of the problems that require leadership. The best way to acquire this knowledge is through day-to-day association with industrial labor problems within a plant, and the development of practical techniques for solving these problems.

If industry and labor are to push the Government out of labor relations you must build up a sound structure of collective bargaining, a field of mutual understanding and trust, so that the Nation's productivity will not be impaired. This refers particularly to the war-time powers of the War Labor Board, which, under the pressures of the war has to a great extent taken over the leadership in the field of collective bargaining by ordering wage rates and conditions of employment.

With the end of the emergency, it is to be expected that the wage-stabilization program and the War Labor Board in general, will immediately go out of business. If industry and labor have not found a field of mutual agreement within which they can operate by that time, public opinion in this country will not tolerate a return of jungle law in American industry. Management and labor must provide leadership which can negotiate constructively at the conference table or governmental controls, similar to those now exercised by the War Labor Board, will be carried over permanently into the peace.

All of us are expecting and praying for a great expansion of industry in the South. With this expansion will inevitably come an expansion of unionism. This is not only inevitable, it is desirable. We cannot have political democracy for long without at the same time having industrial democracy. The best safeguard against communism and fascism in this country is a strong labor movement, negotiating with strong, well informed progressive employers. Unless some means are found to avert the wave of strikes and lockouts which seem eminent after war-time restrictions are dropped, this industrial expansion in the South will be nipped in the bud. The Nation will not allow industry and labor to go back to the law of the tooth and the fang. Jungle law was made for beasts and not for men.

In my opinion, the one bright ray of hope in this situation which confronts us at the present time is the fact that since January 12, 1942, the day the National War Labor Board began business, hundreds of industry, labor, and public panel members have been trained in industry-labor relations by the Board. These people, respected citizens in their home communities, have become experienced in labor problems. In these panel members we have a great force, which properly utilized, can alleviate the worst of our industrial headaches in the South.

In every town of any size in the South we have appointed panels composed of labor, industry and public members. These people are now working in this field for the Government at great personal sacrifice. There is no reason why they should not voluntarily serve their local communities, since all of them are necessarily public-spirited citizens, with the welfare of their community and Nation at heart.

In order to utilize the experience gained by these panel members in the past few months, and prevent a return to jungle law in the relations between labor and industry, I would like to suggest that the following procedure or something of its kind be developed voluntarily, by labor and industry, on their own initiative, free from Government interference:

1. That the labor organizations, both A. F. of L. and C. I. O., and the various business and industry groups, such as chambers of commerce, boards of trade, personnel associations, trade associations, and other groups, cooperate and set up in each industrial community in the South a voluntary mediation board to be composed of equal representatives of public, labor, and industry. Membership on these boards should not be restricted to War Labor Board panel members, but should extend to outstanding industrialists, labor leaders and public men in general—men of goodwill—men of vision—men who merit the fullest confidence of all segments of the community.

2. Members who serve without compensation and would be available at all times for consultation with labor or industry. In order to facilitate this work, the mediation board should be as large as possible without becoming unwieldy.

3. The mediation board should meet at least once a month for general policy discussions. At such meetings the possibility of better techniques for handling labor disputes should be freely and frankly discussed with an end to arriving at a more satisfactory procedure in handling disputes.

4. The parties to a threatened dispute as well as anyone in the community should feel free to call upon the mediation board to use its good offices to prevent a cessation of production.

5. The board should be headed by a chairman in a position to give a substantial amount of his time to the work. Upon receipt by the chairman of notification of a dispute he would immediately call in a representative panel of labor and industry members, who would call the parties in for separate and, if necessary, joint conferences. It will probably be found that a good number of situations will clear up when the labor member of the board talks to the union involved, or when the industry member talks to the company.

6. If the labor and industry members of the panel selected are unable to settle the difficulty, the chairman, with the aid of labor and industry members, should select a public member or members for the panel. The panel should then hear the case in a manner similar to the operation of War Labor Board panels. A great number of cases will probably be settled during the panel hearing. In the small number of cases not settled, the panel would either recommend arbitration of the dispute, or might make a recommendation for settlement of the dispute. Although there would be nothing binding in such a recommendation, the fact that a recognized mediation agency made the recommendation would secure compliance in a majority of cases. The bright light of publicity might well be invoked if the parties did not accept the recommendation.

The mediation board will probably need the aid and assistance of the United States Conciliation Service. Commissioners of Conciliation, attached to that agency, are always available. In addition, the Service has available a trained staff of technicians and arbitrators. A wire or phone call to Clarence Williams, regional director of the Service in Atlanta, Ga., will always receive prompt attention. If the matters involved are subject to wage-stabilization control, the regional war labor board will be very glad to advise the panel of its policies. The board will set up a division to handle these requests.

In my opinion, we should not wait until the War Labor Board goes out of the picture to set up these local mediation boards. Now, while the Board is still functioning and the Board's panels are still in existence and can render invaluable aid to these local boards, we should proceed immediately to place the settlement of labor disputes back where it belongs, in the hands of the parties and the local community.

In closing, may I point out that the success of such a plan as I have proposed depends entirely on the cooperation of labor and industry and the general public. As I have said before, unless labor and industry start paddling in the same direction—an improved standard of living for all our people—John Q. Public, through his Government, will insist that agencies such as the War Labor Board, be continued into the peace.

As a firm believer in the American way I sincerely pray that labor and industry will seize this opportunity to put their representative houses in order and once again sit down to the conference table and work out their joint problems in the only really satisfactory way to settle labor disputes.

[From the Atlanta Journal of August 2, 1944]

FOR INDUSTRIAL PEACE

Without having to go too far, you may hear nowadays that when the war ends and Government controls expire there will be grave industrial conflict on the home front. You may hear the Bourbon capitalist say, in effect: "We'll put those unions in their place." You may hear the agitator in the ranks of labor say, "With patriotism and war pledges out of it, we are going to get ours."

It is possible, of course, to exaggerate the gravity of the outlook forecast by such radical statements. Things usually turn out better than pessimists predict, for there is a lot of character and a lot of sense distributed among the American people of all classes. But it would be the part of wisdom for management and organized labor to give earnest consideration now to the establishment of a mode of living in amity and mutual help when Hitler and Hirohito shall have been beaten. The transition from a war economy to that of peace will be difficult enough at best for both sides of the pay window. Bitter strife between management and labor on a sectional or national basis would bring chaos and disaster.

Paul L. Styles, vice chairman of the fourth regional war labor board, which functions in the Southeast, made a suggestive talk on this subject to a meeting of employers and labor leaders at Brunswick Wednesday. He urged the setting up of mediation boards in every sizable community in the South which, operating on a voluntary basis, would harmonize differences between management and labor. These home-town boards would be composed of "men of good will representing labor, industry, and the public—men of such outstanding leadership in their communities as to deserve the fullest confidence of all segments of the population."

Mr. Styles points to the present panels which already have been set up as subsidiaries of the War Labor Board—citizens now working at great personal sacrifice for industrial peace. "In these panel members," he says, "we have a great force which, properly utilized, can alleviate the worst of our industrial headaches in the South. There is no reason why they should not voluntarily serve their local communities, since all of them are necessarily public-spirited citizens, with the welfare of their community and Nation at heart."

Mr. Styles argues that management and labor must learn to make collective bargaining work on a voluntary basis. He believes too many cases have been coming to the War Labor Board in which the full processes of collective bargaining have not been exhausted; on both sides there has been an unwholesome disposition to put cases into the lap of the Government. And, he says, with a wisdom which will find wide acceptance, "Government arbitration of labor disputes is certainly a weak substitute for sound, legitimate collective bargaining."

The importance of preparing now for the future is stressed by Mr. Styles in saying: "All of us are expecting and praying for a great expansion of industry in the South. With this expansion will inevitably come an expansion of unionism. This is not only inevitable, it is desirable. We cannot have political democracy for long without at the same time having an industrial democracy. The best safeguards against communism and fascism in this country is a strong labor movement, negotiating with strong, well-informed, progressive employers. Unless some means is found to avert the wave of strikes and lock-outs after wartime restrictions are dropped, this industrial expansion in the South will be nipped in the bud. The Nation will not allow industry and labor to go back to the law of tooth and the fang. Jungle law was made for beasts, not for men."

Flood Control and Valley Authorities

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILL M. WHITTINGTON

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 10, 1944

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address which I delivered on Thursday, July 27, 1944, at a special session of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress in New Orleans, La., to wit:

While flood-control works are as old as recorded history, they began in the United States at New Orleans along the Lower Mississippi River. Following the great flood of 1927, Congress declared that flood control along the lower Mississippi River was a national problem. A national flood-control policy for all rivers in the United States was adopted for the first time in 1936. More progress has been made in flood control in the United States in the past 15 years than in the preceding 15 centuries. There is a reason. The Federal Government provided for flood control along the lower Mississippi River in the Flood Control Act of 1928 by the Mississippi River Commission under the supervision of the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army. "Old Man River" has been tamed. The kinks have been eliminated. Every method of flood control has been utilized. Levees have been constructed to keep the floods out, and reservoirs have been built to hold the floods back. Cut-offs have been made to accelerate the flow and thus reduce flood heights. Floodways and spillways have supplemented levees.

Under the Flood Control Act of 1936, the planning and construction of works are under the supervision of the Chief of Engineers. Soil conservation, water retardation, and reforestation are under the supervision of the Department of Agriculture. There has been cooperation between the Corps of Engineers and the Department of Agriculture. Reforestation, water retardation and soil conservation supplement but do not supplant flood control. Generally reservoirs for power and reservoirs for flood control are incompatible A full reservoir is essential to the development of power, but an empty reservoir is required for the storage of flood waters. However, reservoirs may be constructed for multiple purposes. Provision can be made in the first instance for water for the development of power. Additional provision can then be made for the storage of flood waters. All existing flood-control acts provide for the installation of pen stocks. Power may not be presently developed, but provision is made for the future development, where practical, of power in all reservoirs. Water uses are frequently involved in the building of dams. Under the national policy, provision has been made for the utilization of water for all purposes. The plan is to make water serve and not destroy man, nor man's property.

RIVERS

Rivers interest me. There is a romance and there is a mystery about rivers. The Garden of Eden was situated between the Tigris and the Euphrates Rivers. The Romans worshipped the Tiber. The Egyptians worshipped the Nile. The East Indians worshipped the Ganges. The Indians revered the Mississippi as the Father of Waters.

Throughout human history rivers have influenced the course of civilization. They have molded and served man in the past and in the future they will help to make nations great. Some rivers are gentle and romantic. Others are stately and majestic, but there is a glory about all of them. I agree with Victor Hugo, who said: "I love rivers; they do more than bear merchandise. Ideas float along their surface. Rivers like clarions sing to the ocean of the beauty of the earth, the fertility of the plains, and the splendor of the cities."

The Mississippi is the greatest and longest navigable river in this or any other country. The levees along the Mississippi River overshadow the great walls of China. Man has never made any marks across the face of the earth comparable to the levees along the Mississippi. The cycle of floods has been constant through the ages. "All the rivers run into the sea, * * * unto the place from whence the rivers come, thither they return again." In this quotation from Ecclesiastes, chapter 1, verse 7, the Bible condenses the flood cycle to four phases. First there is evaporation from sea and gulf. Secondly, the clouds are blown two or three thousand miles over hills and valleys. Third, there is the rainfall following the condensation of the clouds, and, fourth, the run-off when the floods return to the sea.

But important rivers like famous men are not all large. There are small rivers that are important, just as there are small men who are great. Great rivers like great men are not always large in size. Many of the most important rivers in the world are comparatively small, while the names of others much larger are seldom heard.

Floods have occurred in all centuries and along all rivers. They have occurred the world over. The Babylonians constructed flood-control works along the Euphrates River, and Alexander built works along its tributaries. There are records of floods along the Seine in Europe that go back 400 years. There were erosions long before the advent of the white man in America. Man is thus responsible for only a small part of the silt. Dust storms are not new. Geologists tell us that the soil of the Eastern Central States from a few inches to several feet in depth is the accumulation of the dust storms of the past. There was a great flood along the Ohio River in 1783. The Lower Mississippi River was in flood when it was discovered by DeSoto in 1541. Rivers either build or destroy; but they lose none of their beauty and none of their fascination as they travel toward the sea and gulf.

ESSENTIAL IN WAR

Flood control is essential in peace. It is more essential in war. River transportation and inland waterway transportation are important in peace. They are more important in war. The English, Russians, and Germans have utilized their rivers in peace, but they are utilizing them more in war. The more fierce the war, the more widespread is the use of inland waterways. The great battles between the Russians and the Germans have been fought along the rivers of Russia. We should always remember that during the First World War it was necessary for the United States to use everything that would float, as has been said, "from a bateau to a battleship." Ships are important. Barges are necessary. Improved waterways are fundamental. Flood control and navigation are as essential in the war in the New World as they are in the Old World.

METHODS TESTED AND APPROVED

The history of floods in the United States and other countries is well known. They are not now more frequent, but because of the advance in civilization the destruction is greater. The forces of nature have been constant through the centuries. The time for argument and disputation with respect to the methods of solving flood problems has passed. All factors of safety have been utilized. The methods have been tested. The policy and the program are sound. Congress has manifested foresight. The adopted projects are flexible and can be expanded. All works constructed as authorized will be utilized in the program of expansion. As new problems arise new solutions will be found.

MISSISSIPPI VALLEY

There is no valley in all the world comparable to the Mississippi. It lies between the Alleghenies and the Rockies, and between the Great Lakes and the Gulf. It is the most important valley on the face of the earth. The future of the United States will be determined by the development of this valley. Factories will be safer with the mountains separating them from the seas. The idea is for the factories to be near the field. The soil of the Mississippi Valley is the most fertile in this or any other country. It is not too much to say that the civilization of the valley will determine the civilization of the United States.

The supreme aim of America in fighting the greatest of all wars is to save America, and the supreme rehabilitation following victory is the rehabilitation of America. Property and people must be protected in peace as well as in war. Flood-control works have been tried. They have been tested, and they have not been found wanting. The program and the policy that has obtained along the Father of Waters and the father of floods should be extended to all of the rivers of our common country as we plan for a fairer day and a great country following the victory for which the flower of the youth of America is fighting and dying.

FALLACIES

There are many fallacies respecting the causes and remedies for floods. There are all kinds of superficial theories, lopsided plans, and falacious remedies to solve flood problems. There are those who maintain that soil conservation and reforestation will prevent floods. Others assert that reservoirs along tributaries and headwaters are the only remedy. Unfortunately, many who advocate reservoirs for local flood control make the mistake of asserting that the policy of levees has failed. In their eagerness for local protection, they would destroy protection in the lower Mississippi Valley. In all countries, in all ages, levees to protect from floods along alluvial rivers have been constructed.

In an editorial on May 31, 1944, the Washington Times-Herald made this statement: "The prediction has been made that if the levee method is used long enough, the Mississippi eventually will be running along a big walled ditch far above the level of the adjoining country. It hasn't come to that yet, but it is on its way." We meet in New Orleans today. The Mississippi River is from 100 to 200 feet deep along the New Orleans waterfront. Careful investigations and studies have been made. Nowhere has the bottom of the Mississippi River risen. Instead of being near the surface, the Mississippi River is as deep today as it ever was. The popular fallacy that the bottom of the Mississippi River is rising or has ever risen is quite frequently asserted. It has no basis whatsoever in fact.

MISSOURI RIVER AUTHORITY

Following the floods of 1943 and 1944 along the Missouri River, a Missouri River Authority has been advocated to solve the flood problems along the Missouri River. The praises of the Tennessee Valley Authority have been sung. A similar organization for the Missouri and the other river basins has been suggested. I have favored and supported the Tennessee Valley Authority. I concede to the Tennessee Valley Authority all of the accomplishments that it deserves, but the Tennessee Valley Authority is primarily for the development of power. Its reservoirs and its dams are primarily, I repeat to emphasize, for the development of power. The authority was intended to provide a yardstick for the cost of hydroelectric power. But it is a fallacy to assert that the T. V. A. has protected the Tennessee Valley from floods. I recall that in the Ohio flood of 1937 it was stated that there was no major flood as a result of the T. V. A. along the Tennessee River. It was asserted that the T. V. A. had protected Cairo. There were unprecedented floods along the Ohio and many of its tributaries, but there was no unprecedented flood in 1937 along the Tennessee River.

The flood of 1937 exceeded all previous gages by some 10 feet at both Cincinnati and Louisville. It was caused by continuous and excessive rains in the lower Ohio Valley below the location of the dams and reservoirs on the tributaries. The Norris and Joe Wheeler Dams had been constructed, but there was no great flood in 1937 along the Tennessee River. The building of the Norris Dam and the Joe Wheeler Dam was given as the cause of the prevention of such floods. It might as well be said that there were no great floods along the Arkansas River in 1937. No reservoirs had been constructed along that river. The two cases would be analogous. It was a question of rainfall. The rains in the upper Tennessee Valley were well distributed, and, while unusual, the aggregate for the month of January in the headwaters of the Tennessee River was 13 inches, while in the lower stretches of the Tennessee River and along the Ohio River there were 23 inches and more of rainfall. The rains fell below the dams. The river gages tell the story of floods along the Tennessee River. At Knoxville in 1927 the gage was 19 feet. There was no dam or reservoir above Knoxville. In 1937 the gage was 19 feet. At Chattanooga in 1927 the gage was 33 feet. In 1937 it was 32.9 feet. The Norris Dam is above Chattanooga. At Johnsonville, where the rains were excessive, some 90 miles from where the Tennessee empties into the Ohio at Paducah, in both 1927 and 1937 the gage was 41 feet. Comparisons are always odious. This is especially true when they are not apt or correct.

I repeat that I have supported the Tennessee Valley Authority, but Congress has made other provisions that have resulted in the reduction of power rates. The Public Utility Act and the Securities Exchange Act, both established by Congress, have played a part in the reduction and adjustment of power rates, but the T. V. A. yardstick has been most helpful.

The reservoirs along the Tennessee River in the flood of 1937, according to accurate reports, contributed to the reduction of flood heights at Cairo substantially 1 inch or 1½ inches. Other dams have been constructed since. They will further reduce flood heights at Cairo to something more than 2½ inches. But I repeat that it is a fallacy to say that the T. V. A. has provided for the control of floods in the valley of the Tennessee River. Its objective was hydro-electric power. Its purpose was to supply that power at the lowest practicable rates. Instead of protecting the Tennessee Valley, the construction of dams from its mouth to its source has converted the entire valley to reservoirs. The T. V. A. has put in the bottoms of reservoirs substantially all of the lands that were subject to overflow before the river was improved for hydro-electric purposes.

The Tennessee River is a mountainous river, ideally suited for the development of power. The lands formerly subject to overflow are now submerged, and the flood problems of the Tennessee Valley have been eliminated by submerging its valley.

A similar authority would not be advisable for the Missouri River. The development of power from Sioux City to its mouth for some 760 miles along the river is not desired. It is not practicable. The need is to protect the valley of the Missouri from floods. The purpose is not to destroy the valley by overflowing it, but to preserve it as a part of the breadbasket of the country. A T. V. A. for the Missouri Valley is unwise. It is unsound for other similar valleys. The purpose of flood control in the great alluvial valley of the Mississippi is to preserve that valley, the richest soil in the world, for cultivation and for crop production. A T. V. A. along the lower Mississippi River would be thoroughly impracticable and would change the lands from agricultural uses to serve as bottoms of reservoirs.

I concede that the dams along the Tennessee River, and particularly the Kentucky Dam, are of some benefit to flood control along the lower Ohio and thus along the Mississippi, but the discharge of the Tennessee River is 500,000 second feet. The Mississippi River below Cairo carries floods of about 3,000,000 second feet. It was not the T. V. A. that saved Cairo in 1937, but it was the floodwall at Cairo and the New Madrid floodway authorized and constructed by the Mississippi River Commission under the supervision of the Chief of Engineers under the Flood Control Act of 1928. It is not practicable to control floods in the lower Mississippi Valley by reservoirs alone. They have their place. I favor them on their merits. Levees are being supplemented by reservoirs, but the reservoirs cannot supplant the levees. Congress has authorized 35 reservoirs in the Red, Arkansas, and White River Basins; 5 reservoirs in the Yazoo and St. Francis Basins; 9 in the upper Mississippi Basin; 85 in the Ohio Basin; and 25 in the Missouri Basin. A total of over 150 reservoirs have thus been authorized. These reservoirs are planned primarily for local flood control, but they have a beneficial effect on flood control in the lower Mississippi River. As has been said, the Army engineers are in the reservoir business in a big way. But T. V. A. is not the solution for floods along either the Mississippi, the Missouri, or other large rivers with valleys and industry or agriculture to be protected. Flood control in the Tennessee Valley is incidental. The river is well canalized. Navigation has been promoted. Power is the objective. Some newspapers and some individuals have advocated the T. V. A. as a solution of the flood problem along the Missouri River. Their position is untenable.

LUMP SUM APPROPRIATIONS

Authorities contemplate lump sum appropriations. Under the policy of national flood control, all authorized projects are recommended by the Chief of Engineers. They are authorized by Congress. Congress makes the appropriations, and properly so. The representatives of the people levy taxes against citizens, and the citizens expect that their representatives shall have a voice in the appropriation of the taxes so levied. The representatives and the people are entitled to accurate information before definite projects are approved. Authorities contemplate directors. Divided authority is often worse than no authority at all. There are differences between the directors. Central authority and central control are essential for successful construction and administration.

The blessed sunlight of publicity should shine upon the expenditures of taxes. Taxpayers want no experimental agency telling them what to build, without scrutiny of appropriations and without general supervision by the Representatives of the Congress and of the country.

I am anxious for the T. V. A. experiment to work out and to succeed. At present there is no occasion for any further T. V. A.'s, and there is no occasion for any more National Resources Planning Boards. The people and the Congress intend that they both shall be heard and considered. The adopted policy of flood control provides that waterway and flood control legislation should be authorized and appropriated for by the elected representatives of the people.

COMMISSION

The House has passed a flood-control bill authorizing additional projects in all of the basins of the country at an estimated cost of $810,000,000. The two major projects are along the Missouri River and the Mississippi River. Authorizations for increasing the navigation channel to 12 feet from Cairo to Baton Rouge are provided. These authorizations are particularly essential to provide revetments to protect the banks and the levees along the lower Mississippi River. Two hundred millions of dollars are authorized for flood control along the Missouri. It has been suggested that a commission similar to the Mississippi River Commission be authorized for the Missouri River. While I have an open mind on the subject, I have by no means reached the conclusion that the commission is the solution. A commission similar to the Mississippi River Commission has been suggested as I have stated. I am inclined to think that a smaller commission similar to the Sacramento River Commission would be preferable. I shall continue to urge, however, that the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army, along both the Mississippi River and the Missouri River, and along other rivers, shall have the final say. I shall continue to insist that the chief administrative agency of the Missouri and of all other river basins in the United States shall be a division engineer of the United States Corps of Engineers, and that by and large the agency for the planning as well as the execution of flood-control works along the Missouri and along other river basins shall be composed primarily of representatives of the Corps of Engineers.

As civilization in all countries advanced, man attempted to improve and control rivers. Sometimes he undertook to control the ravages of disastrous floods by keeping high waters within the banks, and between levees supplementing the banks. Again he utilized diversions and constructed floodways. At other times he stored in reservoirs the excess waters in rainy seasons for use in time of scarcity. Dams have been constructed to detain the flood waters to prevent the overflow of the valleys.

DOMINANT INTEREST

The Committee on Flood Control has adhered to the policy of reporting bills and reporting projects where the dominant interest is flood control. It often appears that navigation, irrigation, or power is involved. All interests are heard, and only those projects where the preponderance of the testimony shows that flood control is paramount are authorized.

RESERVOIRS

Flood control is a national problem, and while local works are required in many cases, local works are not effective in other cases. It is most difficult in reservoirs to determine and to distribute among local interests the cost of construction. Moreover, reservoirs in one State detain waters that flood another State. Floods know no State lines. Reservoirs are authorized under the act of 1936, but they were only constructed in the far West where there are no fertile valleys and where areas are largely canyon without much value. Reservoirs were authorized along the tributaries of the Ohio and of the Connecticut, but they were not constructed because in many cases they did not benefit or protect from floods the areas in the States where they were located, below the dams. The protection extended to other States.

The country insisted that levees and flood walls should be supplemented wherever practicable by reservoirs. The Corps of Engineers asserted that the waters should be detained at their source. Experience demonstrated that such reservoirs could only be constructed by the Federal Government assuming the costs of easements and construction. In local works the principle of local contribution obtains. If the policy of the Government paying the costs of rights-of-way for reservoirs were abandoned, flood control would be irretrievably set back.

There was opposition particularly in New England to the United States' furnishing easements for dams for flood control, under the guise of States' rights, but no matter how sincere, the opposition in reality voices the policy of the power trusts. There are those who still oppose the construction of reservoirs for flood control where those reservoirs contain power possibilities. The opposition is without merit. Water is our most valuable resource. If the floods can be detained and if provision can be made economically for the development of power for the benefit of all the people in the area where dams are located, a Federal policy that prevented the development of such power would be shortsighted. It would not be in the public or the national interest. It is passing strange that those who oppose the Federal Government developing power and disposing of it to the people in the area where produced, giving to public institutions the refusal of the power with provision for compensating from the proceeds of power sold, the State and local jurisdictions for taxes that might otherwise be levied against private interests at the same time advocate construction by the power interests. Those who oppose the Government developing and disposing of power so produced advocate reservoirs for the generation of power by private corporations. I know of no more effective prevention of monopolistic power rates than the Federal projects that we have as a yardstick where they are justified in the river basins of the United States.

We have heard about reservoirs being authorized and constructed in one State, and we have heard that the beautiful valleys and farms in that State have been destroyed for the protection of other States. It is time for careful thinking. No reservoirs for flood control in the valleys of the United States east of the Mississippi River were constructed until in 1938, when the construction of reservoirs was authorized at Federal expense. There is a reason. It is difficult to apportion the cost among the citizens and the States. It is difficult to ascertain and by State compact or otherwise distribute, in all fairness, the cost. It is passing strange that objection is made to the construction of reservoirs in some States where the same States accord to the private power companies the right to condemn and to flood the beautiful valleys of those States. It is all right for the power companies, but it is all wrong for the Federal Government to protect the lives and property of the people and to provide for reasonable yardsticks for the utilization of the water resources of the country.

CONSISTENCY

The Rocky Mountain area has been benefited as no other section of the United States, by the construction of Bonneville, Grand Coulee, and Boulder Dams. They were constructed at Federal expense. There isn't the same opposition as there has been to the construction of reservoirs for flood control in New England. I have been disappointed, however, because some of those in the West in opposing the flood-control project along the Missouri River have been collaborating with New England interests and with other interests that oppose the construction of reservoirs by the Federal Government at Federal expense. If the opposition obtains, no reservoirs would be constructed along the Missouri or along any other river at Federal expense.

FLOOD CONTROL AND RECLAMATION

It is a source of satisfaction to me that there has always been cooperation between the advocates of flood control, rivers and harbors, and reclamation. Utilization of our natural resources has been promoted by all. Unfortunately, there is rivalry not only among groups but in governmental departments. There is room enough in this broad land of ours for all activities to utilize water for the progress of man. There is no real occasion for rivalry between the Bureau of Reclamation and the Corps of Engineers. There is no occasion for conflict. Those who promote discord and those who undertake to drive a wedge between advocates of flood control and reclamation are rendering both interests a distinct disservice.

Much has been said about the appropriation of waters and about the rights of States to the uses of water. The Committee on Flood Control has been most careful to recommend no project and to include no provision in the bill now pending in the Senate that would in any way retard reclamation. As I have indicated no project has been reported unless the dominant interest is flood control. The committee went out of its way. It invited the Commissioner of Reclamation. He was heard not once but several times by the committee. Those who shared his views and his fears submitted their arguments to the committee. The States have no power of appropriation or power of use that is not accorded to them under the Constitution. While the paramount right under the commerce clause of the Constitution is in the Federal Government, in every way, even to the extent of stretching the Constitution, the Federal Government has cooperated with the arid land States and has promoted and aided reclamation. I am sympathetic with the uses of waters in the arid States for domestic, agricultural, and industrial purposes. Personally, I would like to see them detain for such purposes all the waters possible. But there is no occasion for quibbling. Reclamation projects constructed will be under the supervision and control of the Secretary of the Interior, under the bill reported by the Committee on Flood Control.

I am aware that some friends of reclamation are disturbed about the Missouri River project. All reasonable safeguards to show that it is the intent and purpose of the authorization to recognize existing rights are contained in the bill. In fact the Committee on Flood Control has leaned over backward in an effort to cooperate with the Bureau of Reclamation.

Reservoirs along the main stem of the Missouri River above Sioux City will not provide for any waters except waters that empty into the main river from the tributaries, and I emphasize that there is nothing in the bill to prevent the waters on the tributaries from being utilized for the development of the arid lands before and after it reaches the main stem of the Missouri River. The people who suffer from devastating floods on the Missouri River below Sioux City and on the Mississippi River south of St. Louis will be more than pleased if the waters are not only utilized but detained at the source.

There is no occasion for the West to be apprehensive. I favor the utilization of waters within the States for domestic use and for irrigation. I want to protect citizens of all the States in their riparian privileges and in the enjoyment of their riparian rights. All such rights in the West or elsewhere along navigable rivers are under the jurisdiction of the Congress of the United States. The Western States are protected in the pending flood-control bill. They are protected in the continued utilization of the water resources under the existing law. Quibbling, misinterpretation or misrepresenting with respect to existing or proposed legislation, whether State or Federal, can only hurt the cause of reclamation. Flood-control projects in the West have been constructed along the Sacramento and other rivers for years. No conflict with respect to the domestic use of water or the use of water for irrigation has arisen.

PUBLIC WORKS

National flood-control appropriations, except in emergencies, have been discontinued for the duration, but a backlog of sound flood-control projects is essential to provide for unemployment, as well as for the protection of the lives and property of the people of the United States, following the war. But war comes first. After all has been said and done, there are but two fundamental issues confronting the American people. These questions are war and peace. It is essential in peace to prepare for war. It is just as essential in war to prepare for peace. We believe in freedom. We agree with Pitt: "Where law ends, tyranny begins." We believe in private initiative and free enterprise We believe that those who possess character and genius are the benefactors of civilization.

I have faith in America. I believe in the future of the United States. I believe in the Republic. Others may despair. Others may doubt, but as for me, I believe that the United States will not only survive the greatest of all wars, but I also believe that in the spirit of our forefathers we shall improve our heritage and thus sustain and make better the Republic.

History teaches us that when the political horizon is the darkest, the stars appear. I am optimistic enough to believe that man who has spanned the oceans, that man who has sent his voice around the world, cannot be so perverse as to climb new heights and reach new mountain peaks only to fall and break himself to pieces from the greater heights. Sometimes, "What shadows we are, and what shadows we pursue."

MISSING

We are in the most critical period of the war. It is all over but the fighting, and the fighting has just begun. The casualty lists are mounting day by day. There is one word that lingers in my mind day and night. That word is "Missing." Seldom a day passes that I do not receive a message from some anxious father or anxious mother asking me to inquire if there isn't some further word respecting the son who is reported as missing in action. They ask me to verify. They want some ray of hope. "Missing in action" means a lot. When the lad left, father and mother both said, "Be brave." They restrained their tears until the boy was out of sight. Day and night, mother and father have looked at one another. They have said nothing. Their thoughts were the same. Day and night they have thought of the plans and of the hopes and ambitions of the son. But the lad never complained. He went away with high head and proud heart. He said, "My place is with my fellows."

We are determined to keep America free. We are determined to maintain a government that is the servant and not the master of the American people. We are determined for those who may not be "missing in action" to keep America the kind of America the dad planned for the lad who is "missing in action."

More than a year ago a cargo transport, as reported by the public press, steamed steadily in the ice-infested waters of the North Atlantic. The men had slept well that night. They were nearing port. It was only 90 miles to the dock. Fifteen minutes after 1 o'clock in the night a torpedo struck amidship. The engines were silenced, scores were killed beneath the decks. Until very recently the losses of the Dorchester were the heaviest of any sinking of the 2 wars. Out of 904 personnel, 678 were lost. It is said that there were 4 chaplains on the Dorchester, and that these 4 chaplains were of 3 faiths. They came to the upper deck; they quieted the panic; they lifted and assisted others to get into the lifeboats; at the last they took off their own belts and put those belts around enlisted men. It is reported that when they were last seen they were standing on the bow, the 4 of them side by side, as the bow came up high and slid under. They were not seen again. A Catholic, a Jew, and 2 Protestants—the 4 had learned the fine art of living together on that ship, and having learned that art, they were not divided in death. Let us all, of all creeds, and of all classes, be united for total victory and for total peace.

Creating Peace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LISTER HILL

OF ALABAMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 10 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 8), 1944

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a very timely and thoughtful editorial entitled "Creating Peace," published in the Birmingham News-Age-Herald of July 16, 1944.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CREATING PEACE

It now is quite clearly established that the Roosevelt administration's program for international collaboration after the war is largely founded on the principles and achievements of pan-American cooperation. What are these principles and achievements? The American people obviously should very clearly understand them. Yet we wonder how many Americans are adequately conversant with these conceptions.

The Peoples Mandate Committee for Inter-American Peace and Cooperation, of which Dr. Mary E. Woolley is chairman and Miss Mabel Vernon is director, long has been contributing to the upbuilding of a wider understanding of pan-American collaboration. Believing, with the national administration, that this collaboration does offer valuable ideas and policies for utilization in the quest for worldwide peace, the committee is striving to develop the utmost possible comprehension of just what those ideas and policies are.

Recently it has issued a new booklet on the subject, Pan-American Principles Fundamental to World Cooperation, by Florence Brewer Boeckel. It is an admirable summary which has been highly commended by pan-American leaders. It outlines the report of the executive committee on post-war problems of the governing board of the Pan American Union made in 1943 as a contribution to the study of international organization.

This report emphasizes that the pan-American system is cooperative rather than based primarily on force, group domination or a balance of power.

"It (the system) is founded," says the Peoples Mandate Committee's booklet, "on the principle of absolute juridical equality and the complete sovereignty and independence of each state and on the thesis that the welfare of each is dependent on the welfare of all. It holds that international relations should be governed by laws agreed to by the community of states and that the faithful observance of treaties is an indispensable rule in the conduct of international relations."

In brief, the pan-American system regards peace as a positive reality to be achieved, rather than merely the absence of war brought about simply by the prevention of fighting.

It is the absence of an absolute commitment to the use of force and the emphasis on sovereignty in the President's plan that has evoked much of the criticism of it. There are many condemnations of the administration program on the general ground that everything depends on force. Then there are those who say that because there would be no surrender of American sovereignty under it, no real progress would be made toward the development and rule of international law.

It seems to this paper that such criticisms show a very limited and even cynical attitude toward the problem of peace.

Surely we know that sheer domination by force does not in itself constitute peace. While military power might, of course, operate effectively to discourage and even curb aggression, it is no fundamentally dependable or final solution.

A durable, creative peace can be established only by the development of genuine confidence, good will, and cooperation among the nations.

Such an international state of affairs is not to be sought through some merely emotional change of sentiment. Rather enlightened self-interest should motivate and guide the nations as they strive toward that goal. They should realize ever more clearly that the welfare of each is dependent on the welfare of all.

As progress is achieved based on understanding and collaboration, there can be hope for the gradual strengthening of the entire system of world law. Under such a growing system, national freedom should be enhanced as it confidently yields growing responsibilities in the international sphere to the evolving system of collaboration.

Reconversion of Industry

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 10 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 8), 1944

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "A Bill To Make Unemployment Blissful," written by Arthur Krock and published in the New York Times of August 10, 1944.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IN THE NATION—A BILL TO MAKE UNEMPLOYMENT BLISSFUL

(By Arthur Krock)

WASHINGTON, August 9.—Even as amended by the Senate Committee on Military Affairs, the Murray-Kilgore bill for the reconversion of industry is a lazy man's dream, or a collectivist's, or the vision of one of those union labor politicians who thinks organized workers should be the favored class and that the size of the national debt is nothing because we owe it to ourselves.

A great amount of space would be required to make a worthy summary of the measure which is supported by new dealers in Congress, spokesmen for organized labor, and devotees of the Communist system of government as modified by the gradual, instead of the instant, economic leveling of those who have won a competence by hard work and talent. But a fairly good idea of this bill can be gained by inspecting its highlights.

Its political philosophy, aside from the pragmatism represented in the design for vote-getting, is founded on these bases: Deficit spending is essential to a high national income. The Government owes every good citizen a good living, and doubts of the citizen's qualification as "good" should generally be resolved in his favor. If he was not in uniform the Government must assume that he performed comparably on the home front, and give him almost as many benefits as it gives to veterans. The Federal establishment, through power of the purse, must retain over the States its role as the source of individual bounties, larger than the States will give because Washington's heart is as big as the taxpayers' funds which Congress long ago turned over to the Executive.

On these foundations Senators MURRAY and KILGORE and those who helped them prepare the bill have put a shining pile of promissory notes which are pledges for a sum that cannot be calculated within tens of billions annually. Here are some of the outstanding items:

SOME PROVISIONS

If it shall be the administration policy to suspend or overlook statutes and constitutional provisions that may interfere with the operations of the bill, the Attorney General is encouraged to "legalize" that policy by inaction (sec. 103 (e) (1)).

The continuation of work on contracts which "will not be needed for the prosecution of the war" is permissible if the contracting agency decides that "some or all of the work * * * will benefit the Government" (sec. 201).

The Work Administrator (using the compulsions of a national service law) is authorized to pay the transportation of "workers and ex-servicemen," including the costs of moving their dependents and household effects, from their last previous residences to the sites of new jobs, with certain limitations as to expenditure (sec. 306 (a)).

He is authorized to give 6 months of free training for a job, with maintenance allowances running from $50 to $100 monthly, to any person he may select (sec. 307 (b)).

Beginning 3 months after the enactment of the bill and ending at the start of the twenty-fifth month "following the termination of war," interim placement benefits shall be paid amounting to 75 percent of an individual's "weekly wage" but not exceeding $35 a week for a citizen with 3 or more dependents. Once fixed, the rate of payment shall not be reduced (sec. 309 (b)).

If the citizen "failed, without good cause, to accept suitable work" on a certain day, his unemployment pension will lapse, and nonsuitable work is defined as that created by a strike, lock-out, or other labor dispute, work at less than union or neighborhood prevailing wages, or offered with the condition that the worker must join a company union, refrain from joining a labor union, violate labor union "laws" or lose seniority rights (sec. 308 (d) and (f)).

After State unemployment agencies have determined what amounts would have been payable for these interim benefits under the State laws, the Work Administrator will notify the Treasury to pay to the States the excess prescribed by the Murray-Kilgore bill. This is to be a gift, not a loan, encouraging low State pay standards (sec. 310 (d)).

The Secretary of Labor is directed to investigate and report on "the extent to which * * * annual wage systems would contribute to full employment and rising standards of living," with a break-down of the industries that might be affected pro or con. A Secretary favorable to this idea would, of course, turn in an affirmative report (sec. 313 (a)).

A FEW SAFEGUARDS

There are some safeguards in the bill to prevent the post-war United States from being the scene of an unending paid vacation and fish fry, with the fish limited to caviar and pompano and champagne substituted for beer. "Dependents" are defined with some sense of moderation. If a citizen is receiving certain other public bounties his participation in the Murray-Kilgore fund is restricted. He is disqualified if he has been "properly discharged" or "suspended" from a job for "misconduct," but as usual the burden of proof will be on his employer if New Deal boards and a New Deal Work Administrator are operating the law.

For those who believe in the extreme of Government protections of the individual, in maintaining the special privileges granted to union labor in the Wagner Act, and so forth, in deficit spending, in making little distinction between post-war benefits to ex-servicemen and civilians, and generally in the superstate concept, the Murray-Kilgore bill lives up to expectations.

Constitutionality of the Hatch Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CARL A. HATCH

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 10 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 8), 1944

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article and editorial from the Washington Daily News of August 9, 1944, relating to the recent favorable ruling by a Federal court in the District of Columbia on the constitutionality of the Hatch Act.

There being no objection, the article and editorial were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RULING ON HATCH ACT APPEAL UNLIKELY BEFORE ELECTION DAY

(By Charles T. Lucey)

Upholding the constitutionality of the Hatch Act, a three-judge court has cleared the way for action in some 200 cases in which United States employees are charged with political activity and apparently has nailed down the ban which will keep nearly 3,000,000 Federal jobholders out of the Presidential campaign.

The opinion, joined in by one United States circuit judge and two district court judges in the District of Columbia, will be appealed to the United States Supreme Court by the United Federal Workers of America, a C. I. O. union, but ruling before election day would be unlikely. The C. I. O.-backed Political Action Committee is pledged to President Roosevelt.

MR. POOLE WAS ACTIVE

George P. Poole, an employee of the Philadelphia Mint, is the man whose case may become a cause celebre in the history of the fight on this issue.

Mr. Poole was one of some 700 persons in the mint against whom complaints were received in connection with alleged political activity. A joint Civil Service Commission-Treasury investigation showed enough evidence to warrant letters of charges to these employees. Evidence seems to show that the mint workers had served as Democratic ward committeemen, as poll watchers, and in other branches of electioneering.

In its petition the union admitted that Mr. Poole had violated the Hatch Act. The claim of lack of constitutionality was based on an alleged conflict between a provision of the law barring Federal workers from taking any active part in political management or in political campaigns with the freedom-of-speech clause of the Constitution.

The opinion, which apparently makes mandatory the dismissal of Mr. Poole from Federal service, went back to Thomas Jefferson for a quotation supporting the laying of certain restrictions on Government employees.

"The President of the United States," said Mr. Jefferson during his tenure as Chief Executive, "has seen with dissatisfaction officers of the General Government taking, on various occasions, active parts in the elections of the public functionaries, whether of the General or of the State Governments.

"Freedom of election being essential to the mutual independence of governments and of the different branches of the same government, so vitally cherished by most of our constitutions, it is deemed improper for officers depending on the Executive of the Union to attempt to control or influence the free exercise of the elective right."

DIDN'T DENY VOTE

Mr. Jefferson made it plain, as does the Hatch Act, that this did not abridge the right of any Government worker to vote as a qualified citizen.

The three-man court pointed out that "There has been a strong development towards safeguarding employees of the Government from insecurity attributable to political affiliation." The C. I. O. union had charged the law was discriminatory because it exempted legislative employees, employees of the President's office, and certain policy-making officials, but the court held that "it is perfectly obvious that these classes of employees are in very large measure political" and would change when an administration changes.

Under Civil Service Commission procedure, when complaints of political activity are received against an employee, the Commission notifies the Federal department concerned and asks it to join in an investigation. If this investigation gives evidence to support the complaint, the accused person is given opportunity to answer the charges. Dismissal is the mandatory penalty where guilt is established.

THE HATCH ACT UPHELD

A three-man Federal court in the District of Columbia has just upheld the constitutionality of the Hatch Act, which prohibits political activity by Federal jobholders—a fact of special importance in this Presidential campaign year when there are nearly 3,000,000 on the Government's pay roll.

The court went back some years to quote a former President in support of its finding:

"The President of the United States has seen with dissatisfaction officers of the general Government taking on various occasions active parts in elections of the public functionaries, whether of the general or of the State governments.

"Freedom of elections being essential to the mutual independence of governments and of the different branches of the same government, so vitally cherished by most of our constitutions, it is deemed improper for officers depending on the Executive of the Union to attempt to control or influence the free exercise of the elective right.

"This I am instructed, therefore, to notify to all officers within my department holding their appointments under the authority of the President directly, and to desire them to notify to all subordinate to them.

"The right of any officer to give his vote at elections as a qualified citizen is not meant to be restrained, nor, however given, shall it have any effect to his prejudice; but it is expected that he will not attempt to influence the votes of others nor take any part in the business of electioneering, that being deemed inconsistent with the spirit of the Constitution and his duties."

That was well said by Thomas Jefferson in 1801 when he was President. It is as sound Government philosophy now, as then.

Relations With Poland

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT R. REYNOLDS

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 10 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 8), 1944

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Our Great Doublecross," recently written by Mr. Frank Waldrop, and published in the Washington Times-Herald.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OUR GREAT DOUBLE-CROSS

(By Frank C. Waldrop)

The No. 1 double-cross for our side in this war of many double dealings is now approaching its climax. Premier Stanislaw Mikolajczyk of Poland is on his way to Moscow, where he will grovel before Stalin as Austria's Premier Dollfus once groveled before Hitler at Berchtesgaden. And the result will be much the same.

Only this time Messrs. Roosevelt and Churchill, instead of shouting their horror, are pushing the victim forward with advice to make the best deal he can, while he can, though the war in Europe is all supposed to have started just to save this particular victim from that particular kind of an end.

The official record of this double-cross can be checked by reference to the Encyclopedia Britannica yearbook for 1940 and in any number of standard reference volumes for the years after that.

It begins with the historical fact that Poland is an essentially Roman Catholic settlement that for about 900 years has faced away from Russia westward. Stalin is now twisting Poland's face around to the east; and if he breaks her neck in the process, so much the better for his purpose.

In the Dark and Middle Ages, before America had been started on her upward way and Britain was still an unimportant island, the Poles were holding the gates of western civilization against eastern barbarism.

They had, for those days, as enlightened and cultivated a government as there was in the world. It became too cultivated, if anything. For as the toughness went out of Poland her less-civilized neighbors ganged up in the latter part of the eighteenth century and partitioned Poland out of existence.

But the Poles were a terrible nuisance to their rulers, and when the great war of 1914–18 came they rebelled in all directions to prove they were still Poland, not pieces of Russia, Prussia, and Austria-Hungary.

Result: The peace treaties of 1918–20 reestablished Poland as an independent nation with definite and respected boundaries. The Poles settled down to keep a balance between their obviously menacing neighbors, Russia and Germany, and prayed for peace.

As Europe boiled up again with the inevitable menaces and threats of war, Poland became the test case of alliances. Other nations stiffened or slackened their attitudes, depending on Poland.

When Hitler opened his 1939 campaign for deals and trades, the Poles were still undecided about how tough to be with him. For they were little and he was big, and who'd help them?

The British and the French politicians went to work on the answer to that one, and Britain's Prime Minister Chamberlain rose in the House of Commons on March 31, 1939, to boast that:

"In the event of any action which clearly threatened Polish independence and which the Polish Government accordingly considered as vital to resist with their national forces, His Majesty's Government would feel themselves bound at once to lend the Polish Government all support in their power. They have given the Polish Government an assurance to that effect.

"I may add that the French Government have authorized to make it plain that they stand in the same position as do His Majesty's Government."

On September 1, 1939, the Germans tested that pledge by invading Poland. Britain and France declared war. On September 17, 1939, Russia invaded Poland, too, and marched clear up to the Bug River, one-third of the way across Poland from the Russian border. Britain and France said nothing.

Many Poles, deceived by Russian propaganda, fled into Russia to escape Hitler, expecting friendly aid. Instead they fled right into concentration camps and before firing squads.

For instance, some 10,000 officers, the kind of men upon whom Poland would have to depend in rebuilding any system of government after this war, disappeared behind barbed wire in the Katyn Forest near Smolensk early in 1940.

In June 1941 Hitler turned on his old pal, Stalin, and eventually the German armies rolled past Smolensk. In April 1943 the Germans announced discovery of mass graves in the Katyn Forest—and in those graves were the 10,000 missing Polish officers.

The Germans blamed the Russians and the Russians blamed the Germans. Then, when Poland's government in exile asked to have the International Red Cross investigate the matter, that gave Stalin the chance he had been looking for. He said the government in exile wasn't representative and instead produced a hand-made Russian puppet outfit in Moscow.

So things remained until last week. Then Russian troops hit the Bug River line in Poland again, and Stalin gave out that this would be the border of the new Poland after this war.

Without asking anybody, he simply let the world know he has annexed the 13,000,000 people and 48 percent of Polish land lying east of the Bug.

Poland's premier, Mikolajczyk, in London, looked to Churchill to see if the 1939 promise means anything now. All he got was a lifted eyebrow. Same from Franklin Delano Roosevelt. The Atlantic Charter counts against Hitler but not against Stalin.

From Stalin he got a crook of the finger to fly to Moscow and sign a deal legalizing the Bug River border line and otherwise acknowledging Uncle Joe is the boss. He is flying.

It is a bitter end to a dirty story. And Franklin Delano Roosevelt's part in the writing of it is plain for all to see and remember.

The Big Issue in 1944

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PAUL W. SHAFER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 10, 1944

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks I include an article by Frank R. Kent, able newspaper columnist, which appeared in the Washington Star Wednesday, August 9:

HILLMAN AND SIX MILLION CAMPAIGN FUND LIKELY TO BE BIG ELECTION ISSUE, SAYS KENT

(By Frank R. Kent)

As the weeks go by it becomes clearer that the Russian-born Mr. Sidney Hillman, with his communistic background and affiliations, his C. I. O. Political Action Committee, his communistic-controlled American Labor Party, and his $6,000,000 fourth-term fund, is the outstanding figure in this campaign, and that he and what he represents are likely to become an outstanding issue.

And they should be. For this is their fight. It has been from the start; it will be to the end. And success will put the forces lined up behind Mr. Hillman in a position to dominance and power such as no one dreamed they could achieve.

For the first time the radical and subversive elements are not only lined up solidly behind a Presidential candidate but, taking practical possession of his party, are making the fight for him. That is not exaggeration; it is a simple statement of the facts.

And when you link them with a Federal machine of 3,500,000 job holders, plus the weight of the Kelly-Hague type of city bosses, the formidable nature of the fourth-term combination can be realized.

That this situation is distasteful and offensive to the great bulk of the American people there can be little doubt. Nor, once clearly comprehended, can there be much question that the reaction would be strong and unfavorable.

TEST OF DEWEY'S ABILITY

The difficulty is to get the facts home to them. This will be the big test of Governor Dewey's ability as a candidate. For, it is accepted that he is going to meet the C. I. O.-Communist combination head on. Not to do so would be stupid as well as craven and Governor Dewey is neither.

As every vote the C. I. O. can influence and every Communist in the country is pro-Roosevelt anyhow, it is clear he can lose no votes by a bold challenge. On the contrary, if his challenge is strong enough and his attack skillful enough, there is no other way in which he can gain as many votes.

Particularly will this be true if, as now seems gratifyingly certain, the German collapse comes within a short time. That, to a considerable degree, would eliminate the surface excuse for the fourth-term attempt. Certainly, it would diminish the effectiveness of the Commander in Chief pose and make it easier to gain popular consideration for vital domestic issues.

Thus Governor Dewey's chances to promote his own political prospects and at the same time serve the Nation would be enhanced. But, it is no easy job ahead of him. The publicity and propaganda facilities of this administration and its supporting agencies are the greatest that have ever been behind a presidential candidate.

The C. I. O., itself, has one of the largest, best equipped and financed publicity divisions ever created. In addition, the number of commentators and broadcasters deeply committed to the fourth term has markedly increased within the year.

The strategy of these is to minimize the political importance of the C. I. O.; to deplore the charges that it is the chief Roosevelt sponsor and backer; to deny that it is saturated with Communism; and to depict those who see in its success this time a grave menace to the national interests as Republicans, or reactionaries or "Roosevelt haters" or as inspired by some selfish or sinister motive or as seeing ghosts or having nightmares.

That is the party line. That is the way the administration has met every criticism in the past and that is the way it will meet this attack. In addition, Mr. Hillman is being painted as a gentle, lovable, and unsophisticated character whose sole desire is for the general welfare, instead of as the shrewd, ruthless, hard-boiled, self-seeking labor politician he really is.

ANSWERABLE CASE

To offset this, Governor Dewey has many facts with which to build up an unanswerable case For example, he can show beyond dispute that the C. I. O. and the Communists started the fourth-term ball rolling; that Mr Hillman and his P. A. C. have shoved Chairman Hannegan and the Democratic National Committee aside and are really running the campaign. He can show the closeness of the C. I. O.-Roosevelt link.

He can show that Mr. Hillman calls the White House often by phone and frequently confers with the Commander in Chief. He can show, too, that Mr. Hillman was strong enough at the Democratic convention to turn down Justice James F. Byrnes, whom Mr. Roosevelt had indorsed for the Vice Presidential nomination, and that the reason Mr. Roosevelt turned to TRUMAN after he had ditched Mr. WALLACE was because no one not acceptable to Hillman could be named.

He can show also by the recent primaries in Missouri, where Senator BENNETT CLARK ascribed his defeat to the C. I. O., and in New York City the degree to which Mr. Hillman, working through the Political Action Committee, and the American Labor Party, which he heads, and backed by the Communists, is taking over the Democratic Party.

There are many other facts Mr. Dewey can bring out, including the unsavory character and record of the leaders in some of the unions for which Mr. Hillman now speaks and with whom he has been closely associated.

All this ought to be pie for Governor Dewey. It is an ideal case for a prosecuting attorney and he is one of the best prosecuting attorneys in the country. All he needs to win this case is the unclouded attention of the American people.

Address by Brigadier General Tyler Before the National Rivers and Harbors Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HUGH A. BUTLER

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, August 11 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 8), 1944

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address by Brig. Gen. Max C. Tyler, president, Mississippi River Commission, delivered before the National Rivers and Harbor's Congress, New Orleans, La., July 27, 1944.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

When your able and accomplished secretary invited me to speak at this meeting he told me I could talk about anything provided I confined my remarks to the Mississippi River. It is difficult to say anything about the Mississippi that has not been said before. The river has long been famed in song and story and is the subject of books too numerous to mention. In the span of little more than a hundred years the alluvial valley has been forcibly wrested from domination by the river and developed from a wilderness of forest and swamp into a veritable empire. The record of that struggle and achievement fills shelves in our public libraries and stands out in the files of the press. This thriving and romantic metropolis, New Orleans, with its splendid harbor, where ride the ships from all the seas, occupies a larger place in our literature than does any other American city. I can add little to the voluminous record.

However, since for several years it has been my duty and privilege to work with the people of the alluvial valley and the port of New Orleans toward the solution of their navigation and flood-control problems, I would like to spend the time allotted me in a brief résumé of the accomplishments in this region of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress, the Mississippi Valley Flood Control Association, the Mississippi Valley Association, the Ohio Valley Improvement Association, the Gulf Intracoastal Canal Association, the levee boards in the valley and your predecessor associations and groups of able public-spirited men.

The best way I know by which to assess the value of the work of an individual or an association is to compare conditions before and after the individual or association got on the job. So let us briefly review the record on the Mississippi River and at the port of New Orleans.

A hundred years ago steamboat navigation on the Mississippi River was a hazardous business at good stages and impossible during the lowest water. The alluvial valley was largely a wilderness, subject to flooding whenever the river went overbank. The flood of 1844 was the highest of record in the upper valley up to that time and many towns below Memphis were under water with heavy loss of property and some loss of life. New Orleans was a growing town and port with plenty of water down to the mouth of the river but with entirely inadequate depths over all of the bars. The hope of ocean shipping interests was for the maintenance of a dependable depth of 18 feet on the bar at Southwest Pass.

The first difficulty to be overcome by the advocates of the Federal improvement of harbors and rivers in the interest of commerce was a legal one.

On June 11, 1844, President Tyler vetoed an act making appropriations for the improvement of certain harbors and rivers on the ground that such action was unconstitutional. He argued that the States, in ratifying the Constitution, had not given to the United States the right to improve harbors or rivers within their borders.

However, at the same time he approved an appropriation for the improvement of the Mississippi River, stating in his approval that "The Mississippi occupies a footing altogether different from the rivers and water courses of the different States. No one State or any number of States can exercise any other jurisdiction over it than for the punishment of crimes and the service of civil process. It belongs to no particular State or States, but by common right, by express reservation, to all the States. It is reserved as a great common highwy for the commerce of the whole country. * * * The United States, therefore, is charged with its improvement for the benefit of all, and the appropriation of governmental means to its improvement becomes indispensably necessary for the good of all."

On August 3, 1846, President James K. Polk sent a veto message to Congress refusing his approval of a bill appropriating $1,376,450 for some forty-odd rivers and harbors improvements in which he stated that such a law would open the Federal Treasury almost beyond restraint and concluding with this statement:

"The Constitution has not, in my judgment, conferred upon the Federal Government the power to construct works of internal improvement within the States, or to appropriate money from the Treasury for that purpose."

Some 18 months later, in vetoing a similar bill, President Polk reaffirmed his belief that such appropriations were unconstitutional. In that message he called attention to the provision in the Constitution which provides that "no States shall, without the consent of Congress, to lay any duty of tonnage." The practice had been, he said, for the States, with the consent of Congress, to lay tonnage duties for clearing harbors, improving rivers, and other purposes. This practice, President Polk told the Congress, was, and I quote, "a safe provision for the improvement of harbors and rivers in the reserved powers of the States."

All this may have been good legal reasoning and safe, but it did not help our young and expanding country to get better transportation, which it had to have, nor did it meet with the approval of the leaders of the people and the people themselves.

They apparently did not think highly of the interminable delays which would be involved in independent action by many States, nor did they see how a uniform system of improvements of harbors and rivers could ever result from State legislation. They proceeded to do something about it.

Two great river improvement conventions met in Memphis in 1845. Six States were represented at the first, and there were 500 delegates representing 12 States at the second. John C. Calhoun presided. In 1847 another river-and-harbor convention assembled at Chicago. It is stated that Abraham Lincoln and Horace Greeley were present. A convention met at Burlington, Iowa, in 1851. The requests and recommendations of these conventions seem to have been directed at the improvement of the Passes, so as to allow vessels of deeper draft to reach New Orleans from the Gulf, snagging and improvement of the river channel so that navigation would be practicable the year round, the removal or bypassing of obstructions to navigation, like the Rock Island Rapids, the falls in the Ohio at Louisville, and the great raft in Red River, and the prevention of overflow by crevasses, floods, and freshets whereby the fertile lands along the banks of the river were damaged.

Apparently these various conventions brought some results, for we find that the Congress made an appropriation in 1852 of $75,000 for opening a ship channel at the passes of sufficient capacity to accommodate the wants of commerce, the work to be done by contract. A mixed board of one Navy officer and three Army engineer officers was convened to decide how the appropriation should be applied. The board reported that with this small sum nothing more could be done than to stir up the bottom in the channel. A contract was entered into with the Towboat Association under which the bar channel at Southwest Pass was dragged and harrowed and a depth of 18 feet maintained for an entire year. You will notice that the appropriation was made first, without engineering advice, and then the engineers were directed to find a way to spend the money.

The 1852 board reported that there were several methods by which the ship channel might be improved or obtained, and stated them in the order of their simplicity, ease of work, and initial cost, as follows:

1. Stirring up the material of the channel bed by various means so that the river currents might carry away such material while in suspension.

2. Assisting the stirring method by dredging and carrying the dredged materials away by barges, etc., for special deposit outside the channel.

3. By narrowing, revetting, and jettying the mouths of the passes selected for ship channels and then closing the other passes.

4. In case the above methods prove unsuccessful, then by connecting the deep river channel at some suitable point between New Orleans and the passes by a ship canal to deep water in the adjoining gulf.

The board recommended that these methods be tried in the order stated. The first and second methods were considered doubtful as to permanent results, but worth trying.

The 18-foot channel secured with the appropriation of 1852 having disappeared, Congress in 1856 appropriated $330,000 for further work and another contract was made with the Towboat Association.

An interesting comment on the plan of securing a channel by dragging and harrowing is contained in a letter of that distinguished soldier and engineer, Gen. G. T. Beauregard, to the president of the Chamber of Commerce of New Orleans and dated May 29, 1852. General Beauregard was then a brevet major and lieutenant in the Corps of Engineers stationed in New Orleans on the construction of the customhouse. He wrote:

"Having always taken a lively interest in the important question of deepening the channel over the bar at the mouth of the Mississippi, which has become of such vital necessity to the trade and future prosperity of this city, made still more apparent by the memorial which the chamber of commerce has lately addressed to Congress, and in which it calls for an annual appropriation of from $100,000 to $150,000 'to induce parties owning steamboats to contract to keep the channel open by constantly raking up the mud, so that the current of the river can diffuse and carry it forward into deeper water' I have thought that a more general phraseology would have answered better, as it would have permitted other parties who are desirous of attaining the same end by other means to have put in their propositions."

Major Beauregard then went on to show why the dragging and harrowing of the bar channel would not be successful, and then continued as follows:

"But the question naturally presents itself then, Is there no system by which the obstructions of the bar can be removed? I am of the opinion that there is a most certain and infallible one, because founded on the true principles of hydrostatics and the invariable laws of nature; in proof of which I submit to your consideration the following proposition.

"I hereby offer to enter into a contract with the city, the State, or the General Government to deepen the channel over one of the bars to the depth of at least 20 feet by the lead at low water, over the shallowest part of it, and wide enough for a towboat with one ship on each side to pass at all times; and to maintain this condition of the bar for the period of 25 or 50 years for the sum of $100,000 a year. The first sum to be paid only the moment I shall have succeeded in obtaining the depth and width above stated; but should I be able to obtain and to maintain at least 25 feet instead of 20 feet, I will then be paid annually the sum of $125,000 instead of $100,000.

"By the above it is seen that no risk is to be encountered by the General Government in case of nonsuccess, whereas should I succeed, as I think there is every probability of my doing, the benefit to be derived from it, not only by New Orleans but by the whole western country, will more than counterbalance a hundredfold the above annual appropriation.

"I have submitted my plan to both professional and practical men, and I have not yet met with any serious objections to it.

"Of course it is hardly necessary for me to add that in order to enter into a contract with the General Government I should have to resign my commission in the Army; but I feel so confident of success that I would not hesitate a moment to do it."

There can be no doubt that General Beauregard based his proposition on the use of jetties. The similarity of his proposal to the one submitted by James B. Eads in 1874 and written into a contract in 1875 for the construction of jetties at South Pass is striking, to say the least.

The War between the States stopped all progress, not only in the hit-and-miss kind of work authorized but in the development of an orderly system for the initiation, investigation, and authorization of improvements of harbors and rivers.

I have gone into this somewhat ancient history to show that up to the time of the War between the States those who worked to obtain harbor and river improvements had many difficulties to overcome. The Congress had not yet worked out a procedure providing for a careful engineering investigation before adoption of projects and appropriation of funds.

At the close of that war river and harbor conventions were again convened. There was one in 1866 and another in 1867. We find a board of engineers recommending canals around the Rock Island Rapids and the Des Moines Rapids in 1866. The conventions apparently were making progress in getting engineering investigations and reports, and the basis for an orderly procedure was beginning to evolve.

Gradually the Congress adopted the policy of calling for thorough engineering examinations and reports before adopting projects for the improvement of harbors and rivers. Finally, in 1902, the Congress set up the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors and required that all reports made by the Engineer Department on improvements of rivers and harbors be reviewed by that Board before being forwarded to Congress by the Chief of Engineers. So in the last 42 years river and harbor investigations, authorizations, and appropriations have followed an orderly system designed to safeguard the public interest.

The development of a national policy for dealing with floods was much slower than for the improvement of harbors and rivers. The first attempt of national legislation dealing with floods in this valley was by the Swamp Land Acts of 1849 and 1850, which granted to the several States all unsold swamp and overflowed lands within their limits. Funds accruing from the sale of these lands by the States were to be applied to drainage, reclamation and flood control projects. Louisiana, Mississippi, Arkansas and Missouri organized offices for the sale of the lands and appointed commissioners for the construction of levees. This attempt to obtain flood protection failed, largely through lack of comprehensive planning of the works among the different States and districts. As a national flood control measure the swamp laws were a failure.

The War between the States put a stop to all levee construction. After that war levee districts, organized under State laws, carried on the work with funds obtained from bond issues. Gradually by extension of district levee systems a semblance of a connected or continuous levee line for each major basin in the valley was secured.

Congress organized the Mississippi River Commission in 1879 and directed it to make surveys looking to the control of the river from Lake Itasca to the mouth for the improvement of navigation and the protection of the people living in the valley. Although the problems of navigation and flood control are inextricably related, the old question of constitutional authority kept the Congress from appropriating funds for flood control works except when they could be shown to be useful for the benefit of navigation. Consequently, until a more liberal view of the authority of the Government became current, the Commission built only such levees as could be assumed to assist in improving the river channel.

Beginning in 1917 a broader view of the responsibility and authority of the United States was taken by Congress, and in that year the expenditure of Federal funds directly for the construction of levees was authorized on the basis of the Federal Government paying two-thirds of the construction cost while local interests paid one-third and furnished the levee rights-of-way. A period of extensive levee construction and enlargement followed and by 1927 there was a general belief that the valley had been made reasonably safe. Then came the record-breaking flood of 1927 to breach the defenses all up and down the valley.

The congressional delegations of the valley States, the levee boards, State engineering organizations, the Mississippi Valley Association, Mississippi Valley Flood Control Association, rivers and harbors associations, civil organizations in the valley generally and the press by a united effort convinces the public that flood control in the alluvial valley and navigation on the river constitute a single great problem of such magnitude that it can be dealt with only by the United States Government with the assistance of the local people and their constituted flood-control organizations. As a result the existing project was authorized by the Flood Control Act of 1928. Since then all flood control and navigation works have been built by the engineer department.

The project adopted in 1928 was a sound engineering plan. It visualized the use of all the engineering methods applicable to the problem in the valley. The levees were to be raised and strengthened, the river channel was to be improved in its alinement and stabilized in order to improve navigation and to prevent destruction of the levees by its meanderings. Greater floods than those which could be carried between the main line levees were to discharge their excess waters through floodways.

The project has been amended from time to time as new conditions have warranted.

Leaders in the Congress from the valley, assisted by the flood-control organizations, levee boards, and the public, have seen to it that the Congress has been kept aware of the necessity for adequate appropriations. As a result excellent progress has been made in the construction of the project works in the last 15 years.

This organization and the others I have referred to with which it works so closely can take great pride in what has been accomplished for navigation and flood control through the individual and combined efforts of all. You have been responsible in a large measure for the establishment of an orderly and sound procedure for the initiation of river and harbor works. Under that system, here in the alluvial valley, substantial defenses have been raised against floods. Over 3,000,000 people live behind those defenses. There are 35 States in the Union, each of which has a population less than that of the alluvial valley. The existing levee system affords substantial protection to 2,500 miles of main-line railways and to 2,000 miles of main-line highways. It protects a large proportion of the country's cotton acreage and the sugar industry of Louisiana as well as its oil and sulfur developments.

The voice of the steamboat is again heard in the land. The all-year channel of 9 feet or better north of Baton Rouge is carrying many times more tonnage than was ever moved in the romantic packet days. The channel is so well buoyed and lighted that navigation at night for the largest tows of upward of 15,000 tons is the rule, even at the lowest stages.

The heaviest movements are in gasoline, crude oil and oil products, and sulphur upbound to war industries in the upper valleys and steel and general freight down-bound. One of the contributions of the river to the war has been that of permitting all inland boat-building yards to work to capacity in turning out war vessels. Many hundreds of these vessels have reached New Orleans and gone across the oceans of the world from yards on the Lakes, on the Ohio, the Illinois, the upper Mississippi, and the Missouri.

In recent years there have been several reports to the Congress for the improvement of the port of New Orleans, the Gulf Intracoastal Canal, and the flood protection of the alluvial valley. All have been approved by the Chief of Engineers. Some already have been approved by Congress and the work completed. Others are included in legislation which has been passed by the House of Representatives and is pending in the Senate.

These reports include provisions for increasing the depth in Southwest Pass from 35 to 40 feet; widening and deepening the Gulf Intracoastal Canal west of New Orleans to 125 feet by 12 feet; routing of the intracoastal canal east of New Orleans from the Industrial Canal to the Rigolets; lease of the Industrial Canal and lock to the Government in order that it be operated free of tolls; the construction of a new lock for the Intracoastal Canal to supplement Harvey lock; the elimination of the Eudora floodway through southeast Arkansas and northeast Louisiana from the project for flood control of the Mississippi River with a corresponding revision of main-line levee grades; protection of the Yazoo backwater area and part of the Red River backwater area from all but the great floods, and, finally, a report submitted by the Mississippi River Commission in February last recommending stabilization of the channel of the Mississippi River from Cairo to Baton Rouge for the purpose of maintaining the reduction in flood heights obtained by channel realinement between 1932 and 1943, protecting the levee lines from set-backs and the consequent abandonment of the best lands in the valley, provision of secure industrial sites on the river, and, as a byproduct of this work for flood-control purposes, an increase in the navigable depth at low water from a minimum of 9 feet now maintained to a minimum of 12 feet.

You will see only a part of this great river harbor while here in New Orleans. It extends from the Head of Passes to Baton Rouge, 230 miles, and all that distance has depths adequate for the safe passage of the largest cargo carriers in the world. Along the banks there is unlimited room for industrial development. The 30-foot channel maintained in South Pass and the 35 foot channel maintained in Southwest Pass, together with the wharves maintained by State and private interests, make this one of the great seaports of the world for which no apologies need be made on the grounds of safety, efficiency, or economy.

While the location of New Orleans on a natural deep water river harbor has permitted its development as a major world port for overseas commerce, its location at the crossing of the river and the Gulf-Intracoastal Canal is making it also of first-rate importance as a harbor in the great inland waterway system extending from Pittsburgh, Chicago, Minneapolis, and Omaha to Florida and the Mexican border. Cities at the crossings of much used trade routes have always prospered. The recommendation for the construction of the Intracoastal Canal west of New Orleans was based on assurances that it would be used by not less than 500,000 tons of commerce annually. Last month it carried more than 1,200,000 tons through Harvey Lock or at the rate of 14,000,000 tons per annum.

When this war is finally won, there will be lots of arguments as to who won it, the Army, the Navy, the Air Forces, industry, agriculture, the railroads, etc. That question will never be settled to anyone's satisfaction for it will have taken the efforts of all.

There is one statement, however, which this organization can make without fear of contradiction. Without the excellent harbors on our seacoasts we could not have built and sailed the ships to carry our forces overseas and to supply them there. Without these ports we could not have built the largest Navy ever to sail the seas. Without the harbors on the Great Lakes and the improved channels between the Lakes and our improved inland rivers we could not have produced the steel to build our ships, our engines of war and munitions. And those harbors and channels might never have been in existence today had not organizations like yours insisted that the welfare of the Nation demanded their construction.

This organization has great influence. It also has great responsibilities.

The purpose of this meeting of the Rivers and Harbors Congress is clearly stated in your President's call for a special session.

The opponents of coastwise and inland water transportation are better organized and more liberally financed than they have been for many years. Able men represent them at all hearings of committees of the Congress where they oppose the adoption of all new projects or the enlargement and betterment of existing projects. They skillfully use all their old arguments against the value of water transport to the general public and some new ones. Their purpose is to indoctrinate the public with the idea that, in general, publicly financed water routes of trade are economically unsound and that privately financed railroads and pipe lines can do everything the waterways can do, quicker, better, and cheaper.

Your organization has been able, therefore, to meet such attacks. The fights you have won in the past were mere skirmishes compared to the battle just ahead of you.

Neither your organization, nor any other, can hope to win such a battle unless your position is thoroughly sound. To take the stand that all water transportation is cheap and economical and that all harbor developments are necessary and desirable in the public interest is just as unsound as is the claim of your enemies that all inland water transportation is unduly subsidized, circuitous, slow, and uneconomical. There are waterway projects which can be supported by facts, figures, and costs which cannot be attacked successfully or even shaken. There are proposals for Federal expenditures on harbors, rivers, and canals which cannot stand a searching analysis. Those are the proposals which give the opponents of Federal financing of waterway improvements their strongest arguments and widest publicity. No association, no group, can support such unsound proposals, or even borderline cases, without risking the loss of public confidence.

The record of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress of backing only those projects which have stood the test of a thorough engineering and economic investigation is the basic reason for its great success.

A Year of Decision

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ANTON J. JOHNSON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 10, 1944

Mr. ANTON J. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include a radio speech delivered by my colleague, Hon. EVERETT M. DIRKSEN, over N. B. C. on June 20, 1944, entitled "A Year of Decision":

These are anxious and eventful days. They are eventful days in world history. They are anxious days for young men on freedom's front and for their kinfolks back home. Each day we take account of what is happening on the invasion front and the progress of young Americans far afield who are moving in the direction of victory.

Grim as the thought may be we cannot escape the feeling that these are the last days on earth for many young men.

In the deathless language of Colonel MacCrea who left for us the touching and poetic legacy of Flanders' Fields we think of young soldiers who were nurtured and suckled on the bosom of this Republic as living, throbbing vital young men who "Short days ago, lived, felt dawn, saw sunset glow, loved, and were loved," and now they are engaged in grim and undramatic business to which they freely give their all.

Where they are on the battle front is but an extension of the home front where we are.

We cannot ponder their absence on a mission of victory and freedom without breathing a gracious prayer that they may manfully endure the hard tasks which lie ahead.

We cannot ponder their absence without experiencing a new burst of faith, a new hope for the future of this world, and a new reverence for the obligations which are ours on the home front.

It is for us to invest the victory that they will soon achieve with a durable purpose by a complete and moral worthiness for the sacrifices which they now make.

Let there be devotion and humility in our hearts this day and every day and give us a new appreciation of the price of freedom.

II

The costly sacrifices which young men are making on distant battlefields should enlarge our own sense of political responsibility as nothing else could do.

Political liberty and the precious right to choose those who shall make and administer and interpret the laws is an essential part of the whole structure of freedom.

What a rich and eloquent testimony it is to the true grandeur of our system of government and to the spirit of our people that in the midst of a far-flung conflict, we can have an election to fully assess and pass judgment upon those who are in authority, to estimate the merits of those who present themselves for high office and to determine who shall direct the affairs of communities, States, and the Nation in the years ahead.

These are precious rights and with them go great obligations.

The same spirit which bids us pay more taxes, buy more bonds, work harder, and do our full share for victory and freedom must also urge a larger and more sustained interest in the decisions, the leaders and the policies which will be presented to the people in this year of decision.

It would be plain stark tragedy if we on the home front fail or neglect to use the rights on the home front for which young men fight and die on the battle front.

In a small way, we can requite our obligations by study and discussion of the issues both foreign and domestic, by earnest consideration of those who will be selected for the roles of political leadership, and by letting nothing short of the most valid reason deter us from exercising the right to vote in this eventful year.

III

Now, permit me a few personal observations.

In November of 1943, about two score Members of the Congress urged me to seek some recognition on the Republican national ticket.

Perhaps it is not unduly immodest to hope and believe that in taking this action, these Members of Congress were moved by the belief that one who had served for 12 years in Congress and who may have developed some familiarity with the highways of a complex and sensitive government structure, might add strength to the Republican cause in the days ahead. Because of their action, I felt an obligation to make a campaign and visit in many sections of our land.

There has been opportunity to journey into more than one-half of the States of the Union and I can report that it has been an enriching and stimulating adventure.

It gave me a chance to visit with their people back home and to give them an appraisal of the diligence, the earnestness, and the loyalty which Members of Congress have brought to their task and to the problems with which we have wrestled.

It supplied a chance to audit the thoughts, the hopes, and the reflections of people everywhere and to find inspiration in the resolve and quiet courage with which they keep the vigil on the home front.

It offered an opportunity to see and to find new hope in the incredible genius and versatility of this Republic.

Above all else, it afforded a chance to enjoy a rich fellowship with Americans everywhere who in their hearts and souls still keep step with the music of the Union. Many of them were the fathers and mothers of young men who are this very day fighting upon the soil of the Old World to combat the brutal idea that might makes right and to restore peace, serenity, good living, and sweetness to a world which for generations has been steeped in bitterness and unrest.

What an adventure of the spirit that really was, for in the people one finds no dreamy despair nor the dross of defeatism.

The refining fires of war have burned away whatever of dross there might have been and left only a quiet resolve that calls for audacious action, for victory, for the crown of peace, for a new spirit of amity in the world, and for a maintenance of that freedom for which young men are this day being bruised in body and mind.

Truly, there was about all this a majestic adventure like the stars whispering to the soul, and so to those whose faith and esteem made this possible, I shall be ever grateful.

IV

Let us go back for a moment to these good people in every section of the land.

What do they say and for what do they hope in the days ahead?

In their questions, one could easily trace a common pattern which is a gracious testimony to the fact that to know our country, one must look into the common heart.

When will the war end?

When will peace come?

When will our boys come back?

It's not just, "When will the boys come back?"

It's when will "our" boys come back. In that one pronoun, you see the kinship of Main Street with Cherbourg, Anzio, Pearl Harbor, New Guinea, and with the struggle which engrosses the attention of the whole world.

Will we achieve a peace this time which will have a chance to endure?

What are they fighting for and when it's over, what will be the effect upon our future?

These are the thoughts and hopes with which we must deal as each political party prepares to make a bid for the trusteeship of power for the next 4 years.

Speaking as a Republican, what is in the common heart should suggest to us that the spirit in which we seek responsibility and power is everything.

It should suggest that as we frame politics and select leaders, that we be moved by a constant courage which is worthy of the millions of young Americans who are this day on freedom's frontier.

It should suggest that the danger and jeopardy to which our men in the service are exposed shall have a value and that if the way to the stars is hard, let us go the hard way if it is right.

It suggests that the course which we chart for the future should become a pin-up charter in every American heart.

V

But let's go back to these good people in all parts of the land who think, who hope, who ask questions, and whose hearts are prayerfully attuned to the undramatic business now at hand.

"When will our boys come home?" they ask.

That blessed day will come.

A telegram or telephone call will one day announce to a proud father and anxious mother that a soldier son is back in the land of his birth and soon he will be home.

What preparations there will be to give him a welcome that befits a hero and what anxious hours and days must be endured until familiar steps upon the stoop will unmistakably declare that he is surely back home.

Then the joys of homecoming will be complete.

A mother in the hard and vigorous embrace of a soldier son. A son encircled by the loving arms of a mother who day in and day out prayed for his safe return, but also prayed that he manfully perform the tasks that were assigned by the cause of freedom.

What a recital it will be! What adventures he experienced from the day he enlisted or was inducted until that glad day when a deafening stillness was heard round the world and peace had returned to assuage the long and engulfing and costly bitterness which afflicted mankind.

With drama and gesture he will tell where he was and what he did. It will be a narrative of high service and an accounting of what he did for the cause of freedom and the American system of living.

Then, of course, comes the inevitable $64 question. What's been going on back home while I was gone?

Then comes the time for us on the home front to give an accounting of our stewardship.

VI

That question from a million lips is the key to the real issue before us, and it can be phrased in the form of a question: "What will they find over here when it's over over there?"

From the statements and speeches which one encounters from time to time there is the implication that unity and morale are in issue. They are not issues. They are duties which every American gladly embraces. Morale is the spiritual reserve upon which we must draw as the casualty lists throw their lengthening shadow upon the land.

It will be said and is being said that victory is the issue. It is a bit strange that such an issue should even be suggested, because victory is the grim unfinished business of the whole Nation.

It is said that peace and cooperation are in issue. How can there be an issue in the great spiritual hope which moves every thinking person to seek a workable pattern which carries with it the assurance that peace will have a full and fair opportunity to endure, and that young men will not again be bruised and broken upon the altar of war.

These are not issues.

These are but duties upon the "must" list of every American. Unity, morale, victory, peace, and cooperation are common responsibilities. They are but duties for the task force on the home front.

The real issue in this year of decision will be simply this: What will they find over here when it's over over there?

Will the hopes and prayers which have been uttered in the foxholes on the battle front be rendered into ashes by the ideologies and policies which come from the foxholes on the home front?

Will the American system of living, which rests upon the morals of individualism become the victim of a pious collectivism, and will freedom be just a word or a way of life?

To abandon even a small part of the freedom we have known and which accounts for the greatness and leadership of this land is to abandon the greatest spiritual adventure of civilization.

Without freedom there can be no full healing at home.

Without freedom there can be no strength to bring succor to a confused world.

On of our greatest attributes is our power of example to bewildered people everywhere.

As we boldly announce our devotion to the four freedoms, shall we set a dismal example for other peoples in an hour of doubt and confusion by departing in the slightest degree from the ideal for which we fight?

If so, we may well ask why young men fight and die.

To the Congress, the President in his annual message spoke of a second Bill of Rights.

How can there be a second Bill of Rights if the first Bill of Rights is impaired?

How can there be security unless the freedom of action and the incentives to achievement are kept intact to provide that security?

Long ago we had a legacy of freedom and today it is in issue. When we find the answer to the question of whether collectivism or individual freedom shall prevail in this Republic, we shall the better know whether victory had a durable purpose.

VII

Conflict today is in the realm of ideas as much as in the field of parties and personalities.

Those who have labored long and earnestly in the national scene and have had a chance to see and to assess the forces which are at work, are fully familiar with the fact that collectivism is on the march. It is more than a mere footnote to economic discussion. It is no longer heresy but accepted gospel in high places.

More and more, we see the effort to chain the individual and individual rights to collective and group action, and when it becomes complete, what happens to freedom and the moral basis of the American system.

Collectivism in which the individual is considered as but a part of the mass or group is but another name for totalitarianism and if that should be the destiny of our Nation, what a mass frustration we would see in days to come as bewildered young men, inspired by the pride which will be justly theirs for having achieved victory, peace, and freedom for other peoples of the earth, should find that freedom foreclosed at home.

In the record of the immediate past one may easily read the march of collectivism, control, and management by government, and one may also read the tragic impairment of those institutions which have always been regarded as the safeguards of freedom, and that record will be none too reassuring as we re-echo the question, "What will they find over here when it's over over there?"

VIII

That record needs but brief highlighting on this occasion because it is so familiar to all. What is this collective philosophy of government we hear so much about? It is but another name for totaltarianism. It means that the individual must be hitched to the group. Whatever is good for the group, must be good for him. His individuality, his personality, his rights are of secondary importance. Human dignity is of but secondary importance. Yet all these are the very essence of freedom.

To bring about the collective way of life in this land, all power must sooner or later be concentrated in the Federal Government. Those institutions which for a century and a half we come to regard as the safeguards of that freedom must be modified, weakened, impaired or destroyed.

Nearly 10 years ago, the apostles of the new order have freely stated that there must be commitments to those changes in our institutions wherever necessary to bring about an expression of our national aims.

This is precisely what has happened during the last decade. This is the pattern which is so clearly discernible.

The forgotten man became the common man and it became the purpose of government to keep him common.

To make life more abundant, freedom was to become less abundant and to bring this about, there must be political weapons. These weapons have been forged over a period of years.

IX

Consider the growth, the centralization and the ruthlessness of Federal power.

It begins with the delegation of broad powers to the Executive and the issuance of more than 3,600 Executive orders in the first 10 years of the present administration.

There is the unending stream of directives and orders and the building of a structure of administrative law which prompted one administrator to say: "We do make the law."

There is a wilderness of alphabetical agencies, so baffling and varied in character and number as to bewilder citizens and public servants alike.

There is a staggering public civil pay roll of nearly 3,000,000 persons, half of whom are not directly engaged in the war effort and 80 percent of whom are scattered through the 48 States of the Union. There is the subtle management of public opinion by more than 30,000 full-time and part-time persons who annually release hundreds of millions of pieces of literature to keep the people submissive.

There has been the use of more than one-half billion in blank checks by the Chief Executive.

There is the calculated erosion of the law-making power of the Congress by means of Executive orders.

There was the noxious scheme to pack the Supreme Court for the purpose of securing packed decisions.

There was the shameful use of relief funds with which to debauch free elections.

There is a host of financial experts, who because of an enormous debt, much of which was created before the demands of war began, are now suggesting that our fiscal solvency demands that controls continue and that they become the managers of the people's business.

There is the constant effort to keep emergency agencies alive, despite the fact that the emergencies have long since ceased to exist.

There is the habit of taking objectionable personnel from agencies liquidated by Congress and transferring them to other agencies that their bold radicalism might continue to ferment in government.

There is the practice of agencies created by the Congress, prohibiting their employees from testifying before courts or committees of Congress concerning the contents of their files.

There is the coddling of radicals in various agencies of Government to such an extent that Congress felt impelled to exercise its power over the purse to dislodge them

The Price Control Act bears living witness to the fact that the jurisdiction of Federal courts has been destroyed in order to achieve an economic objective, and there is the amazing thing that groups clamor for a continuation of this destruction of the power of the courts.

What is all this but part of the design to centralize power, destroy government by the people, and thus destroy individual freedom.

There has been a slow and steady expansion of the commerce clause of the Constitution to the point where States become but convenient geographical designations for tourists.

By this expansion janitors and charwomen in a Pennsylvania office building come within the scope of the Federal Wage-Hour Act only because certain products manufactured in that building move in interstate commerce.

A modest Illinois dairy, producing and selling milk wholly within the State, must knuckle under a Federal order because the milk which it produces and sells "might" come in competition with other milk which moves in interstate commerce.

When the Federal Government becomes so powerful that all human endeavor becomes subject to Federal law, what happens to our Federal Union? What happens to the grass roots? What happens to freedom as we knew it?

For a decade there has been an erosion of the law-making powers of the Congress.

The planners are steadily planning for continued controls which lodges in the hands of bureaucrats, complete powers over the people.

The Congress is regarded as but a convenient appendage of government to provide authority and funds for such plans.

When it displays some independence of spirit, it is forthwith castigated and villified that the duly elected representatives might be demeaned in the esteem of the public.

It had its culmination in the calculated assault upon Congress by the Executive, which reached such proportions that the majority leader of the Senate displayed his anger and resentment by proclaiming on the floor of that body: "This is a calculated and deliberate assault upon the legislative integrity of every Member of Congress of the United States."

When the courts and the Congress became the object of attack by the executive branch to bring about personal government in this Nation, what happens to freedom, to balanced government and to government by the people?

It finds its ultimate expression in the stateord of the past, one can see the pattern for planned, controlled, managed, centralized government and our rapid march toward collectivism.

It finds its ultimate expression in the statement of the Attorney General that "No business or property is immune from Presidential order in time of war."

As one appraises the power of the governmental weapons which have been forged in the fires of a collective philosophy and estimates the determination of those who want to substitute the collective system of life for the American way, he can only re-echo that question which has been asked countless times by those who are fighting for freedom, "What will they find over here when it's over over there?"

Sometime ago, Senator O'MAHONEY, of Wyoming, wrote an article which was widely publicized and which bore this challenging title "America Is Being Made Over—And We Won't Like It."

We know the American system is being made over and we won't like it.

It is being recast in the image of what in 1935, Dr. Rexford Tugwell called disciplined democracy.

Control is the essence of discipline.

When people learn to dislike it enough, the soul will stir and then we must again go through the agony of recapturing freedom no matter what the price.

The spread of collectivism can be arrested and we can again return to the high road of freedom and individualism at the end of which there lies the greatest glory of this Republic. Somehow, one cannot escape the conviction that from ringside seats we are watching the quiet destruction of the Republic, the abandonment of the American way of living, and the impairment of freedom in a turbulent period when young men die for freedom. It is not a pleasant thought.

The very thought should move us to utter two prayerful hopes. The first hope must be for them—the young men who are away—that they may manfully pursue the grim task that destiny has assigned. The second hope is that when it's over over there, they may return to find us practicing the very freedom for which they fight.

We the people shall have full opportunity to pass judgment on all this in November of 1944. Truly, this is a year of decision.

The Greatest Homecoming of All

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, August 11 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 8), 1944

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a homecoming address entitled "The Greatest Homecoming of All," delivered by me at Shiocton, Wis., July 22, 1944.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Fellow Americans, it is a great privilege to be here with you today at this homecoming. It is a great privilege to be a part of such a splendid tradition as the homecoming celebration.

That word homecoming is rich with meaning. Here in this land of ours, it usually means that relatives, old neighbors, old friends, playmates of school days—folks who have left the home territory for other parts—these relatives and old friends all come back to their own home community.

The renewal of old friendships—the swapping of yarns about old times—these are all part of homecoming celebrations. The institution is part of the American customs—the American folklore—the American way of life.

From communities such as Shiocton, men and women have traveled far—but always they have retained in their hearts a warm love and affection for the place of their birth and for the home of their early years.

Now in recent years, particularly, men and women from communities such as Shiocton—all over this great land of ours—have traveled far to other lands and to other peoples.

In the windows of the Shioctons of America, there are small blue stars, and sometimes gold stars—symbolizing a loved one who has traveled far from his native home.

Behind these windows in American homes, and behind the little gold stars and the little blue stars are the mothers, the fathers, the wives, the sweethearts, the brothers and the sisters and the children of the men who fight for us.

Behind every service star is the aching but fiercely proud heart of an American mother or an American father. Behind these stars are the homes of America—the heartbeat of our land.

Without these homes, without these loved ones, without these lovely familiar home communities like Shiocton, there would be little left to fight for.

The heart and the mind and the pulse beat of the mightiest nation on earth is right here—here in the Shioctons of our Nation.

The ideals, the hopes, the dreams, and the strength of our country are not found solely in Washington—they are found here in Shiocton, in Park Falls, in Sioux City, in Kalamazoo, or in Austin, Tex., or anywhere in this land where American mothers and American fathers pray at night for the safe return of their sons and daughters.

This, then, my friends, will be the greatest homecoming of all—that glorious day when our loved ones can come back to us with heads high and hearts singing because they are coming home, and because they are coming home to a land of free men and women in a world where tyranny and oppression and slavery have again been driven into the shadows.

In normal times the folks of any community have an obligation to their fellow-townspeople who have left the home community. Their obligation is to preserve the warmth and the friendliness, the decency, and the character of the community along with the beautiful tree-lined streets and a few of the old familiar landmarks.

In wartime, we of the small communities—and I come from the small community of Chippewa Falls—we have an even greater obligation.

It is an obligation to preserve intact the values for which we fight today. It is an obligation to preserve a land of freemen and freewomen—a land where there is no economic or political bondage.

It is an obligation to preserve a land free from bigotry and intolerance. It is an obligation to preserve a land where there are no racial barriers.

It is an obligation to preserve a land where there are no class distinctions—a land where we do not set up a caste system—a land where we do not divide our strength by pitting class against class.

It is an obligation to enshrine in this community and in every community throughout the land, the sacred and inalienable right of every man to worship as he sees fit.

It is the obligation to preserve the decent orderly processes of a government of free men, where government is the servant and not the master—where the people are sovereign.

It is the obligation to preserve a land of opportunity where a farm boy from Shiocton can become President, and where a businessman from Cadott can build a great enterprise from the back room of a village garage. It is the obligation to preserve that freedom of economic opportunity where a man has a right to retain a just portion of what he earns.

It is the obligation to retain a land where there are no Gestapo agents, no drumhead courts, no blood purges, and no mass executions—a land where every man is entitled to a trial by jury—is entitled to justice before God and before the law.

It is an obligation to preserve forever the sacred and inviolate right of the free-born American to have his say, to speak his mind, to express his convictions without the fear of government reprisal.

It is the obligation to safeguard the right of every American to write his convictions. It is the obligation to preserve a free and unfettered American press.

In short, my friends it is our obligation to preserve for our fighting men all of the great values and all of the great freedoms which our forefathers have won for us.

It is our obligation to preserve the rights laid down in our great charters of human liberty—the right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

We who stand in the doorways of 40,000,000 American homes—we are only the trustees—the guardians—of these homes and the great values they represent.

While men are fighting in Normandy, on Saipan, we in Shiocton or in Thorp or in Marshfield or in Kansas City or wherever it may be—we are the custodians of the legacy, the heritage, our fighting men have left behind. We are false to our trust if we do not devote every possible moment to safeguarding that trust.

My friends, I do not speak to you today of legislation in Washington. I am speaking now of homes and men and women without whom there could be no Washington. I am speaking now of custodians back home—trustees of great values. All that is necessary in Washington is to cut through the maze of complicated and confused thinking to one basic yardstick. That yardstick must be used to measure all legislation, and in fact to measure everything we do. It is the simple yardstick—the simple test—that everything we do must safeguard or enhance the values for which we are the trustees.

Because there are communities like Shiocton; because there are decent, God-fearing, home-loving Americans such as we find here today; because there are people and homes and communities like this all over America—because of these things we can face the future unafraid.

This is the strength of our land. You people, your convictions, your ideals, your prayers, your hopes, and your dreams—these are America's secret weapon. And it is a force more potent than any robot bomb ever devised.

And so, my friends, I conclude as I began, by extending my thanks at being privileged to be a part of this inspiring gathering, and to express my fervent conviction that this homecoming is an omen of a greater homecoming in the days up ahead when war-weary sons and daughters will come back to the land they know so well, to the homes they cherish so dearly, and to the people they love so deeply.

Peace Despite the Filibusters

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLAUDE PEPPER

OF FLORIDA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, August 11 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 8), 1944

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article entitled "Peace Despite the Filibusters," written by me and published in the New York Times Magazine of June 25, 1944.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PEACE DESPITE FILIBUSTERS

SENATOR PEPPER ARGUES THE CASE FOR THE USE OF AN EXECUTIVE AGREEMENT INSTEAD OF A TREATY

(By CLAUDE PEPPER, Senator from Florida)

If the United States is to win the peace and begin effective world collaboration at the end of World War No. 2, it will have to be not by treaty of peace but by executive agreement.

We are in war probably because we did not prepare for war in times of peace. All of us should agree that the time to prepare for peace is in war. Surely we were not prepared for the peace after World War No. 1. The American people had not been educated to the problems of winning the peace, and the machinery for gaining the peace had not been adapted to the immense demands which effective collaboration would exact.

True, the American people throughout their history had been seeing farther and farther away from their own shores and had become more and more aware of the necessity of playing an integral part in world affairs. They had seen distances diminished and communications improved so that the world had become more completely one physical community. They had come to realize the impact of ideological and cultural forces of one part of the world on almost every other part. They were aware in some general way that the destiny of the world was interdependent.

Theodore Roosevelt had undoubtedly accelerated this understanding more than anyone before Woodrow Wilson. By the time of the World War, and certainly by the end of the World War, Woodrow Wilson had made the American people emotionally aware that ours had become one world, and that forces comparable to those which preserved order and life and property in a given community had to be set up in the world order. Undoubtedly the American people, stirred by Wilson's great words and spirit, not only were prepared for but demanded that the United States take the leadership in setting up the kind of an organization which would embody that concept.

It is not strange, therefore, that Senator James E. Watson admitted to Senator Henry Cabot Lodge, when the latter asked him to assume leadership in the fight against the League of Nations in the Senate, that at least 80 percent of the American people favored the League. Surely the League's opponents in the Senate or in the country would never have been willing to settle the issue by a fair referendum of the American people. Nor were the opponents of the League willing to submit the issue to a fair vote of the Senate. There was never a time when a great majority of the Senate was not in favor of the League. It is probable that if, at any reasonable time after the League was laid before the Senate by President Wilson, the Senate had been given an opportunity to vote by the opposition, a two-thirds vote in favor of its ratification would have been obtained.

But the American people were totally unprepared for the discovery that the machinery by which their Government, for them, could agree to our membership in the League and to setting up and putting into effect the best organization to preserve world peace which the leading statesmen of the world had been able to devise was utterly inadequate to express the will either of the American people, of the Congress, or of the Senate. Many were appalled and many more bewildered at the exposure of how antiquated and deficient the machinery of their Government was for formulating and executing an effective foreign policy for the United States.

There are many of us, therefore, who are very much concerned as to whether with the same machinery at the end of this war we can achieve a better result. We think it is imperative that the American people focus their attention upon the technique by which the American people formulate and express their foreign policy, and determine with deep earnestness whether this time the peace is to be lost because we have no effective way of winning it. Or to put it another way, whether even now we are going to formulate a set of mechanics by which we may assure that we shall win the peace after the Nation, with so much blood and treasure, shall have helped to win the war.

Our Constitution, formulated in 1787, provides that the President negotiate treaties with other countries, but they do not become effective until they are ratified by two-thirds of the Senators who vote upon ratification. The House of Representatives has, therefore, no part in the making of the peace, although it must by a majority vote agree to a declaration of war.

The founding fathers themselves had grave misgivings about the wisdom of the two-thirds rule. A month after the Constitution was signed Washington wrote: "I am mistaken if any men, bodies of men, or countries, will enter into any compact or treaty, if one of the three is to have a negative control over the other two, but granting that it is an evil it will infallibly work its own cure."

Let us examine the two-thirds rule more closely. How did it get into the Constitution in the first place, and what has been its effect on our national and international life?

One reason often cited for adoption of the two-thirds rule is that it was intended to compensate for exclusion of the House of Representatives from treaty-making deliberations. The men who wrote the Constitution thought that secrecy was necessary in such discussions, and they did not believe secrecy could be maintained among a group as large as the House. The early Senate, on the other hand, consisted of only 26 men; in a body of that size executive sessions were possible. Precisely what logic there was in this form of compensation is not clear, but at any rate secrecy is no longer considered desirable in such cases. Indeed, one of the chief arguments advanced by supporters of the two-thirds rule is that it prolongs discussion and therefore draws public attention to the issues.

Probably a more important factor than the desire for secrecy was the existence in the Constitutional Convention of 2 minority groups, either of which could strangle any treaty as long as the two-thirds rule was in effect. The 4 States in New England and the 4 in the South were strongly treaty-conscious, the former because of a desire to protect their fishing rights, the latter because they feared that a deal with some other country might interfere with shipping on the Mississippi River. Under the two-thirds rule the 8 Senators from either of these groups of States could, by getting only 1 of the remaining 18 Senators to vote with them, block ratification of any treaty. So the two-thirds rule, which was scrapped for general legislative purposes because it had proved so obstructive and impractical in the Continental Congress, was retained as necessary for treaty ratification.

The two-thirds rule had prevented the annexation of Texas and of Hawaii, consequences which might have had an immeasurable effect upon the future of the Nation had they not been avoided by a method which circumvented the rule. But it was when the two-thirds rule, coupled with the privilege of unlimited debate which prevails in the Senate, defeated the Treaty of Versailles and the League of Nations that the American people were really shocked into concern about the adequacy of their Government under the Constitution to meet the demands of world events today.

For more than 8 months the Treaty of Versailles languished in the Senate, while it was made the subject of a political assault the like of which the American people had not up to that time seen. It was more than a year later, in excess of 3 years after the armistice, that finally the United States made a separate peace with its former enemy, Germany.

The opponents of the League had control of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, which for months held the treaty away from the Senate floor, and made its hearings the platform for the dissemination of the propaganda which was eventually to destroy the League in the Senate. Likewise the opponents of the League had control of the parliamentary procedure upon the Senate floor. This accentuated the evil of the two-thirds requirement, because the consideration of the treaty was so manipulated that it was not allowed to come to a vote in the Senate when it might have had a two-thirds vote of the Senators voting upon its ratification.

It will be remembered that while the Senate debated the League of Nations the world waited for peace. The 25 other Nations besides ourselves which had been signatories of the Treaty of Versailles waited to know what the United States would do about ordering the affairs of the world.

After this spectacle the American people began to wonder whether, with the two-thirds rule in effect, the United States could effectively have any foreign policy, or could make the kind of decisions which a great Nation has to make concerning world affairs.

The executive branches of the other principal powers of the world have authority to negotiate international agreements. When ratification by their parliamentary bodies is necessary it is a matter accomplished with dispatch. These powers, therefore, are able to make international commitments and to inform authoritatively other nations what they will and what they will not do.

But what can an American President or Secretary of State commit this Nation to, and what responsible advice can the American Government give any other power as to our course, so long as any international agreement is subject to unlimited delay in committee in the Senate, and then to unlimited debate upon the Senate floor, and then to the requirement of a two-thirds vote when eventually its consideration is reached?

Surely what Russia is to do after the war, and what England will do in the same period, will depend to a large extent upon what we are prepared to do. It is obvious that if Russia and England are going to have to rely upon their own strength for their future security they must achieve a strategic position after the war which will give them the safeguards upon which they are willing to rely. The alternative is international understanding and commitments by which we will all agree to band together against the aggressor and to use force if necessary and such other means as may be required to restrain international aggression and to maintain the peace of the world.

How long will Russia and England, in determining what territory they will occupy when the enemy is crushed, be willing to wait for the Senate, according to its present procedure, to make up its mind as to what America will do? Or how long will these countries jointly wait upon the Senate determining what we are willing to commit ourselves to after the war, when those two Governments can at any time under their governmental procedure enter into effective agreements and understanding about their own courses?

Moreover, with our system of political parties in the United States, there will always be a certain number of Senators who will make political capital even out of a treaty concluding a war which the opposite party in control of a government may negotiate. That is a severe indictment, but I suggest to good citizens that it has occurred in the past.

John C. Calhoun, when he was Secretary of State, wrote concerning the fight over the treaty providing for the annexation of Texas: "I cannot but hope that the treaty would be sanctioned * * * when the Presidential election will be over, and the party motives that have led to laying the treaty on the table shall have passed away."

In the fall of 1919 Senator Albert J. Beveridge wrote to Will Hays, chairman of the Republican National Committee: "* * * if Wilson gets this thing [the League of Nations] through, especially if he gets it through with Republican support, I think that our prospects of winning [the national election], which 3 months ago seemed a certainty, will be gravely diminished."

Even if it were possible to get a vote upon a treaty at any time in the Senate, the two-thirds rule is almost prohibitive of ratification of the kind of treaty which has to be made after a world war today. The power of filibuster, which the Senate jealously preserves, makes it possible, however, for even less than a third to defeat a treaty, for a few determined men under the rules of the Senate can even keep a measure from being made the pending business before the Senate.

Many filibusters have revealed that power and the willingness of the Senators to exercise it adamantly. Debate on the League of Nations showed that there was a little group of Senators who would forego no power to defeat the League. Surely the isolationists and those who do not believe in international collaboration are in the Senate today, and they are determined to use every means within their power to prevent the setting up after this war of the kind of international organization, and the kind of world collaboration, which most of us believe essential to the winning of the peace and to the prevention of World War No. 3.

One naturally asks what can be done. Several of us, including myself, have proposed a constitutional amendment which will provide for the ratification of treaties either by majority of the Senate, or a majority of the Senate and House of Representatives. I advocate that ratification be by majority of the Senate and the House. The House should have a part in making peace comparable to its part in the declaration of war. The House is the body closer to the people. Surely the principle of providing checks upon the power of the Executive and balance between departments of Government can adequately be obtained by preventing any treaty negotiated by the executive department becoming effective unless it is agreed to by a majority of the Senate and the House.

I go further, however, and provide that a majority of the Senate and the House must have authority effectively to fix the time of the vote. In other words, to prevent a filibuster.

But an amendment to the Constitution can be proposed to the legislatures of the States only by a two-thirds vote of the House of Representatives and the Senate. While I believe the House is prepared to abolish the two-thirds rule in favor of a majority rule in the Senate and the House, the Senate, I am sure, is not ready to do so, and will not do so.

The alternative under the Constitution is for two-thirds of the States to propose such a constitutional amendment to the Congress. In that case it would be obligatory upon the Congress to provide for a constitutional convention to consider such a proposed amendment. If such a convention submitted a proposed amendment, then it would be the duty of the Congress to submit the proposal to the States for ratification by the legislatures, or conventions, as Congress might determine, in three-fourths of the States. While everyone who believes in the abolition of the two-thirds rule should work for action in the State legislatures, it is vain to hope that we can accomplish anything effective by the end of this war.

The only effective way, therefore, to circumvent the two-thirds rule, although that does not overcome the senatorial power of filibuster, is to seek the adjustment of post-war problems and international collaboration on the part of our Government by executive agreement, approved by a majority of those voting in the Senate and the House.

The executive agreement with such approval by the Congress is historically as old and almost as well recognized as the treaty. In fact, Washington himself used the device of the executive agreement approved by the Congress. Since his time about 1,200 compacts with foreign governments have been concluded by the executive-agreement method, while only some 800 treaties have been ratified.

You may wonder about the difference between the treaty and the executive agreement. It is doubtful if anyone could draw a definition which would accurately describe the difference in the two in the light of our history. While there are many good theories, it may be said that an executive agreement is an instrument pertaining to international affairs which the Senate and the House are willing by a majority vote to treat as an executive agreement, binding upon this Nation, while a treaty is such an instrument which the Congress will not recognize unless it is ratified by two-thirds of the Senators voting upon its ratification. Congress, therefore, has the power of substituting a majority rule of the Senate and House for the two-thirds rule of the Senate.

The present machinery does not prevent the Congress and the Executive from so working together that we can have an effective foreign policy, and can make decisions on international affairs with promptness and responsibility. The danger is in whether Congress will allow a minority of the Senate to abuse the power to defeat an effective foreign policy.

One readily sees, then, how important it is that the views of Members of Congress be known upon this vital question. It is doubtful if any attitude of a Member of Congress is as important to the winning of the peace and the prevention of World War No. 3 as whether he, or she, is willing to break the stranglehold of the minority of the Senate upon our power to participate in foreign affairs.

Bretton Woods Monetary Agreement

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES G. SCRUGHAM
OF NEVADA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, August 11 (legislative day of Tuesday, August 8, 1944

Mr. SCRUGHAM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter signed by 26 Senators, addressed to the President of the United States, dealing with the international monetary fund plan, and a statement prepared by me dealing with the Bretton Woods Monetary Agreement.

There being no objection, the letter and statement were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BRETTON WOODS MONETARY AGREEMENT

(By Senator J. G. SCRUGHAM)

In my opinion the Bretton Woods Agreement for monetary stabilization, in its present form, will fail to receive the approval of Congress for the following reasons:

1. The absence of a statement saying that it is the objective of the signatory nations to restore the gold and silver standards. Instead, it is clear that the international monetary fund is designed to facilitate the adoption of managed currency plans by individual nations and groups of nations, and eventually by the world at large.

2. No conditions whatever are attached to the utilization of the credit facilities of the fund by nations whose balance of payments will be adverse due to conditions within their control. As a minimum, such countries should promise to take steps that would improve their balance of payments position, so that they would not have to resort to the fund chronically for assistance.

3. No price for gold is set in the fund, each nation being free to select any initial parity for its currency that it wishes, with provision for changes in such parity subsequently, thereby deliberately providing a means of circumventing stabilization.

4. No price for silver is set in the fund. In fact, unlike gold, no provision is made for any price for silver. Article V, section 4, which contains the only reference to silver in the agreement fails to specify the basis on which silver may be accepted as collateral for a loan for a country that has exhausted its quota in the fund, and gives no assurance whatever that silver will be accepted by the fund if tendered.

5. No provision is made for special credits to nations that desire to acquire gold and silver for coinage, so as to substitute actual coins or representative paper money for fiat currency.

Fundamentally, the international monetary fund plan seeks to substitute managed currency for the triad and tested gold and silver standards. I do not believe our Congress will approve the plan unless it is modified to correct this defect.

President Roosevelt received a letter signed by 26 Senators, at the time that the Bretton Woods Conference was started, expressing their concern over the lack of provision for a metallic base for currency, and particularly over the failure to include silver along with gold in the original draft of the experts' plan. The agreement as published is open to this same objection. Failure to respond favorably to the Senators' letter, and to heed the objections raised, will necessarily affect the attitude of many Members of Congress when the Bretton Woods Agreement is presented for ratification.

For the information of those who have not seen the letter referred to I desire to insert it into the RECORD at this point:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON THE INVESTIGATION OF SILVER,
June 21, 1944.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: We have studied carefully the international monetary fund plan that has been made public by the United States Treasury. Since whatever plan is ultimately adopted will have to be approved by the Congress, we feel it is our duty to pass on to you without delay certain conclusions we have reached pertaining to the plan.

The experts' plan suffers from a basic, organic defect in that no place in it is assigned to silver. As a result, there will be an insufficiency of media for the settlement of international balances, and the use of silver as money will be undermined.

We strongly urge, therefore, that the plan be revised forthwith so that parities for the currencies of member countries will be fixed in silver, as well as gold. By specifying fixed parities in terms of silver also, the following results would be attained:

1. The physical supply of standard money would be expanded for the enlarged needs of the post-war world.

2. The preference of a large part of the population of the world for silver money would be recognized.

3. The nations of Europe and the Far East now in the throes of wild paper money inflation could return to silver coinage on a sound basis.

4. The remonetization of gold and silver would thus be effected simultaneously and internationally.

Sincerely yours,

ELMER THOMAS, chairman, Special Silver Committee; EDWIN C. JOHNSON; PAT MCCARRAN; SHERIDAN DOWNEY; JAMES E. MURRAY; ABE MURDOCK; ERNEST W. MCFARLAND; HARLAN J. BUSHFIELD; E. V. Civil Aeronautics Military Cadet Training Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HARRY R. SHEPPARD
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 14, 1944

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen, on March 30 the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN] disclosed here on the floor of the House a very remarkable story and a story of which every American can well be proud.

He told how, back in 1939, a group of civilian flying-school operators were called in by General Arnold and General Yount and told that the Army had neither the necessary personnel nor the time to build primary flight-training facilities if we were to be ready when the storm clouds of war should break.

He told how in this emergency, an Army board had toured the Nation hunting civilian schools that could do Air Force training and how finally nine schools operated by this little group of experienced operators were selected because of their long years in training flyers; because they had the buildings, equipment, fields, and facilities all set up for such work; because they had the trained pilots, mechanics, and organization with 20 years' experience, necessary for the job.

He told how this group of men were asked to plunge immediately into the work of training pilots, so badly were they needed, on the chance that the money to finance the work eventually could be secured, although there were no contracts and no guarantee that such would be the case.

He told how these operators gambled everything they had and went heavily into debt to take on the job of teaching thousands of our young men to fly airplanes, without any assurance that they would get their money back. They even did this before Congress appropriated the money. It is a great example of American free enterprise.

He told of the unprecedented teamwork that was set up, with the Army Air Forces and the Nation's civilian schools working together with a new standard of efficiency and unprecedented economy to create the most powerful Air Force the world has ever known, and to do it with an unprecedented safety record.

I have recently returned from my district in southern California where two of these schools are located. Out at Ontario is Cal-Aero Academy, operated by Maj. C. C. Moseley, a World War No. 1 veteran and fighter pilot in that tiny group of airmen who fought the Germans overseas in 1917 and 1918, a man who officially destroyed Germans in aerial combat in the last war and one who has devoted his life to aviation, one of these original nine experienced operators who took that long chance back in 1939. Up at Lancaster is Mira Loma Flight Academy which Major Moseley also set up a year later when General Arnold's second appeal for more and more schools was made.

I spent some time at these two fields and I learned some things I think the Congress ought to know. The people who are running these schools spend their time training pilots and more pilots. They do not take much time out to talk about themselves. They know that theirs is a grave and dangerous responsibility—that they have been entrusted with the precious lives of the pick of our land. They are too busy doing the job to waste time talking about it. Their amazing accomplishments are not generally known.

Now, if you do not think there is a story worth telling in these schools, just listen to this one fact:

Moseley's schools have trained over 20,000 pilots. Over 1,000 of them have been decorated over and above the call of duty, including awards of the Congressional Medal of Honor, Victoria Cross, and so forth. They have flown a total of more than 1,630,000 hours, or 163,000,000 miles. One school's safety record is so good that a cadet—and this, mind you, is a cadet in training, learning to fly—can depend on flying around the world 260 times, or make 1,254 round trips from Washington, D. C., to Los Angeles, or continued flying, night and day, for 7 years, without a fatality. Compare this with the fact that overseas in War No. 1 the cadet training record was 1 fatality every 1,100 hours, and in 1939 the record was 1 fatality about every 16,000 hours. Considering these Army-civil schools are doing their training, in large volume, under wartime pressure makes this accomplishment one of the greatest of this war.

And here is something else I learned: The Army is saving the taxpayers a staggering amount of money with this civilian school set-up. When the Army had to do its own primary training—that is the job of just teaching the man to fly, before the Army takes him over and teaches him to use his airplane as a military weapon—it cost about $55 per flying hour. Now, by using these civilian schools and their equipment and their personnel, they have reduced that cost by more than 80 percent. In other words, these civilian schools have enabled us to train a man to fly for less than a fifth of the accepted cost. When you figure that more than 100,000 pilots have been trained these last 5 years, this saving gets into astronomical figures.

Then there is the manpower saving. There are two or three angles to that. The one that interested me most was the length they go to in reducing what they call the wash-out rate. Wash-outs are cadets who are eliminated as being unfit to be a military pilot. There is no disgrace in washing out. Either a man can be taught to fly or he cannot. But it is harder to develop this ability in some men than in others. These civilian schools go to the most amazing lengths to get a man through if they possibly can. For instance, they have developed what they call Squadron X. When a cadet does not progress in his training as well as he should, they transfer him to Squadron X. The man at the head of Squadron X is pretty good at getting under the boy's skin and figuring out just what is holding him back. When he figures out what is wrong, he assigns the lad to an instructor who fits the cadet's particular peculiarities. This instructor becomes a second father to him. He labors and sweats and works his soul out to make a pilot out of his problem child. And first thing you know, the boy suddenly gets the hang of it, and there is one less washed-out cadet—one less wasted man. If you do not think this sort of thing is important, listen to this: When the civilian schools took over this job of primary training, the accepted wash-out rate was 40 percent. With a class of 275 cadets that would mean that 110 men would be eliminated. Well, just the other day Mira Loma Flight Academy graduated a class of 275 cadets, and there were just 4 wash-outs. Four wash-outs instead of 110; 106 more pilots for the Air Force.

And while we are on this subject of manpower, you should know that the use of these civilian schools and their personnel has released over 100,000 officers and enlisted men for combat duty—men who otherwise would have been tied down as instructors and mechanics and cooks and maintenance people. Their personnel largely do not qualify for Army duty. For instance, I met an instructor who has 16,000 hours of flying to his credit. Remember that when Eddie Rickenbacker finished his flying in the last war, he had only 350 hours. This man has 16,000 hours. Of course, he is too old for combat, but think what those 16,000 hours of experience mean in teaching new pilots to fly. And that man is no exception. In fact, the average flying experience of all the hundreds of instructors out there is more than 2,500 hours each, and 9½ years' flying experience.

That is one reason—and a big one—why these schools have been able to set new standards of training. There is no substitute for experience and these veterans of aviation have that experience—experience that only comes from years and years of trial and error.

So, then, I found that without any fanfare but with a tremendous amount of good common sense and good business administration, the Army Air Forces and these civilian contract schools have set up a proposition that is actually sensational. Millions and millions of dollars are being saved—as much as $250,000,000 a year; manpower of staggering proportions is being saved; safety heretofore undreamed of is being accomplished and all this while maintaining the highest standards in the finished product of any air force in the world.

Now all this is not only noteworthy and significant in these days of war which we all hope and believe are drawing to their close. If anything, it is even more significant for the days of peace that lie ahead. And here is why:

It takes only rudimentary intelligence to know that this Nation never again dare be without a powerful air force—an air force capable of enforcing peace. Only a merciful providence and gross errors of judgment by our enemies saved us from a fate we dare not contemplate, when the approach of war found us with only a handful of pilots and few combat aircraft. It is too much to expect that fortune would favor us a second time. We have learned the hard way and we would be indeed unworthy of the kindness bestowed upon us by that providence if we refused to profit by what we have learned.

It is one thing to build and equip an air force. It is another thing to maintain one. In no other field is the turnover rate so heavy. A man of 25 has reached the top age for fighter aircraft piloting; at 27 he is passing his usefulness as a bomber pilot. Eighteen is the minimum for starting to train. Thus a military combat pilot's effective life, from start to finish, can be but 9 years at the most, of which one, at the minimum, must be his training period.

So, obviously, this training of new pilots must go on and on and on, if we are to safely be prepared to enforce peace in the world. And it is one thing to spend money in wartime and quite another thing to spend money in times of peace.

Herein lies the blessing of this Army-civilian school team. With costs reduced by 80 percent, the taxpayer from now on can get his military pilots and keep 80 percent of his money too. We have learned how to buy pilots at bargain prices without lowering our high standards, without wasting our manpower and, best of all, with almost fantastic safety.

Certainly no one is better fitted to do peacetime training as an integral part of our national defense system than these unsung heroes of this war—the civilian schools who have proved their ability to do a job safely, efficiently, inexpensively.

The gentleman from Alabama characterized this proposition as "great military leadership teamed up with civilian know-how in a typical American partnership." Let us resolve to preserve for all time this partnership that has worked so well.

Where Does Agriculture Go From Here?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLIFFORD R. HOPE
OF KANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 10, 1944

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, under permission granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I submit herewith an address which I delivered before the annual meeting of the International Baby Chick Association in Chicago, Ill., on July 28, 1944:

I am happy to have the opportunity to attend this conference and to address the members of the International Baby Chick Association and others interested in the poultry industry.

There may have been a time when poultry and eggs could be considered as mere pin money but that time has long since passed. As a matter of fact, poultry has always been one of the leading sources, as well as the most diversified source, of farm income. This is true to an even greater extent today. Last year poultry and egg production topped the $2,000,000,000 figure and that is big business even in these days when we speak as glibly of millions and billions as we did of hundreds and thousands in earlier periods.

The evidence is increasing every day that we are now entering the last stages of the European phase of the war. This isn't intended as a prediction that the war in Europe is going to be over in a month, or 3 months, or 6 months, although it could possibly end any time within those periods and probably will. Irrespective, however, of the date when unconditional surrender takes place, the fact remains that the pattern of victory has been marked out. The glaring weaknesses of Germany both on the military and home fronts which have been revealed since the beginning of the current offensives are proof sufficient that the end is in sight and that the exact date probably depends more upon psychological and morale factors than it does upon military prowess. The Pacific war will take longer, but there, too, the factors which make victory certain have already been achieved and the result is only a matter of time.

When the story of our participation in this war is finally written, it will be found, I am sure, that our greatest contribution to victory has been that of production on the home front. This is not said in any way in disparagement of our great achievements on the battlefield or the unequaled and unparalleled heroism of our soldiers and sailors and marines in all quarters of the globe. Their achievements will brighten the pages of history for all time, and surpass anything recorded of the past. It is in the field of production, however, that we have displayed our greatest superiority over our enemies and have been able to render the greatest assistance to our gallant allies.

When it became apparent that we could produce 100,000 airplanes in 1 year and other offensive weapons in the same proportion, that we could build within the space of 3 years a navy greater than the combined navies of all nations of the earth, and that we could build merchant shipping at the rate of 20,000,000 tons in a year, Allied victory was assured. A great deal has been said about this miracle of industrial production and everything which has been said is deserved. It is an achievement which it is impossible to exaggerate in the telling.

Less has been said about the farmers' part in war production. His stay has not been so dramatic or spectacular, yet, in many ways, the achievements of agriculture in war production have been more remarkable than those of industry. It must be remembered that our increase in industrial production was possible because of a tremendous expansion in plants and plant capacity, because of greatly increased personnel, and because of priorities which made it possible to secure needed materials. The farmers lacked these advantages.

He secured an increase of 24 percent in food production between 1939 and 1943 in spite of the fact that in 1943 he had less labor, less machinery, and less transportation equipment than he had in 1939. This great achievement occurred notwithstanding all of the harassments, inconveniences, delays, and confusion which are to a greater or lesser extent inevitable accompaniments of a shift from peacetime to wartime economy. While those engaged in industrial war production had their operations underwritten by the Government and took no chance of loss, this was not the case with farmers. It is true that in some cases farmers had assurances of support prices for their products, but even then they took all the risks of weather, insect pests, and plant and livestock diseases against which there is no insurance. In many cases at the request of their Government farmers planted crops with which they had no experience and for which they did not have suitable or adequate machinery and equipment. In most cases, farmers risked a large part of their capital in their expanded operations yet few hesitated to take the risk. Farm days are always long but since the war they've been even longer. In most parts of the country farm operators have worked from 12 to 13½ hours per day, and in many cases it's a 7-day week. Farmers out in Kansas jokingly refer to their 8-hour day—8 hours in the forenoon and 8 hours in the afternoon. Yet, in spite of everything, the goals set by the War Food Administration have been equaled and, in many cases, exceeded. This miracle of farm production has been made possible only because of the patriotic, untiring, everlasting work of the American farmer and every member of his family.

No group of agricultural producers has made a more outstanding record than the poultrymen. The increase in production in that field is really something to crow about. Between 1939 and 1943 egg production increased 39 percent and chicken production 83 percent. Something was said a few years ago about two chickens for every pot. That goal has just about been reached. Furthermore, a large proportion of this increased production has gone directly into the war effort in the way of food for our armed forces and on lend-lease to our allies.

Our great achievements in both industrial and agricultural production ought to give us great confidence for the future. We have demonstrated a capacity which we ourselves did not know we possessed. This great miracle of production has been achieved through the cooperation of industry, labor, agriculture, and government. It has demonstrated what the American people working together can accomplish. Yet there are many who now view the future with apprehension. They are worried, not about production, but about consumption. They wonder if after the war when Government buying ceases, whether our people will have the buying power to support this immense productive capacity. Farmers, as well as industrialists, and working people, are concerned about this. Perhaps farmers are more concerned than any other group of producers because it is harder for them to adjust their operations downward than anyone else. Large industrial units can control their production, but 6,000,000 farmers competing with each other cannot do it satisfactorily or without great loss. The tremendous increase in agricultural production under the stimulus of war was a great and difficult achievement, but to cut down production substantially if that should be necessary would be even more difficult.

Fortunately for the adjustments which may be necessary, the need for ample food supplies will not end with the war. We do not have exact information as to what will be needed for relief in Europe when the war ends but we know that for a year or so we will have to supply some food to the war-torn areas. The length of time this will be necessary cannot be foretold now. Also, we know the Japanese war will continue for some period after hostilities are over in Europe and this means continued demands from military sources and a continuation—even if on a restricted scale—of our war production program.

Also there is on the statute books legislation passed by Congress which provides price support at 90 percent of parity for most important agricultural products for 2 years following the termination of the war. No one knows better than this audience that price support programs don't always function 100 percent, especially on perishables, but I have no doubt but what Congress and whatever administration is in power will stand behind this price support program.

This price support program plus the fact that the end of the war will come in two phases will help hold the line long enough to enable farmers to make adjustments and for agriculture, business, labor and Government to work out post-war policies.

Just what will the situation be with reference to agricultural production after the war production program is terminated? First, what about acreage? That's only one factor in agricultural production but, of course, an important one. The phenomenal crops of 1942 and 1943 were grown on about the same acreage as the average from 1935 to 1939. For 1944 the estimated acreage is a little larger but not materially so. Some of the increased production per acre was due to exceptionally favorable weather but in considerable part it was due to improved farming practices. Advancement is being made continually along this line and we may expect that in the post-war period yields per acre will gradually increase. Therefore, even if we could continue to consume as much as during the current period, it is probable that 10 years from now it could be grown on a smaller acreage if necessary and desirable.

What about manpower? Well, our production in 1943 was achieved with the smallest number of persons working on farms in the whole 35 years for which statistics have been available. It is indicated that the number for 1944 will be still less. This, however, is in line with the trend for many years. According to the Bureau of Agricultural Economics, agricultural production per worker, in 1940–43 as a whole, averaged 25 percent greater than in 1935–39 and 67 percent greater than in 1910–14. These gains, of course, were due to mechanization, improved practices, better varieties and strains of crops and livestock and other factors making for greater efficiency, all of which may be expected to continue.

Will those who have left the farm during the war period return and, if they do, what will be the effect on agricultural production and prices? A great deal depends upon the answers to those questions. Perhaps no one knows the answer but preliminary surveys indicate that a large proportion of those who have left the farm for industry would like to stay there. I think we are safe in assuming that they will stay there if they can get jobs at good wages. If jobs are not available, they'll return to the farm for there is no place else to go. This is in entire harmony with what has happened in the past and has resulted in the seeming paradox that when farm prices are good, people leave the farms and when they are bad, there is a movement back to the farm. The explanation is that good farm prices come with employment and good wages in the cities, and poor farm prices with urban unemployment and low wages, coupled with the further fact that even in times of farm prosperity wages in the city are more attractive, and life on the farm, under any conditions, is better than unemployment in the city. If, through a lack of jobs in industry, most of those who have left the farms return to agriculture, we will, in all probability, find ourselves with farm surpluses for which there is no market because surplus labor in agriculture means surplus production. This means that the key to the entire problem is jobs. Jobs in industry mean markets for farmers.

It all adds up to the fact that the post-war problems of agriculture cannot be separated from these of industry and labor. All are interdependent. If we can maintain industrial employment in this country sufficient to give jobs at good wages to all who want to work, we will have, in a large measure, solved the problem not only of labor but of industry and agriculture. If this can be done, agricultural producers can count upon a domestic demand for farm products almost equal to our production during the war period, although it may be necessary to make shifts in types of production. Unfortunately, because a considerable part of its expansion went directly into war sources, the poultry industry will likely be required to make some downward adjustments even under conditions of full employment. Perhaps, however, no greater than those which have already been made.

We can have full employment and abundant production in this country only if agriculture, labor, industry and government get together on such a policy. As far as farmers are concerned, they instinctively favor such a policy. They are satisfied only when producing. In recent years many farmers have cooperated in programs for adjusting and reducing production but they have done so without enthusiasm and because it seemed the only way out of an otherwise hopeless situation. Yet if post-war policies on the part of government, industry and labor contemplate restrictions on production, agriculture will have to follow suit. For the whole of industry or labor such a policy would be just as harmful as it would be for agriculture. Yet there are some branches of industry in a position where they can follow monoply practices, which may conclude that their selfish interests can best be served by restricting production and depending on high prices and high profits. There are labor organizations which have, in the past, kept down the labor supply by a combination of the closed shop, restrictions on union membership, and slow-downs. Undoubtedly those who advocated and followed such practices felt that they were benefiting themselves. Perhaps they were. Even if they want to do so, there is no way by which farmers can follow the practices of industry and labor in restricting production. The Government will have to do it for them. That means bureaucracy, conferences, consultants, statisticians, and coordinators, none of which are particularly popular with farmers no matter how necessary they may be, and it doesn't mean fair prices or prosperity. We learned that from 1933 to 1939. During that time we tried about everything in the way of agricultural programs. We spent billions of dollars on agricultural adjustment payments alone. The number of employees in the Department of Agriculture increased fourfold. In spite of all this we wound up with prices at only 75 percent of parity when the war began in September 1939. Yet in a comparatively short time the war, by creating a demand and buying power for farm products, more than doubled net farm income.

We can feel encouraged over the fact that all over the Nation today groups representing industry, labor, and agriculture are working on post-war plans. Several of these are national groups, such as the Committee for Economic Development and the National Planning Association. Labor organizations, industrial groups, and farm groups are hard at work over the Nation. There are perhaps 3,000 State and local groups considering post-war planning. Government departments are busy, and congressional committees have done much. We have won the battle of war production because millions of Americans worked together with one common purpose in mind. Is it too much to hope that a similar united effort now will bring about a program of abundant production following the war?

I hope the emphasis which I have placed on cooperation between Government, industry, labor, and agriculture to bring about abundant production has not created the impression that this is the whole problem. Each group has its separate and specific problems. Some of those pertaining to agriculture are as follows. The order in which I have arranged them is not based on their importance.

1. The disposition of Government-owned property. Of direct interest to agriculture are four types of such property. First, supplies of food and other agricultural commodities which may affect prices when they are thrown on the market. These must be disposed of with as little loss as possible. At the same time their disposition must be calculated to cause the least possible disturbance of prices. Second, land purchased for defense installations. Much of it is fertile crop land. There will be demands that this land be returned to private ownership as soon as possible and that former owners and war veterans be given a preference in its purchase. Strong arguments can be made for this course, but I suggest we approach the matter with caution. Why not keep this land in Government hands until we are sure it is needed for productive purposes. When and if it is, its disposition will be simple. Third, plants which might be used after the war for the manufacture of fertilizer. We should take care to see that their disposition and use are not adverse to agriculture. Fourth, plants which have been constructed by the Government for the processing of agricultural products.

2. Our Federal reclamation policy should be such that new land will not be brought into cultivation and production until it is definitely needed.

3. Foreign trade policies. Abundant production means an expanding foreign trade. It means more imports as well as more exports. Such a program need not be inimical to agriculture. If properly worked out, it can be helpful. This could be the subject of an entire discussion, but time forbids more now.

4. Conservation of our land resources. From a long-time standpoint, this is perhaps the most important subject of all. In the immediate future it will be helpful if it can be integrated with production adjustment programs.

5. There should be further study and investigation of crop insurance. Experiments along this line up to date have not been entirely encouraging. There is nothing, however, which will do as much to stabilize agriculture as a workable system of crop insurance. The matter is so important that nothing should be left undone to work out a practical program.

6. Further consideration of what constitutes parity with a view of obtaining a more up-to-date formula. Poultry producers are justifiably interested in a basis which gives greater weight to their production costs.

7. A better marketing system for farm products. No producer in the world has as little to say about the price and disposition of his product as the farmer. It is doubtful if any other business could survive such a marketing system. The House Committee on Agriculture is about to begin a thorough investigation of this subject. This investigation will be fair, objective, and thorough. Its sole object will be to determine how well our present system is working and what improvements might be made in it. The investigation will cover all phases of marketing, including transportation, terminal market facilities, commodity exchange, surplus disposal, and cooperative marketing. I consider this one of the most important investigations ever authorized by Congress.

8. Provision whereby farmers working in cooperation can take temporary or seasonal surpluses off the market. Perhaps all surpluses could not be handled that way. Surpluses of nonperishables which might be carried through more than one season might need Federal financing but even in those cases it would be preferable if they could be handled through farmer owned and controlled organizations.

9. Any post-war plans for agriculture should take into consideration that, as time goes on, we will need less rather than more manpower in agricultural production. Since 1900 the proportion of our working population in agriculture has fallen from 37 percent to 15 percent and it is still falling. There may be temporary checks in this descent but mechanization and better farming practices will continue to increase output per worker and probably at a greater rate than the increase in agricultural consumption. For this reason, we ought to be very careful and conservative in any plans to put returning soldiers on the land lest we do both the soldier and existing farm operators an injustice. Undoubtedly there are many men in the armed forces who came from farms and will want to return to them. They should be given every opportunity to do so, and the further opportunity to acquire land ownership and the equipment with which to farm it where this can be done on the basis of values which will enable profitable operation. However, there is danger that in our commendable desire to assist soldiers in reestablishing themselves after the war we will do them a great injury by letting our hearts rather than our heads determine the policy to be followed.

All of you can think of other questions which must be considered in connection with plans for post-war agriculture. Time does not permit me to mention all of them. At the risk of further imposing on your patience, I want to suggest one more. That is the matter of living conditions on the farm. Not long ago I heard a brilliant farm woman speak on this subject. She told of her experience after she went to the farm as a bride, of the many inconveniences with which she had to contend and how her beautiful new kitchen was cluttered up with the firewood, the incubator, and even sick chickens and pigs. When she mentioned this to other farm women, their usual reply was "Well, it just has to be that way on a farm." All of us who have lived on farms know the conditions under which our mothers and grandmothers worked. They've improved somewhat but there is still plenty of room for more improvement. Any planning for agriculture ought to have for one of its objectives parity of living conditions on the farm including health, education and recreational facilities, vocational opportunities and the complete conveniences of modern life in the way of housing, sanitation, water supply, electricity, and good roads. Probably, it is too much to expect that people living in rural communities will be able to keep up with those living in the city in attaining all of the conveniences of modern life. For this there are compensations, because there are advantages which country people enjoy which cannot be duplicated in the city. Certainly, however, people who live on our farms are entitled to ask that they have the same over-all opportunities for health, education, and recreation possessed by those living in the city.

These are great days. Never since the beginning of recorded history has the world faced such stirring events as are occurring everywhere today. Even as we meet here the mighty panorama of battle is roaring to a climax in every quarter of the globe save that in which we live. Soon as we count time it will be over. This war will be won by the greatest combination of military power ever assembled in all history. It will be won because we and our allies have been able to work together and fight together in a great common cause.

But winning the war is not enough. As the day of victory approaches, we see that if we are to win the peace it will take the same mighty effort, the same cooperation, which it took to win the war. That is true in the international field. It is true here at home. Mark what I say. Our most difficult days are ahead. It's going to be harder to secure united effort after the war ends. The pressure of national danger will be gone. The solidarity that comes in fighting a common enemy will be missing. Some of the hatreds which we have turned against the enemy are going to be turned into channels which will create disunity here at home. There will be attempts made to array group against group and class against class. These efforts must not succeed. There must be harmony. Industry, labor, agriculture, and Government must remain united. There is no other way to win the peace.

Our Kids Are Bums?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ANTON J. JOHNSON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 14, 1944

Mr. ANTON J. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, last Friday on leaving the National Naval Medical Center I gave a lift to a uniformed merchant marine seaman going into town. This boy, and I might add just an average typical American boy, carried a heavily bandaged arm in a sling. After a little patience, I got his story.

A ship had been blown from under him in the South Pacific by a torpedo from a Jap submarine. The crew, unarmed, took to the lifeboats, the Jap submarine then surfaced, and its laughing crew of beasts raked the lifeboats with machine guns.

After a considerable pause he said, "I am going to be well by January 1, in time to go on my new ship; I am going to be in the invasion of Japan."

Then slowly and sadly, as he looked into the distance, he added: "They killed my twin brother, they killed 58 of my friends on my ship."

There we have the evidence of just a typical American boy and his sense of the obligation of American citizenship responsibility. It is the answer to the title of the following editorial in the Macomb Daily Journal of Macomb, Ill.:

OUR KIDS ARE BUMS?

Again, and again, and again: Would you please, Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt, go back in a corner somewhere and sit down and keep still. In any weather you're bad enough, but in this heat you're almost too much.

Some months ago the First Lady (that's hard to take) predicted that American boys would lose their regard for human life and their sense of fair play as a result of war service.

Now it is her idea that youngsters lack citizenship responsibility. American school systems, she says, "have fallen down so terribly in providing instruction in practical self-government." To develop citizenship responsibility she advocates compulsory military training after the war for both boys and girls of age 18.

Some of Mrs. Roosevelt's children may be a keen disappointment to her, and if so, there is some reason for it, but she has no right to assume that every parent is equally unfortunate. Indeed, all facts contradict her.

Where, we would like to ask, has there been grander demonstration of citizenship responsibility than by hundreds of thousands of American youngsters who with serious loyalty and enthusiasm are serving in the armed forces?

Most of them, we would remind Mrs. Roosevelt, entered the service as buck privates. The shiny bars of a captaincy were not handed to them on a platter. However, any sense of inferiority they might have felt was more than offset by mental complacency made possible by their freedom from marital worries and the complications that may be incidental to a string of ex-wives scattered over the country.

If Mrs. Roosevelt were ever in the White House it would be in order to express the hope that the edifice soon ceases to be a glass house from which stones are hurled by an individual whose own failures as a parent and whose demonstrated love for collectivism moves her to advocate giving the state a hand in the rearing of children after the Russian pattern. But she is not often there. She races hither and yon across the country and not infrequently invades other countries, there to give counsel on the shortcomings of the younger generation, explain her odd theories of democracy, or attempt to advance the prestige of her husband.

Which leads us back again to this thing of citizenship responsibility.

Transportation facilities are so overtaxed that young men in uniform, who, according to Mrs. Roosevelt, lack citizenship responsibility, are forced to sleep in the aisles of hot and dilapidated day coaches. These same men who on furlough are allowed such a meager ration of gasoline that they have to do a bit of chiseling if they want to drive out of sight of their homes. It is preached to the public day after day that the shortage of gas and tires is critical, that people must stay off trains so that troops and wounded men can be moved.

Yet Mrs. Roosevelt travels continually.

What do you mean citizenship responsibility, Mrs. Roosevelt?

If every civilian were as lacking in citizenship responsibility in this respect as you are Mrs. Roosevelt, and if every citizen had traveled only half as much, it would have been impossible for this country to have moved a single soldier to embarkation points.

Correction in Printing of the Resolutions of the General Federation of Women's Clubs, in the Congressional Record of June 8, 1944

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOMER D. ANGELL

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 14, 1944

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, on June 8, 1944, I asked leave to extend my remarks by including therein the resolutions adopted by the General Federation of Women's Clubs at their annual convention April 25–28, 1944, at St. Louis, Mo. Through some inadvertent error two of the resolutions were not printed in full, and I am asking leave to print these two resolutions in full as they were adopted at the convention.

On pages 2 and 3 the resolution on international cooperation for peace and post-war planning and the one on crude oil have inadvertently been run together. The two resolutions read:

INTERNATIONAL COOPERATION FOR PEACE AND POST-WAR PLANNING

Whereas two world wars in a single generation have brought upon humanity immeasurable death and destruction and have demonstrated the urgent necessity of international collaboration for the maintenance of peace and justice among the nations; and

Whereas the United States, after attempting to remain apart from each of these wars, has, in defense of its own security and freedom, been drawn into them at heavy cost in human lives and material wealth: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the General Federation of Women's Clubs in convention assembled, April 1944, hereby expresses its conviction that international machinery must be created for the establishment of a just and lasting peace and the prevention of future aggression, and that the United States in its own self-interest must participate therein.

Presented by:

WAR SERVICE DEPARTMENT AND STANDING COMMITTEE CHAIRMEN OF THE GENERAL FEDERATION OF WOMEN'S CLUBS.

CRUDE OIL

Whereas it is a well known fact that the citizens of the United States are faced with a definite crude oil shortage which will become increasingly acute; and

Whereas the present price of crude oil offers no incentive to the discovery and development of new fields, but an increase of 35 cents per barrel in trade would provide this incentive, increasing the price of gasoline to the consumer 1 cent per gallon; and

Whereas statistics show that raw material prices increased 35 percent from June 1940 to September 1943, while crude oil prices remained stationary, and since crude oil is an important commodity in winning the war: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the General Federation of Women's Clubs in convention assembled, April 1944, requests the President of the United States, the governors of the several States, and each Member of Congress to use their best efforts to advance the present price of crude oil 35 cents per barrel and thereby create an incentive for drilling an adequate number of exploratory wells, which will increase our rapidly dwindling crude-oil reserves; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to Secretary Harold Ickes, Paul Davies, and the Chairman of the Committee on Production.

Presented by:

Mrs. GUSTAV KETTERER,
Chairman, War Service Department.
Mrs. HARVEY W. WILEY,
Chairman, Legislation Department.
Mrs. T. M. FRANCIS,
Chairman, Conservation of Natural Resources Committee.
Miss ETHEL FOSTER,
President, Texas Federation of Women's Clubs.

Farley Bows Out

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WESLEY E. DISNEY

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 14, 1944

Mr. DISNEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include in the RECORD, an editorial from the Tulsa World entitled "Farley Bows Out." The great respect I have for Jim Farley and the fact that the editorial appeared in a leading newspaper in my district gives me leave to believe that this should be made a permanent record:

FARLEY BOWS OUT

Resignation of James A. Farley as Democratic chairman of New York frees for individual action one of the best politicians and most admirable men ever known to American politics. This relinquishment of an official post he had long held puts Mr. Farley in position for leadership in the Chicago convention, where he is expected to make a spirited fight against a fourth term for President Roosevelt. With no inhibitions, he will probably be a towering figure on the convention floor.

Jim Farley, as he is popularly called everywhere, has eminence because he was chairman of the Democratic Party in a key State, because he was national Democratic chairman and Postmaster General. In all these positions he was effective, popular, and correct. It is likely that he is today the most popular individual in the United States. There are definite reasons for these distinctions. Mr. Farley was an admirable chairman; his acquaintance over the country was such and his knowledge and affability was such that he was never at a loss in any situation.

On the personal side Mr. Farley is a man among men. He is far above the average in intelligence and his character is flawless. He is clean personally, highminded, and devoted to any interest in which he may be concerned. Few such characters have emerged above the smoke and dirt of our national politics.
